Mary quickly became the focus for the aspirations of discontented Catholics at home and abroad. She conspired with these adherents by means of secret messages, written in ciphers or in invisible ink on white taffeta, smuggled in and out of her prison hidden in such things as beer barrels. The conspiracies were monitored, and to some extent even engineered, by Elizabeth's spy-master, Francis Walsingham, who was setting a trap for the queen of Scots and English Catholics generally. In 1586 Mary was found to be in communication with a young Englishman named Anthony Babington, who was plotting to assassinate Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. Babington and his co-conspirators were drawn and quartered, their heads displayed on Tower Bridge. Though she insisted that, as the sovereign queen of another country, she could not be charged with treason against England's queen, Mary was convicted as a traitor and sentenced to death. Elizabeth vacillated for some time over carrying out the sentence, worrying about the reaction abroad and about the precedent involved in executing a monarch. Eventually she was prevailed upon to sign the death warrant, and Mary was beheaded on February 8, 1587. A week later, Elizabeth wrote to the orphaned James VI of Scotland, lamenting the "miserable accident, which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen."*

Many of the words that seem to speak to us most eloquently of Mary's self and circumstances are not in fact her own. Throughout her life, Mary encountered no shortage of people, some admirers and others deadly foes, who were eager to seize control of her voice. The controversy over the Casket Letters thus crystallizes the more general problem of locating the "real" Mary Stuart. It will probably never be possible to prove with certainty whether the letters are products of Mary's own hand or cunning forgeries designed to incriminate her, and indeed it is this impossibility that lends them much of their fascination, opening them up for the endless play of interpretation. Yet if the interpretation of the Casket Letters has become a kind of intellectual game, it began as a matter of life or death. If Mary was in one respect a text with many authors, she was also a singular woman inhabiting a body that, on the orders of another woman, was at last cut in two.

From Casket Letter Number 2[1]

* * * This day I have wrought[2] till two of the clock upon this bracelet, to put the key in the cleft[3] of it, which is tied with two laces. I have had so little time that it is very ill,[4] but I will make a fairer; and in the meantime take heed that none of those that be here do see it: for all the world would know it, for I have made it in haste in their presence. I go to my tedious talk.[5] You make me dissemble so much that I am afraid thereof with horror; and you make me almost to play the part of a traitor. Remember that if it were not for obeying you, I had rather be dead;[6] my heart bleedeth for it. To be short, he will not come[7] but with condition that I shall promise to be with him as heretofore at bed and board,[8] and that I shall forsake him no more; and upon my word[9] he will do whatsoever I will, and will come, but he hath prayed me to tarry till after tomorrow. * * * But now, to make him trust me, I must feign something unto him; and therefore when he desired me to promise that when he should be whole[1] we should make but one bed, I told him (feigning to believe his fair promises) [that if he][2] did not change his mind between this time and that, I was contented, so as[3] he would say nothing thereof: for (to tell it between us two) the lords wished no ill to him,[4] but did fear lest (considering the threatenings which he made in case we did agree together) he would make them feel the small account[5] they have made of him, and that he would persuade me to pursue some of them; and for this respect should be in jealousy if at one instant,[6] without their knowledge, I did break a game made to the contrary in their presence.[7] And he said unto me, very pleasant and merry, "Think you that they do the more esteem you therefore? But I am glad that you talk to me of the lords. I hear[8] that you desire now that we shall live a happy life—for if it were otherwise, it could not be but greater inconvenience should happen to us both than you think. But I will do now whatsoever you will have me do, and will love all those that you shall love, so as you make them to love me also. For, so as they seek not my life, I love them all equally."

[1] The English translation was made shortly after the French originals of the Casket Letters were produced at Mary's first trial in England (1568-69).

[2] Worked.

[3] I.e., lock.

[4] Badly made.

[5] I.e., with Damley. He was lying ill (probably from syphilis, though smallpox was given out as the cause) at Glasgow; Mary had joined him there.

[6] I.e.. than play the traitor.

[7] I.e., to Craigmillar Castle, outside Edinburgh. "To be short": in short.

[8] I.e., to live again with him as man and wife.

[9] I.e., if I give my word to do this.

[1] Well.

[2] The manuscript of the English translation has a tear at this point; the missing words have been inferred from the contemporary Scottish translation.

[3] Provided that.

[4] Darnley—weak, arrogant, and vicious—had many bitter enemies among the other Scottish lords.

[5] Make them suffer for the low estimate.

[6] Suddenly. "Respect": reason.

[7] At their urging, Mary had authorized a confederacy of nobles to find a way for her to divorce Darnley. "Game": undertaking.

[8] I.e., I am convinced.

Thereupon I have willed this bearer to tell you many pretty[9] things; for I have too much to write, and it is late, and I trust him, upon your word. To be short, he[1] will go anywhere upon my word. Alas! and I never deceived anybody; but I remit[2] myself wholly to your will. And send me word what I shall do, and whatever happen to me, I will obey you. Think also if you will not find some invention more secret by physic,[3] for he is to take physic at Craigmillar, and the baths also, and shall not come forth of[4] long time. To be short, for that that[5] I can learn, he hath great suspicion, and yet nevertheless trusteth upon my word, but not to tell me as yet anything. Howbeit, if you will that I shall avow[6] him, I will know all of him; but I shall never be willing[7] to beguile one who putteth his trust in me. Nevertheless, you may do all.[8] And do not esteem me the less therefore, for you are the cause thereof; for, for my own revenge, I would not do it.

He giveth me certain charges[9] (and those strong) of that that I fear: even to say that his faults be published, but there be that commit some secret faults and fear not to have them spoken of so loudly, and that there is speech of great and small. And even touching the Lady Reres,[1] he said, "God grant that she serve you to your honor," and that men may not think, nor he neither, that mine own power was not in myself,[2] seeing I did refuse his offers. To conclude, for a surety he mistrusteth us of that that you know,[3] and for his life. But in the end, after I had spoken two or three good words to him, he was very merry and glad. I have not seen him this night, for ending[4] your bracelet; but I can find no clasps for it. It is ready thereunto,[5] and yet I fear lest it should bring you ill hap, or that it should be known if you were hurt.[6] Send me word whether you will have it, and more money,[7] and when I shall return, and how far I may speak. * * *

He hath sent to me, and prayeth me to see him rise tomorrow in the morning early. To be short, this bearer shall declare unto you the rest; and if I shall learn anything, I will make every night a memorial[8] thereof. He shall tell you the cause of my stay.[9] Burn this letter, for it is too dangerous; neither is there anything well said in it, for I think upon nothing but upon grief if you be at Edinburgh.[1]

Now if to please you, my dear life, I spare neither honor, conscience, nor hazard, nor greatness, take it in good part, and not according to the interpretation of your false brother-in-law,[2] to whom I pray you give no credit against the most faithful lover that ever you had, or shall have.

[9] Small(er). "This bearer": the bearer of the letter.

[1] I.e., Darnley.

[2] Submit.

Medicine (i.e., a poisoned draft). "Invention": contrivance. If Man' wrote this sentence, it shows her complicit in the plot to murder Darnley (who was in fact strangled—and the house he was occupying at Kirk O'Field, just outside Edinburgh, blown up—on the night of February 9—10, 1 567).

[4] For a.

[5] As far as.

[6] Assure him by taking a vow. "Howbeit": however.

[7] I.e., without reluctance.

[8] I.e., you may command me in all things.

[9] Admonitions: the idea seems to be that Darnley hinted that he might reveal Mary's secrets.

[1] Who was acting as wet-nurse to Mary's son James (later James VI of Scotland and, in 1603, James 1 of England).

[2] I.e., that I was not acting of my own will.

[3] The thing that you know about. "For a surety": for certain.

[4] Because 1 was finishing.

[5] Apart from that.

[6] Recognized if you were wounded (and thus powerless to conceal the bracelet). "Ill hap ": misfortune.

[7] I.e., whether you want more money.

[9] Delay.

[1] The Scottish translation makes this clause the beginning of a new sentence, which says, in effect, "If you are in Edinburgh when you receive this, send me word soon."

See not also her whose feigned tears you ought not more to regard than the true travails which I endure to deserve her place, for obtaining of which, against my own nature I do betray those that could let[3] me. God forgive me, and give you, my only friend,[4] the good luck and prosperity that your humble and faithful lover doth wish unto you: who hopeth shortly to be another thing unto you, for the reward of my pains. I have not made[5] one word, and it is very late, although I should never be weary in writing to you, yet will I end, after kissing of your hands. Excuse my evil[6] writing, and read it over twice. Excuse also that [I scribbled,][7] for I had yesternight no paper, when I took the paper of a memorial.[8] . . . Remember your friend, and write unto her, and often. Love me al[ways, as I shall do you].[9]

A Letter to Elizabeth I, May 17, 1568[1]

Madam my good sister,[2] I believe you are not ignorant how long certain of my subjects, whom from the least of my kingdom I have raised to be the first, have taken upon themselves to involve me in trouble, and to do what it appears they had in view from the first. You know how they purposed to seize me and the late king my husband, from which attempt it pleased God to protect us, and to permit us to expel them from the country, where, at your request, I again afterwards received them; though, on their return, they committed another crime, that of holding me a prisoner, and killing in my presence a servant of mine, I being at the time in a state of pregnancy.[3] It again pleased God that I should save myself from their hands; and, as above said, I not only pardoned them, but even received them into favor. They, however, not yet satisfied with so many acts of kindness, have, on the contrary, in spite of their promises, devised, favored, subscribed to, and aided in a crime[4] for the purpose of charging it falsely upon me, as I hope fully to make you understand. They have, under this pretence, arrayed themselves against me, accusing me of being ill-advised, and pretending a desire of seeing me delivered from bad counsels, in order to point out to me the things that required reformation. I, feeling myself innocent, and desirous to avoid the shedding of blood, placed myself in their hands, wishing to reform what was amiss.[5] They immediately seized and imprisoned me. When I upbraided them with a breach of their promise, and requested to be informed why I was thus treated, they all absented themselves. I demanded to be heard in council, which was refused me. In short, they have kept me without any servants, except two women, a cook, and a surgeon; and they have threatened to kill me, if I did not sign an abdication of my crown, which the fear of immediate death caused me to do,[6] as I have since proved before the whole of the nobility, of which I hope to afford you evidence.

[2] Presumably the brother of Bothvvell's wife, Jean Gordon—who is presumably the person referred to in the following sentence.

[3] Prevent.

[4] Lover.

[5] Possibly "reade"—in which case the meaning is "I have not read over a word."

[6] Poor.

[8] She apologizes for having had to use paper already used for memoranda.

[9] Again words torn from the English manuscript are inferred from the Scottish translation. The latter continues with what seem to be the memoranda—to herself or perhaps to the bearer of the letter—mentioned above: "Remember zow [you] of the purpois of the Lady Reres. Of the Inglismen. Of his mother. Of the Erie of Argyle. Of the Erie Bothwell. Of the ludgeing [lodging] in Edinburgh."

[1] This letter (translated from the French by Agnes Strickland) was written just after Mary, in flight from her Scottish enemies, made her fateful crossing into England. Its account of her troubles is, though not exaggerated, inevitably one-sided. In 1565, Mary's ill-advised marriage to her cousin Lord Darnley had upset the power structure of the nation's factious and violent nobility. A group of nobles rebelled against her, led by Mary's illegitimate half-brother James Stewart, earl of Moray, who had previously been her key supporter and adviser.

[3] The servant was David Rizzio, Mary's secretary and confidant. At the time of his murder, Mary was six months pregnant with her only child, the future King James VI. She omits the fact that Darnley was involved in the murder.

[4] The murder of Darnley.

After this, they again laid hold of me in parliament, without saying why, and without hearing me; forbidding, at the same time, every advocate to plead for me; and, compelling the rest to acquiesce in their unjust usurpation of my rights, they have robbed me of everything I had in the world, not permitting me either to write or to speak, in order that I might not contradict their false inventions.

At last, it pleased God to deliver me,[7] when they thought of putting me to death, that they might make more sure of their power, though I repeatedly offered to answer any thing they had to say to me, and to join them in the punishment of those who should be guilty of any crime. In short, it pleased God to deliver me, to the great content of all my subjects, except Moray, Morton, the Humes, Glencairn, Mar, and Sempill, to whom, after that my whole nobility was come from all parts, I sent to say that, notwithstanding their ingratitude and unjust cruelty employed against me, I was willing to invite them to return to their duty, and to offer them security of their lives and estates, and to hold a parliament for the purpose of reforming every thing. I sent twice. They seized and imprisoned my messengers, and made proclamation, declaring traitors all those who should assist me, and guilty of that odious crime. I demanded that they should name one of them, and I would give him up, and begged them, at the same time, to deliver to me such as should be named to them. They seized upon my officer and my proclamation. I sent to demand a safe-conduct for my Lord Boyd, in order to treat of an accommodation, not wishing, as far as I might be concerned, for any effusion of blood. They refused, saying that those who had not been true to their regent and to my son, whom they denominate king, should leave me and put themselves at their disposal, a thing at which the whole nobility were greatly offended.

Seeing, therefore, that they were only a few individuals, and that my nobility were more attached to me than ever, I was in hope that, in course of time, and under your favor, they would be gradually reduced; and, seeing that they said they would either retake me or all die, I proceeded toward Dumbarton,[8] passing at the distance of two miles from them, my nobility accompanying me, marching in order of battle between them and me; which they seeing, sallied forth, and came to cut off my way and take me. My people seeing this, and moved by that extreme malice of my enemies, with a view to check their progress, encountered them without order, so that, though they were twice their number, their sudden advance caused them so great a disadvantage that God permitted them to be discomfited, and several killed and taken; some of them were cruelly put to death when taken on their retreat. The pursuit was immediately interrupted, in order to take me on my way to Dumbarton; they stationed people in every direction, either to kill or take me. But God through his infinite goodness has preserved me, and I escaped to my Lord Herries',[9] who, as well as other gentlemen, have come with me into your country,[1] being assured that, hearing the cruelty of my enemies, and how they have treated me, you will, conformably to your kind disposition and the confidence I have in you, not only receive me for the safety of my life but also aid and assist me in my just quarrel; and I shall solicit other princes to do the same. I entreat you to send to fetch me as soon as you possibly can,[2] for I am in a pitiable condition, not only for a queen, but for a gentlewoman; for I have nothing in the world, but what I had on my person when I made my escape, travelling across the country the first day, and not having since ever ventured to proceed except in the night, as I hope to declare before you, if it pleases you to have pity, as I trust you will, upon my extreme misfortune; of which I will forbear complaining, in order not to importune you, and pray to God that he may give to you a happy state of health and long life, and to me patience, and that consolation which I expect to receive from you, to whom I present my humble commendations. From Workington, the 17th of May.

[5] Unhappy about the elevation of Bothwell to the position of Mary's consort (she had married him three months after Darnley's murder, in which he was well known to have been the principal conspirator), the nobles brought an army against the royal couple in June 1567. With their own forces melting away, Bothwell escaped, and Mary surrendered herself to the nobles.

[6] In late July. Her infant son was then crowned king on July 29, in a Protestant church. Moray became regent.

[7] Mary escaped from captivity on May 2, 1568.

[8] In the west of Scotland. The royal army passed near Glasgow, in a deliberate attempt to draw Moray's army, which was smaller, into battle.

From Narrative of the Execution of the Queen of Scots. In a Letter to the Right Honorable Sir William Cecil.[1]

It may please your lordship to be advertised[2] that, according as your honor gave me in command, I have here set down in writing the true order and manner of the execution of the Lady Mary, late queen of Scots, the 8th of February last, in the great hall within the castle of Fotheringhay,[3] together with relation of all such speeches and actions spoken and done by the said queen or any others, and all other circumstances and proceedings concerning the same, from and after the delivery of the said Scottish queen to Thomas Andrews, Esquire, high sheriff for Her Majesty's county of Northampton, unto the end of the said execution: as followeth.

It being certified the 6th of February last to the said queen, by the right honorable the earl of Kent, the earl of Shrewsbury, and also by Sir Amyas Paulet and Sir Drue Drury, her governors,[4] that she was to prepare herself to die the 8th of February next, she seemed not be in any terror, for aught that appeared by any her outward gesture or behavior (other than marvelling she should die), but rather with smiling cheer and pleasing countenance digested and accepted the said admonition of preparation to her (as she said) unexpected execution, saying that her death should be welcome unto her, seeing Her Majesty was so resolved, and that that soul were too too far unworthy the fruition of joys of heaven forever, whose body would not in this world be content to endure the stroke of the executioner for a moment. And that spoken, she wept bitterly and became silent.

[9] Herries was a magnate of southwestern Scotland, which remained strongly Catholic.

[1] Crossing the Solway Firth in a fishing boat, Mary and twenty supporters landed in the Cumberland port of Workington on May 16, 1568.

[2] Elizabeth never granted Mary an audience; two days after arriving in England, she was conducted to Carlisle Castle, where her nineteen years of English captivity began.

[3] A royal signature: "R." = "Regina" (Latin for "Queen").

[1] Elizabeth's lord high treasurer and principal minister. The author of the letter (of which there are various extant versions) was Robert Wingfield, Cecil's nephew, sent by him to report on the execution.

[2] Informed.

[3] In Northamptonshire. Mary had been moved to Fotheringhay in September 1586 and was there tried and convicted of treason against Elizabeth (though she was not Elizabeth's subject).

The said 8th day of February being come, and time and place appointed for the execution, the said queen, being of stature tall, of body corpulent, round-shouldered, her face fat and broad, double-chinned, and hazel-eyed, her borrowed hair auburn, her attire was this. On her head she had a dressing of lawn edged with bone lace,[5] a pomander chain[6] and an Angus Dei about her neck,[7] a crucifix in her hand, a pair of beads at her girdle,[8] with a silver cross at the end of them. A veil of lawn fastened to her caul,[9] bowed out with wire and edged round about with bone lace. Her gown was of black satin painted, with a train and long sleeves to the ground, set with acorn buttons of jet trimmed with pearl, and short sleeves of satin black Cut,[1] with a pair of sleeves of purple velvet whole under them. Her kirtle[2] whole, of figured black satin, and her petticoat skirts of crimson velvet, her shoes of Spanish leather with the rough side outward, a pair of green silk garters, her nether stockings[3] worsted colored watchet,[4] clocked[5] with silver, and edged on the tops with silver, and next her leg a pair of jersey[6] hose, white, etc. Thus apparelled, she departed her chamber, and willingly bended her steps towards the place of execution.

As the commissioners and divers other knights were meeting the queen coming forth, one of her servants, called Melvin,[7] kneeling on his knees to his queen and mistress, wringing his hands and shedding tears, used these words unto her: "Ah, Madam, unhappy me: what man on earth was ever before the messenger of so important sorrow and heaviness as I shall be, when I report that my good and gracious queen and mistress is beheaded in England?" This said, tears prevented him of further speaking. Whereupon the said queen, pouring forth her dying tears, thus answered him: "My good servant, cease to lament, for thou hast cause rather to joy than to mourn. For now shalt thou see Mary Stuart's troubles receive their long-expected end and determination. For know (said she), good servant, all the world is but vanity, and subject still to more sorrow than a whole ocean of tears can bewail. But I pray thee (said she), carry this message from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and like a true queen of Scotland and France. But God forgive them (said she) that have long desired my end and thirsted for my blood, as the hart doth for the water brooks. Oh God (said she), thou that art the author of truth, and truth itself, knowest the inward chamber of my thought, how that I was ever willing that England and Scotland should be united together. Well (said she), commend me to my son, and tell him that I have not done anything prejudicial to the state and kingdom of Scotland"; and so resolving[8] herself again into tears, said, "Good Melvin, farewell"; and with weeping eyes and her cheeks all besprinkled with tears as they were, kissed him, saying once again, "Farewell, good Melvin, and pray for thy mistress and queen."

[4] Keepers. The earls of Kent and Shrewsbury were sent by the royal council to oversee the execution. Paulet had been Mary's principal custodian since January 1585; Drury joined him in his charge in November 1586.

[6] Pomander is a mixture of aromatic substances; a small bag of it was sometimes suspended from a necklace.

[8] Belt. "Beads": rosary beads.

[7] Sir Andrew Melville.

And then she turned herself unto the lords, and told them she had certain requests to make unto them. One was, for certain money to be paid to Curie, her servant. Sir Amyas Paulet, knowing of that money, answered to this effect, "it should." Next, that her poor servants might have that with quietness[9] which she had given them by her will, and that they might be favorably entreated,[1] and to send them safely into their countries. "To this (said she) I conjure[2] you." Last, that it would please the lords to permit her poor distressed servants to be present about her at her death, that their eyes and hearts may see and witness how patiently their queen and mistress would endure her execution, and so make relation, when they came into their country, that she died a true constant Catholic to her religion. Then the earl of Kent did answer thus: "Madam, that which you have desired cannot conveniently be granted. For if it should, it were to be feared lest some of them, with speeches or other behavior, would both be grievous to Your Grace and troublesome and unpleasing to us and our company, whereof we have had some experience. For if such an access might be allowed, they would not stick to put some superstitious trumpery in practice, and if it were but dipping their handkerchiefs in Your Grace's blood, whereof it were very unmeet[3] for us to give allowance."

"My lord," said the queen of Scots, "I will give my word, although it be but dead, that they shall not deserve any blame in any the actions you have named. But alas, poor souls, it would do them good to bid their mistress farewell; and I hope your mistress" (meaning the queen), "being a maiden queen, will vouchsafe in regard of[4] womanhood that I shall have some of my own people about me at my death: and I know Her Majesty hath not given you any such strait[5] charge or commission but that you might grant me a request of far greater courtesy than this is, if I were a woman of far meaner calling[6] than the queen of Scots." And then, perceiving that she could not obtain her request without some difficulty, burst out into tears, saying, "I am cousin to your queen, and descended from the blood royal of Henry the Seventh, and a married queen of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland." Then, upon great consultation had betwixt the two earls and the others in commission, it was granted to her what she instantly[7] before earnestly entreated, and desired her to make choice of six of her best-beloved men and women. Then of her men she chose Melvin, her apothecary, her surgeon, and one old man more;[8] and of her women, those two which did lie in her chamber. Then, with an unappalled countenance, without any terror of the place, the persons, or the preparations, she came out of the entry into the hall, stepped up to the scaffold, being two foot high and twelve foot broad, with rails round about, hanged and covered with black, with a low stool, long fair cushion, and a block covered also with black. The stool brought her, she sat down. The earl of Kent stood on the right hand, the earl of Shrewsbury on the other, other knights and gentlemen stood about the rails. The commission for her execution was read (after silence made) by Mr. Beale, clerk of the council;[9] which done, the people with a loud voice said, "God save the Queen!" During the reading of this commission, the said queen was very silent, listening unto it with so careless a regard as if it had not concerned her at all, nay, rather with so merry and cheerful a countenance as if it had been a pardon from Her Majesty for her life; and withal[1] used such a strangeness in her words as if she had not known any of the assembly, nor had been anything seen[2] in the English tongue.

Then Mr. Doctor Fletcher, dean of Peterborough,[3] standing directly before her without[4] the rails, bending his body with great reverence, uttered the exhortation following:

"Madam, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty (whom God preserve long to reign over us), having (notwithstanding this preparation for the execution of justice justly to be done upon you for your many trespasses against her sacred person, state, and government) a tender care over your soul, which presently departing out of your body must either be separated in the true faith in Christ or perish forever, doth for Jesus Christ offer unto you the comfortable[5] promises of God, wherein I beseech Your Grace, even in the bowels of Jesus Christ,[6] to consider these three things:

"First, your state past, and transitory glory;

"Secondly, your condition present, of death;

"Thirdly, your estate to come, either in everlasting happiness or perpetual infelicity.

"For the first, let me speak to Your Grace with David the King: Forget, Madam, yourself, and your own people, and your father's house; forget your natural birth, your regal and princely dignity: so shall the King of Kings have pleasure in your spiritual beauty, etc.[7]

"Madam, even now, Madam, doth God Almighty open you a door into a heavenly kingdom; shut not therefore this passage by the hardening of your heart, and grieve not the Spirit of God, which may seal your hope to a day of redemption."

The queen three or four times said unto him, "Mr. Dean, trouble not yourself nor me: for know that I am settled in the ancient Catholic and Roman religion, and in defense thereof, by God's grace, I mind to spend my blood."

Then said Mr. Dean, "Madam, change your opinion, and repent you of your former wickedness. Settle your faith only upon this ground, that in Christ Jesus you hope to be saved." She answered again and again, with great earnestness, "Good Mr. Dean, trouble yourself not anymore about this matter, for I was born in this religion, have lived in this religion, and am resolved to die in this religion."

Then the earls, when they saw how far uncomfortable[8] she was to hear Mr. Dean's good exhortation, said, "Madam, we will pray for Your Grace with Mr.

"My lords," answered the queen, "if you will pray with me, I will even from my heart thank you, and think myself greatly favored by you; but to join in prayer with you in your manner, who are not of one[9] religion with me, it were a sin, and I will not."

Then the lords called Mr. Dean again, and bade him say on, or what he thought good else. The dean kneeled and prayed. * *

All the assembly, save the queen and her servants, said the prayer after Mr. Dean as he spake it, during which prayer the queen sat upon her stool, having her Agnus Dei, crucifix, beads, and an office[2] in Latin. Thus furnished with superstitious trumpery, not regarding what Mr. Dean said, she began very fastly[3] with tears and a loud voice to pray in Latin, and in the midst of her prayers, with overmuch weeping and mourning, slipped off her stool, and kneeling presently said diverse other Latin prayers. Then she rose, and kneeled down again, praying in English for Christ's afflicted church, an end of her troubles, for her son, and for the Queen's Majesty, to God for forgiveness of the sins of them in this island: she forgave her enemies with all her heart, that had long sought her blood. This done, she desired all saints to make intercession for her to the Savior of the World, Jesus Christ. Then she began to kiss her crucifix and to cross herself, saying these words: "Even as thy arms, oh Jesu Christ, were spread here upon the cross, so receive me into the arms of mercy." Then the two executioners kneeled down unto her, desiring her to forgive them her death. She answered, "I forgive you with all my heart. For I hope this death shall give an end to all my troubles." They, with her two women helping, began to disrobe her, and then she laid the crucifix upon the stool. One of the executioners took from her neck the Agnus Dei, and she laid hold of it, saying she would give it to one of her women, and, withal, told the executioner that he should have money for it.[4] Then they took off her chain. She made herself unready[5] with a kind of gladness, and, smiling, putting on a pair of sleeves with her own hands, which the two executioners before had rudely[6] put off, and with such speed as if she had longed to be gone out of the world.

During the disrobing of this queen, she never altered her countenance, but smiling said she never had such grooms before to make her unready, nor ever did put off her clothes before such a company. At length, unattired and unapparelled to her petticoat and kirtle, the two women burst out into a great and pitiful shrieking, crying, and lamentation, crossed themselves, and prayed in Latin. The queen turned towards them: "Ne criez vous; j'ai promis pourvous";[7] and so crossed and kissed them, and bade them pray for her.

Then with a smiling countenance she turned to her menservants, Melvin and the rest, crossed them, bade them fare well, and pray for her to the last.

One of the women having a Corpus Christi cloth,[8] lapped[9] it up three-corner-wise and kissed it, and put it over the face of her queen, and pinned it fast upon the caul of her head. Then the two women departed. The queen kneeled down upon the cushion resolutely, and without any token of fear of death, said aloud in Latin the Psalm "In te, Domine, confido."[1] Then, groping for the block, she laid down her head, putting her chain over her back with both her hands, which, holding there still,[2] had been cut off, had they not been espied.

Then she laid herself upon the block most quietly, and stretching out her arms and legs cried out: "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum,"[3], three or four times.

At last, while one of the executioners held her straitly[4] with one of his hands, the other gave two strokes with an axe before he did cut off her head, and yet left a little gristle behind.

She made very small noise, no part stirred from the place where she lay. The executioners lifted up the head, and bade God save the Queen. Then her dressing of lawn fell from her head,[5] which appeared as gray as if she had been threescore and ten years old,[6] polled[7] very short. Her face much altered, her lips stirred up and down almost a quarter of an hour after her head was cut off. Then said Mr. Dean: "So perish all the Queen's enemies!" The earl of Kent came to the dead body, and with a loud voice said, "Such end happen to all the Queen's and Gospel's enemies." One of the executioners, plucking off her garters, espied her little dog, which was crept under her clothes, which would not be gotten forth but with force, and afterwards would not depart from the dead corpse, but came and laid between her head and shoulders: a thing much noted. The dog, imbrued in her blood, was carried away and washed, as all things else were that had any blood, save those things which were burned. The executioners were sent away with money for their fees, not having any one thing that belonged unto her. Afterwards everyone was commanded forth of the hall, saving[8] the sheriff and his men, who carried her up into a great chamber made ready for the surgeons to embalm her; and there she was embalmed.

And thus I hope (my very good lord) I have certifieth Your Honor of all actions, matters, and circumstances as did proceed from her or any other at her death: wherein I dare promise unto your good lordship (if not in some better or worse words than were spoken I am somewhat mistaken), in matter I have not in any whit offended.[9] Howbeit,[1] I will not so justify my duty herein but that[2] many things might well have been omitted, as not worthy noting. Yet because it is your lordship's fault to desire to know all, and so I have certified all, it is an offense pardonable. So, resting at Your Honor's further commandment, I take my leave this 11th of February, 1587.

Your Honor's in all humble service to command,
R. W.

ELIZABETH I

Elizabeth I (1533—1603), queen of England from 1558 to her death, set her mark indelibly on the age that has come to bear her name. Endowed with intelligence, courage, cunning, and a talent for self-display, she managed to survive and flourish in a world that would easily have crushed a weaker person. Her birth was a disappointment to her father, Henry VIII, who had hoped for a male heir to the throne, and her prospects were further dimmed when her mother, Anne Boleyn, was executed a few years later on charges of adultery and treason. At six years old, observers noted, Elizabeth had as much gravity as if she had been forty.

Under distinguished tutors, including the Protestant humanist Boger Ascham, the young princess received a rigorous education, with training in classical and modern languages, history, rhetoric, theology, and moral philosophy. Her own religious orientation was also Protestant, which put her in great danger during the reign of her Catholic older half-sister, Mary. Imprisoned in the Tower of London, interrogated and constantly spied upon, Elizabeth steadfastly professed innocence, loyalty, and a pious abhorrence of heresy. Upon Mary's death, she ascended the throne and quickly made clear that the official religion of the land would be Protestantism.

When she came to the throne at twenty-five, speculation about a suitable match, already widespread, intensified. It remained for decades at a fever pitch, for the stakes were high. If Elizabeth died childless, the Tudor line would come to an end. The nearest heir was her cousin Mary, Queen of Scots, a Catholic whose claim was supported by France and by the papacy, and whose penchant for sexual and political intrigue soon confirmed the worst fears of English Protestants. The obvious way to avert the nightmare was for Elizabeth to marry and produce an heir, and the pressure upon her to do so was intense.

More than the royal succession hinged on the question of the queen's marriage; Elizabeth's perceived eligibility was a vital factor in the complex machinations of international diplomacy. A dynastic marriage between the queen of England and a foreign ruler could forge an alliance sufficient to alter the balance of power in Europe. The English court hosted a steady stream of ambassadors from kings and princelings eager to win the hand of the royal maiden, and Elizabeth played her romantic part with exemplary skill, sighing and spinning the negotiations out for months and even years. Most probably, she never meant to marry any of her numerous foreign (and domestic) suitors. Such a decisive act would have meant the end of her independence, as well as the end of the marriage game by which she played one power off against another. One day she would seem to be on the verge of accepting a proposal; the next, she would vow never to forsake her virginity. "She is a princess," the French ambassador remarked, "who can act any part she pleases." Ultimately she refused all offers and declared repeatedly that she was wedded to her country.

In the face of deep skepticism about the ability of any woman to rule, Elizabeth strategically blended imperiousness with an elaborate cult of love. Quickly making it clear that she would not be a figurehead, she gathered around her an able group of advisers, but she held firmly to the reins of power, subtly manipulating factional disputes, conducting diplomacy, and negotiating with an often contentious Parliament. Her courtiers and advisers, on their knees, approached the queen, glittering in jewels and gorgeous gowns, and addressed her in extravagant terms that conjoined romantic passion and religious veneration. Artists and poets celebrated her in mythological guise—as Diana, the chaste goddess of the moon; Astraea, the goddess of justice; Gloriana, the queen of the fairies. Though she could suddenly veer, whenever she chose, toward bluntness and anger, Elizabeth herself often contrived to transform the language of politics into the language of love. "We all loved her," her godson John Harington wrote with a touch of irony, "for she said she loved us."

Throughout her life, Elizabeth took pride in her command of languages (she spoke fluent French and Italian and read Latin and Greek) and in her felicity of expression. Her own writing includes carefully crafted letters and speeches on several state occasions; a number of prayers; translations of selections from the Psalms, Petrarch, Seneca, and Horace; prose translations from Boethius, Plutarch, and the French Protestant Queen Margaret of Navarre; and a few original poems. The original poems known to be hers deal with actual events in her life. They show her to be an exceptionally agile, poised, and self-conscious writer, a gifted role-player fully in control of the rhetorical as well as political situation in which she found herself. The texts printed here, occasionally altered in light of variant versions, are from Elizabeth I: Collected Works, ed. Leah Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose (2000).*

Verses Written with a Diamond

In her imprisonment at Woodstock, these verses she wrote with her diamond in a glass window:[1]

Much suspected by[2] me,
Nothing proved can be.
Quod[3] Elizabeth the prisoner

1554-55 1563

From The Passage of Our Most Dread Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth through the City of London to Westminster on the Day before Her Coronation[1]

* * * Her grace, by holding up her hands and merry countenance to such as stood far off, and most tender and gentle language to those that stood nigh to her grace, did declare herself no less thankfully to receive her people's goodwill than they lovingly offered it unto her. To all that wished her grace well she gave hearty thanks, and to such as bade God save her grace she said again,[2] God save them all, and thanked them with all her heart. So that on either side there was nothing but gladness, nothing but prayer, nothing but comfort. The queen's majesty rejoiced marvelously to see it so exceedingly showed toward her grace which all good princes have ever desired: I mean, so earnest love of subjects, so evidently declared even to her grace's own person being carried in the midst of them. The people, again, were wonderfully ravished with welcoming answers and gestures of their princess, like to the which they had before tried at her first coming to the Tower from Hatfield.[3] This her grace's loving behavior, preconceived in the people's heads, upon these considerations was thoroughly confirmed, and indeed implanted a wonderful hope in them touching her worthy government in the rest of her reign. For in all her passage she did not only show her most gracious love toward the people in general, but also privately. If the baser personages had either offered her grace any flowers or such like as a signification of their goodwill, or moved to her any suit, she most gently, to the common rejoicing of all the lookers-on and private comfort of the party, stayed her chariot[4] and heard their requests. So that if a man should say well, he could not better term the City of London that time than a stage wherein was showed the wonderful spectacle of a noble-hearted princess toward her most loving people and the people's exceeding comfort in beholding so worthy a sovereign and hearing so princelike a voice.

[1] This is the heading given to the verses in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments. After the insurrection of January 1554 against Mary I, Elizabeth was imprisoned in the Tower of London. Extensive interrogation and investigation yielded no firm evidence of treason against her, but she was transferred to the royal manor at Woodstock in Oxfordshire, and held there in close custody for a year.

[2] About.

[3] Quoth, said.

[1] By Richard Mulcaster (ca. 1530-1611), who became a well-known authority on the education of children. Elizabeth had succeeded to the throne upon the death of Mary I on November 17, 1558, but her coronation did not take place until January 15, 1559. By long-established custom, the ceremonies began the day before the coronation itself, with the ruler being conducted across the city in procession from the Tower of London to Westminster. See the account of Mary's coronation procession, p. 665 above.

[2] I.e., said in reply.

Out at the windows and penthouses of every house did hang a number of rich and costly banners and streamers, till her grace came to the upper end of Cheap.[5] And there, by appointment, the right worshipful Master Ranulph Cholmley, recorder[6] of the City, presented to the queen's majesty a purse of crimson satin richly wrought with gold, wherein the City gave unto the queen's majesty a thousand marks[7] in gold, as Master Recorder did declare briefly unto the queen's majesty, whose words tended to this end: that the lord mayor, his brethren, and commonality of the City, to declare their gladness and goodwill towards the queen's majesty, did present her grace with that gold, desiring her grace to continue their good and gracious queen and not to esteem the value of the gift, but the mind of the givers. The queen's majesty with both her hands took the purse and answered to him again marvelous pithily, and so pithily that the standers-by, as they embraced entirely her gracious answer, so they marveled at the couching thereof, which was in words truly reported these:

> I thank my lord mayor, his brethren, and you all. And whereas your request is that I should continue your good lady and queen, be ye ensured that I will be as good unto you as ever queen was to her people. No will in me can lack, neither do I trust shall there lack any power. And persuade yourselves that for the safety and quietness of you all I will not spare, if need be, to spend my blood. God thank you all.

Which answer of so noble an hearted princess, if it moved a marvelous shout and rejoicing, it is nothing to be marveled at, since both the heartiness thereof was so wonderful, and the words so jointly[8] knit.

But because princes be set in their seat by God's appointing and therefore they must first and chiefly tender[9] the glory of Him from whom their glory issueth, it is to be noted in her grace that forsomuch as God hath so wonderfully placed her in the seat of government over this realm, she in all doings doth show herself most mindful of His goodness and mercy showed unto her. And amongst all other, two principal signs thereof were noted in this passage. First in the Tower, where her grace, before she entered her chariot, lifted up her eyes to heaven and said:

[8] Concordantly.

[9] Have regard to.

> O Lord, almighty and everlasting God, I give Thee most hearty thanks that Thou hast been so merciful unto me as to spare me to behold this joyful day. And I acknowledge that Thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me as Thou didst with Thy true and faithful servant Daniel, Thy prophet, whom Thou deliveredst out of the den from the cruelty of the greedy and raging lions.[1] Even so was I overwhelmed and only by Thee delivered. To Thee (therefore) only be thanks, honor, and praise forever, amen.

The second was the receiving of the Bible at the Little Conduit[2] in Cheap. For when her grace had learned that the Bible in English[3] should there be offered, she thanked the City therefore, promised the reading thereof most diligently, and incontinent[4] commanded that it should be brought. At the receipt whereof, how reverently did she with both her hands take it, kiss it, and lay it upop her breast, to the great comfort of the lookers-on! God will undoubtedly preserve so worthy a prince, which at His honor so reverently taketh her beginning. For this saying is true and written in the book of truth: he that first seeketh the kingdom of God shall have all other things cast unto him.[5]

Now, therefore, all English hearts and her natural people must needs praise God's mercy, which hath sent them so worthy a prince, and pray for her grace's long continuance amongst us.

Speech to the House of Commons, January 28, 1563[1]

Williams,[2]1 have heard by you the common request of my Commons, which I may well term (methinketh) the whole realm, because they give, as I have heard, in all these matters of Parliament their common consent to such as be here assembled. The weight and greatness of this matter might cause in me, being a woman wanting both wit[3] and memory, some fear to speak and bashfulness besides, a thing appropriate to my sex. But yet the princely seat and kingly throne wherein God (though unworthy) hath constituted me, maketh these two causes to seem little in mine eyes, though grievous perhaps to your ears, and boldeneth me to say somewhat in this matter, which I mean only to touch but not presently to answer. For this so great a demand needeth both great and grave advice. I read of a philosopher whose deeds upon this occasion I remember better than his name[4] who always when he was required to give answer in any hard question of school points would rehearse over his alphabet before he would proceed to any further answer therein, not for that he could not presently have answered, but have his wit the riper and better sharpened to answer the matter withal.[5] If he, a common man, but[6] in matters of school took such delay the better to show his eloquent tale, great cause may justly move me in this, so great a matter touching the benefits of this realm and the safety of you all, to defer mine answer till some other time, wherein I assure you the consideration of my own safety (although I thank you for the great care that you seem to have thereof) shall be little in comparison of that great regard that I mean to have of the safety and surety of you all. And although God of late seemed to touch me rather like one that He chastised than one that He punished, and though death possessed almost every joint of me,[7] so as I wished then that the feeble thread of life, which lasted (methought) all too long, might by Clotho's hand[8] have quietly been cut off, yet desired I not then life (as I have some witnesses here) so much for mine own safety, as for yours. For I know that in exchanging of this reign I should have enjoyed a better reign where residence is perpetual.

There needs no boding of my bane.[9] I know now as well as I did before that I am mortal. I know also that I must seek to discharge myself of that great burden that God hath laid upon me; for of them to whom much is committed, much is required.[1] Think not that I, that in other matters have had convenient[2] care of you all, will in this matter touching the safety of myself and you all be careless. For I know that this matter toucheth me much nearer than it doth you all, who if the worst happen can lose but your bodies. But if I take not that convenient care that it behoveth me to have therein, I hazard to lose both body and soul. And though I am determined in this so great and weighty a matter to defer mine answer till some other time because I will not in so deep a matter wade with so shallow a wit, yet have I thought good to use these few words, as well to show you that I am neither careless nor unmindful of your safety in this case, as I trust you likewise do not forget that by me you were delivered whilst you were hanging on the bough ready to fall into the mud—yea, to be drowned in the dung; neither[3] yet the promise which you have here made concerning your duties and due obedience, wherewith, I assure you, I mean to charge[4] you, as, further, to let you understand that I neither mislike any of your requests herein, nor the great care that you seem to have of the surety and safety of yourselves in this matter.

Lastly, because I will discharge[5] some restless heads in whose brains the needless hammers beat with vain judgment that I should mislike this their petition, I say that of the matter and sum thereof I like and allow very well. As to the circumstances, if any be, I mean upon further advice further to answer. And so I assure you all that though after my death you may have many stepdames, yet shall you never have any a more mother than I mean to be unto you all.

From A Speech to a Joint Delegation of Lords and Commons, November 5, 1566[1]

* * * Was I not born in the realm? Were my parents born in any foreign country? Is there any cause I should alienate myself from being careful over this country? Is not my kingdom here? Whom have I oppressed? Whom have I enriched to others' harm? What turmoil have I made in this commonwealth, that I should be suspected to have no regard to the same? How have I governed since my reign? I will be tried by envy itself.[2] I need not to use many words, for my deeds do try me.

Well, the matter whereof they[3] would have made their petition, as I am informed, consisteth in two points: in my marriage and in the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein my marriage was first placed as for manner[4] sake. I did send them answer by my Council I would marry, although of mine own disposition I was not inclined thereunto. But that was not accepted nor credited, although spoken by their prince. And yet I used so many words that I could say no more. And were it not now I had spoken those words, I would never speak them again. I will never break the word of a prince spoken in public place, for my honor[5] sake. And therefore I say again I will marry as soon as I can conveniently, if God take not him away with whom I mind to marry, or myself, or else some other great let[6] happen. I can say no more except[7] the party were present. And I hope to have children; otherwise I would never marry. A strange order of petitioners, that will make a request and cannot be otherwise ascertained[8] but by the prince's word, and yet will not believe it when it is spoken! But they, I think, that moveth the same will be as ready to mislike him with whom I shall marry as they are now to move it, and then it will appear they nothing meant it. I thought they would have been rather ready to have given me thanks than to have made any new request for the same. There hath been some that have, ere this, said unto me they never required more than that they might once hear me say I would marry. Well, there was never so great a treason but might be covered under as fair a pretense.

The second point was the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein was nothing said for my safety, but only for themselves. A strange thing that the foot should direct the head in so weighty a cause, which cause hath been so diligently weighed by us for that[9] it toucheth us more than them. I am sure there was not one of them that ever was a second person,[1] as I have been, and have tasted of the practices against my sister, who I would to God were alive again. I had great occasions to hearken to their motions,[2] of whom some of them are of the Common House. But when friends fall out truth doth appear, according to the old proverb, and were it not for my honor, their knavery should be known. There were occasions in me at that time: I stood in danger of my life, my sister was so incensed against me. I did differ from her in religion and I was sought for divers ways; and so shall never be my successor.

[1] The birth on June 19,1566, of a son—James—to Maty, Queen of Scots, imparted new urgency to the concern about Elizabeth's unmarried state. Mary was Elizabeth's second cousin and, in the absence of any child of Elizabeth's own, had a strong claim to be her heir; Mary's male child would have an even stronger one. On November 5, a delegation of sixty members of the Lords and Commons met with Elizabeth, to urge her to marry and also to establish formally the line of succession. After the meeting, a member of the delegation wrote down Elizabeth's impromptu response.

[2] I.e., envy itself could not fault my governance.

[3] Parliament, which had planned to submit a written petition to the queen.

[4] Manners'.

[5] Honor's.

[6] Hindrance. At the time, there were negotiations for a possible match with Archduke Charles of Austria.

[7] Unless.

[8] Assured.

[9] Because.

I have conferred before this time with those that are well learned and have asked their opinions touching the limitation of succession, who have been silent—not that by their silence after lawlike manner[3] they have seemed to assent to it, but that indeed they could not tell what to say, considering the great peril to the realm and most danger to myself. But now the matter must needs go trimly and pleasantly, when the bowl runneth all on the one side.[4] And alas, not one amongst them all would answer for us, but all their speeches was for the surety[5] of their county. They would have twelve or fourteen limited in succession, and the mo the better. And those shall be of such uprightness and so divine as in them shall be divinity itself. Kings were wont to honor philosophers, but if I had such[6] I would honor them as angels, that should have such piety in them that they would not seek where they are the second to be the first, and where the third to be the second, and so forth.

It is said I am no divine.[7] Indeed, I studied nothing else but divinity till I came to the crown, and then I gave myself to the study of that which was meet[8] for government, and am not ignorant of stories wherein appeareth what hath fallen out for ambition of kingdoms, as in Spain, Naples, Portingal,[9] and at home. And what cocking[1] hath been between the father and the son for the same! You would have a limitation of succession. Truly if reason did not subdue will in me, I would cause you to deal in it, so pleasant a thing it should be unto me. But I stay[2] it for your benefit; for if you should have liberty to treat of it, there be so many competitors—some kinsfolk, some servants, and some tenants; some would speak for their master, and some for their mistress, and every man for his friend—that it would be an occasion of a greater charge than a subsidy.[3] And if my will did not yield to reason, it should be that thing I would gladly desire, to see you deal in it.

Well, there hath been error—I say not errors, for there were too many in the proceeding in this matter. But we will not judge that these attempts were done of any hatred to our person, but even for lack of good foresight. I do not marvel though Domini Doctores[4] with you, my lords, did so use themselves therein, since after my brother's[5] death they openly preached and set forth

1. Next in line to the throne, as Elizabeth had been under her half-sister Mary I.
2. "To hearken to their motions": to pay heed to their doings.
3. "After lawlike manner": in accordance with the legal maxim (that silence gives consent).
4. A metaphorical extension of the preceding clause: in the game of bowls, the ball has a flat place: rolled unskillfully, it wobbles, bounces, and prematurely stops; rolled well ("all on the one side"), it runs smoothly.
5. Security.
6. 1^., such virtuous potential successors. "Mo": more.
7. Theologian.
8. Relevant to. Elizabeth's claim that before ascending the throne she studied nothing but theology is an exaggeration, but it is true that she had devoted much effort to the subject, as evidenced by her translations of several religious works.
9. Portugal. "Fallen out for": happened as a result of.

1. Cock-fighting: strife, contention.
2. Stop.
3. I.e., it would cost more than a tax. (Subsidies were tax levies granted to the sovereign to meet special expenses.)

that my sister and I were bastards.[6] Well, I wish not the death of any man, but only this I desire: that they which have been the practitioners herein may before their deaths repent the same and show some open confession of their faults, whereby the scabbed[7] sheep may be known from the whole. As for my own part, I care not for death, for all men are mortal; and though I be a woman, yet I have as good a courage answerable to my place as ever my father had. I am your anointed queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am indeed endued with such qualities that if I were turned out of the realm in my petticoat, I were able to live in any place of Christendom.

Madame:

My ears have been so deafened and my understanding so grieved and my heart so affrighted to hear the dreadful news of the abominable murder of your mad husband and my killed cousin[2] that I scarcely yet have the wits to write about it. And inasmuch as my nature compels me to take his death in the extreme, he being so close in blood, so it is that I will boldly tell you what I think of it. I cannot dissemble that I am more sorrowful for you than for him. O madame, I would not do the office of faithful cousin or affectionate friend if I studied rather to please your ears than employed myself in preserving your honor. However, I will not at all dissemble whgt most people are talking about: which is that you will look through your fingers at[3] the revenging of this deed, and that you do not take measures that touch those who have done as you wished, as if the thing had been entrusted in a way that the murderers felt assurance in doing it.[4] Among the thoughts in my heart I beseech you to want no such thought to stick at this point. Through all the dealings of the world I never was in such miserable haste to lodge and have in my heart such a miserable opinion of any prince as this would cause me do. Much less will I have such of her to whom I wish as much good as my heart is able to imagine or as you were able a short while ago to wish. However, I exhort you, I counsel you, and I beseech you to take this thing so much to heart that you will not fear to touch even him whom you have nearest to you[5] if the thing touches him, and that no persuasion will prevent you from making an example out of this to the world: that you are both a noble princess and a loyal wife. I do not write so vehemently out of doubt that I have, but out of the affection that I bear you in particular. For I am not ignorant that you have no wiser counselors than myself. Thus it is that, when I remember that our Lord had one Judas out of twelve, and I assure myself that there could be no one more loyal than myself, I offer you my affection in place of this prudence.

[7] Infected with scab (the skin disease also known as scabies).

[1] Written after news reached Elizabeth of the murder of Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, the arrogant and erratic Scottish nobleman whom Mary had ill-advisedly married in 1565.

[2] Darnley, like Mary, was Elizabeth's second cousin and a potential claimant to the throne of England.

[3] Wink at.

[4] Since Mary and Darnley had been estranged, there were immediately rumors that she had been complicit in his murder.

[5] Evidently an allusion to James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, whom Mary married (under much-disputed circumstances) three months after Damley's death, although Bothwell was known to have been one of the chief conspirators in the murder.

The doubt of future foes[1]

The doubt° of future foes exiles my present joy, fear
And wit° me warns to shun such snares as threatens mine annoy.[2] intelligence
For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb,[3]
Which should not be, if reason ruled or wisdom weaved the web.
But clouds of toys untried do cloak aspiring minds,
Which turns to rain of late repent, by course of changed winds.[4]
The top of hope supposed, the root of rue° shall be, regret
And fruitless all their grafted guile, as shortly you shall see.[5]
Their dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,

A Letter to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, February 10, 1586[1]

How contemptuously we conceive ourselves to have been used by you, you shall by this bearer[2] understand: whom we have expressly sent unto you to charge you withal. We could never have imagined (had we not seen it fall out[3] in experience) that a man raised up by ourself and extraordinarily favored by us, above any other subject of this land, would have in so contemptible a sort broken our commandment in a cause that so greatly toucheth us in honor. Whereof although you have showed yourself to make but little account in so most undutiful a sort, you may not therefore think that we have so little care of the reparation thereof as we mind to pass so great a wrong in silence unredressed. And therefore our express pleasure and commandment is that, all delays and excuses laid apart, you do presently upon the duty of your allegiance obey and fulfill whatsoever the bearer hereof shall direct you to do in our name.[4] Whereof fail you not, as you will answer the contrary at your uttermost peril.

[3] I.e., my own care, which he caused.

[1] Leicester (ca. 1532-1588) had been the queen's greatest favorite from the beginning of her reign, and was for a time her suitor and possibly lover. Sent to the Netherlands to assist the revolt of the Dutch Protestants against Spanish rule, however, he incurred her rage by accepting, without her permission, the offer of the Dutch to make him their absolute governor. They had been without a leader since the assassination of William of Orange in 1584, and had offered Elizabeth herself the sovereignty of the United Provinces (which she declined) the preceding summer.

[4] Heneage was instructed to direct Leicester to resign the governorship immediately. Though it was several months before Leicester did so, Elizabeth was by April already addressing him fondly again.

A Letter to Sir Amyas Paulet, August 1586[1]

Amyas, my most careful and faithful servant,

God reward thee treblefold in the double for thy most troublesome charge[2] so well discharged. If you knew, my Amyas, how kindly, besides dutifully, my careful[3] heart accepts your double labors and faithful actions, your wise orders and safe regards performed in so dangerous and crafty a charge, it would ease your troubles' travail and rejoice your heart. In which I charge you to carry this most nighest thought: that I cannot balance in any weight of my judgment the value that I prize you at. And suppose no treasure to countervail such a faith, and condemn me in that behalf which I never committed if I reward not such deserts. Yea, let me lack when I have most need if I acknowledge not such a merit with a reward non omnibus datum.[4]

But let your wicked mistress know how, with hearty sorrow, her vile deserts compels these orders; and bid her, from me, ask God forgiveness for her treacherous dealing towards the saver of her life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own.[5] And yet not content with so many forgivenesses, must fall again so horribly, far passing a woman's thought, much more a princess', instead of excusing, whereof not one can serve, it being so plainly confessed by the actors[6] of my guiltless death. Let repentance take place; and let not the fiend possess her so as her best part be lost, which I pray with hands lifted up to Him that may both save and spill,[7] with my loving adieu and prayer for thy long life.

Your most assured and loving sovereign in heart,
by good desert induced, Elizabeth Regina.

A Letter to King James VI of Scotland, February 14, 1587

My dear brother,[1]

I would you knew though not felt the extreme dolor that overwhelms my mind for that miserable accident,[2] which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have now sent this kinsman of mine,[3] whom ere now it hath pleased you to favor, to instruct you truly of that which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you that—as God and many more know—how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me that if I had bid aught I would have bid by it.[4] I am not so base minded that fear of any living creature or prince should make me afraid to do that[5] were just or, done, to deny the same. I am not of so base a lineage nor carry so vile a mind; but as not to disguise fits most a king, so will I never dissemble my actions but cause them show even as I meant them. Thus assuring yourself of me that, as I know this was deserved, yet if I had meant it I would never lay it on others' shoulders, no more will I not damnify[6] myself that thought it not. The circumstance it may please you to have of this bearer. And for your part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman nor a more dear friend than myself, nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your estate.[7] And who shall otherwise persuade you, judge them more partial to others than you. And thus in haste, I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long reign. The 14 of February, 1587.

[1] Paulet was the keeper of Mary, Queen of Scots. In 1586 a number of her supporters, led by Anthony Babington, plotted to murder Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. The plot was discovered, and the plotters were executed in September. Maty, who had been complicit with them, was placed under stricter confinement, and then tried for treason.

Elizabeth's letter to Paulet circulated widely in manuscript: to her contemporaries, it was evidently the single best-known of the queen's letters.

[2] I.e., the execution, six days before, of James's mother, Maty, Queen of Scots. In the aftermath of the Babington plot, Elizabeth decided to have Mary tried and convicted of treason—legally an outrageous charge, since she was not a subject of England. Mary was sentenced to death, and Elizabeth, after much vacillation, signed the warrant for her execution. Once the sentence had been carried out, however, the queen went to great lengths to exculpate herself, even in her own mind, from responsibility for her cousin's death.

Verse Exchange between Elizabeth and Sir Walter Ralegh[1]

[RALEGH TO ELIZABETH]

Fortune hath taken away my love,
My life's joy and my soul's heaven above.
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess,
My world's joy and my true fantasy's mistress.

Fortune hath taken thee away from me;
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joys, I only live to woe:
So is Fortune become my fantasy's foe.

In vain, my eyes, in vain ye waste your tears;
In vain, my sights,[2] the smoke of my despairs,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above.
In vain you search, for Fortune keeps my love.

Then will I leave my love in Fortune's hand;
Then will I leave my love in worldings' band,[3]
And only love the sorrows due to me—
Sorrow, henceforth, that shall my princess be—

[4] I.e., if I had commanded her death, I would have abided by my decision. ("Bid" is a form of the past participle of both "bid" and "bide.")

[5] Ce., the thing that.

[6] Wrong.

[7] Position.

[1] This exchange, which exemplifies the poetic banter that sometimes passed between the queen and her favorites, took place about 1587, when Ralegh believed that the rapid rise of the earl of Essex in Elizabeth's favor entailed a diminution of his own standing with her.

[2] Sighs?

[3] Bond.

And only joy that Fortune conquers kings.
Fortune, that rules the earth and earthly things,
Hath taken my love in spite of virtue's might:
So blind a goddess did never virtue right.

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Fortune seen,
Then had my love, my love forever been.
But love, farewell—though Fortune conquer thee,
No fortune base nor frail shall alter me.

[ELIZAJBETH TO RALEGH].

Ah, silly Pug,[4] wert thou so sore afraid?
Mourn not, my Wat,[5] nor be thou so dismayed.
It passeth fickle Fortune's power and skill
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
No Fortune base, thou sayest, shall alter thee?
And may so blind a witch so conquer me?
No, no, my Pug, though Fortune were not blind,
Assure thyself she could not rule my mind.
Fortune, I know, sometimes doth conquer kings,
And rules and reigns on earth and earthly things,
But never think Fortune can bear the sway
If virtue watch, and will her not obey.
Ne chose I thee by fickle Fortune's rede,[6]
Ne she shall force me alter with such speed
But if to try this mistress' jest with thee.[7]
Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow,
Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.[8]

Speech to the Troops at Tilbury[1]

My loving people, I have been persuaded by some that are careful of[2] my safety, to take heed how I committed myself to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery. But I tell you that I would not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear! I have so behaved myself that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and goodwill of my subjects. Wherefore I am come among you at this time but for my recreation and pleasure, being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live and die amongst you all,[3] to lay down for my God and for my kingdom and for my people mine honor and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman; but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too[4]—and take foul scorn that Parma[5] or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm. To the which, rather than any dishonor shall grow by me, I myself will venter[6] my royal blood; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of your virtue in the field. I know that already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns;[7] and I assure you in the word of a prince you shall not fail of them. In the meantime, my lieutenant general[8] shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject; not doubting but by your concord in the camp and valor in the field, and your obedience to myself and my general, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of my God and of my kingdom.

[4] An endearment, which Elizabeth used as her pet name for Ralegh.
[5] Short for Walter.
[6] Decision.
[7] Since "thee" has nothing to rhyme with, and since 'the line is hard to construe, it seems likely that there is a line missing before or after this one. "But if": unless I do it.
[8] Succeed.

[1] Delivered by Elizabeth on August 9, 1588, to the land forces assembled at Tilbury (in Essex) to repel the anticipated invasion of the Spanish Armada, a fleet of warships sent by Philip II. The Armada was defeated at sea and never reached England, a miraculous deliverance and sign of God's special favor to Elizabeth and to England, in the general view.

The "Golden Speech"

A speech to Elizabeth's last Parliament, delivered November 30, 1601, and here given as recorded by one of the members. The designation "Golden Speech" stems from the headnote to a version of the speech printed near the end of the Puritan interregnum (1659?): "This speech ought to be set in letters of gold, that as well the majesty, prudence, and virtue of this royal queen might in general most exquisitely appear, as also that her religious love and tender respect which she particularly and constantly did bear to her Parliament in unfeigned sincerity might (to the shame and perpetual disgrace and infamy of some of her successors) be nobly and truly vindicated."

The royal prerogatives included the right to grant or sell "letters patent," which gave the recipient monopoly control of some branch of commerce. (Sir Walter Ralegh, for example, was given the exclusive right, for a period of thirty years, to license all taverns.) Discontent with the monopolies—which had resulted in higher prices for a wide range of commodities, including such basic ones as salt and starch—came to a head in the Parliament of 1601. Under parliamentary pressure (and in return for a subsidy granted to her treasury), Elizabeth agreed to revoke some of the most obnoxious patents and to allow the courts to rule freely on charges brought against the holders of others. She invited members of Parliament who wished to offer thanks for this largess to come to her in a body, and on November 30 received about 150 of them at Whitehall palace. After effusive remarks by the speaker of the House of Commons (Sir John Croke), the queen responded more or less as recorded here. (Elizabeth revised the speech for publication; and none of the surviving versions of it—which differ considerably—was printed earlier than about 1628.)

[3] In another version of the speech (based, like this one, on an auditor's memory) the sentence up to this point reads: "And therefore I am come amongst you, as you see at this time, not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live or die amongst you all."

[4] An allusion to the concept of the king's (or queen's) two bodies, the one natural and mortal, the other an ideal and enduring political construct. "Stomach": valor.

[5] Alessandro Farnese, duke of Parma, allied with (the king of) Spain and expected to join with him in the invasion of England.

[6] Venture, risk.

[7] The crown was an English coin. "Forwardness": eagerness.

[8] The earl of Leicester led the English troops. Elizabeth's great and powerful favorite, he died just a month later.

The "Golden Speech"[1]

Mr. Speaker, we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our estate,[2] by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgment of such benefits as you have received; and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present.

I do assure you that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail[3] our loves. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I set before this jewel—I mean your loves. For I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count unvaluable.[4] And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown, that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still,[15] yet under God, hath delivered you, so I trust, by the almighty power of God, that I shall be His instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonor, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptable because it manifesteth the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait, fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster. My heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you bestow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, my own properties I account yours to be expended for your good, and your eyes shall see the bestowing of all for your good. Therefore render unto them from me, I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.[6]

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt[7] me that I have more cause to thank you all than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House[8] from me. For had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information.

Since I was queen yet did I never put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me, it was both good and beneficial to the subject in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, 1 am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at the first.[9] And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the Lower House whom these grievances never touched; and for them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries[1] and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly gratefully from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer[2] no diminution of our honor and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

[1] We print only the words of the queen, omitting various interpolations, as well as opening remarks by the speaker of the Parliament.

[2] Rank, position.

[4] Invaluable.

[5] Continually.

[6] Up to this point, the assemblage had been kneeling.

[7] Fear.

[8] The House of Commons.

[9] I.e., those members of the House of Commons who had raised the issue of monopolies in previous sessions.

For above all earthly treasures I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people and oppressions to be privileged under color of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer[3] it. Yea, when I heard it I could give no rest unto my thoughts until I had reformed it.[4] Shall they (think you) escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been respectless of their duty and regardless of our honor? No, no, Mr. Speaker, I assure you were it not more for conscience' sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets and low persons (not worthy the name of subjects) should not escape without condign punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savor; or when they give pills, do gild them all over.

I have ever used[5] to set the Last Judgment Day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged, to answer before a higher Judge. To whose judgment seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And now if my kingly bounties have been abused and my grants turned to the hurts of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps[6] and offenses to my charge. Who, though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would I not rather incur for your good than I would suffer them still to continue?

I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but that we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great Judge. To be a king and wear a crown is more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom (as I said) from peril, dishonor, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

Shall I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly[7] weakness? I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which yet never feared any foreign or home enemy. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear?[8] O, what can I do, that I should speak for any glory? God forbid!

1536-1605

A prolific translator, especially from Latin and French, Arthur Golding belonged to a wealthy, well-connected family in Essex and was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. Golding was an ardent Puritan; he translated seven works of Calvin into English. His most celebrated rendering, however, was of Ovid's Metamorphoses. The first complete English version of this poem to be published (four books in 1565, the full work in 1567), Golding's translation is in rhyming couplets of "fourteeners" (lines of fourteen syllables).

Ovid's vast poem, with its flood of erotic narratives about pagan gods and mortals caught up in ceaseless transformations (metamorphoses), is not an obvious subject for the sustained attention of a Puritan country gentleman. But in addition to powerful humanist interests that coexisted uneasily with religious commitments in many educated Elizabethans, there was a long medieval tradition of allegorical interpretation of the Metamorphoses, a tradition amply reflected in the six hundred lines of heavily moralizing commentary that Golding wrote as a dedicatory epistle to the earl of Leicester.

Golding's Ovid was one of Shakespeare's favorite books; although the playwright was able to read the Latin original, his references to the classic myths related by Ovid often reflect Golding's English version. Most Elizabethans would have been familiar with Ovid's description of the Golden Age, from whose ideal state humankind has declined to the evil Iron Age of the present. As Ralegh's description of Guiana and Amadas and Barlowe's description of Virginia attest, Europeans often interpreted the climate and cultures of the New World as a version of the Golden Age.

From Ovid's Metamorphoses[1]

[THE FOUR AGES]

Then sprang up first the golden age, which of itself maintained
The truth and right of everything unforced and unconstrained.
There was no fear of punishment, there was no threat'ning law
In brazen tables nailed up, to keep the folk in awe.
There was no man would crouch or creep to judge with cap in hand:
They lived safe without a judge, in every realm and land.
The lofty pine tree was not hewn from mountains where it stood,
In seeking strange and foreign lands, to rove upon the flood.° sea
Men knew none other countries yet than where themselves did keep;
There was no town enclosed yet, with walls and ditches deep.
No horn nor trumpet was in use, no sword nor helmet worn;
The world was such that soldiers' help might eas'ly be forborne.[2]
The fertile earth as yet was free, untouched of spade or plow,
And yet it yielded of itself of every things enow;° enough
And men themselves, contented well with plain and simple food
That on the earth of nature's gift without their travail° stood, labor
Did live by raspis, hips, and haws, by cornels,[3] plums, and cherries,
By sloes and apples, nuts and pears, and loathsome brambleberries,[4]
And by the acorns dropped on ground from Jove's broad tree[5] in field.
The springtime lasted all the year, and Zephyr[6] with his mild
And gentle blast did cherish things that grew of own accord;
The ground untilled all kind of fruits did plenteously afford.
No muck° nor tillage was bestowed on lean and barren land, manure
To make the corn° of better head and ranker° for to stand. grain / larger
Then streams ran milk, then streams ran wine, and yellow honey flowed
From each green tree whereon the rays of fiery Phoebus[7] glowed.
But when that into Limbo once Saturnus[8] being thrust,
The rule and charge of all the world was under Jove unjust,
And that the silver age came in, more somewhat base than gold
(More precious yet than freckled° brass), immediately the old mottled
And ancient Spring did Jove abridge, and made thereof, anon,° forthwith
Four seasons: Winter, Summer, Spring, and Autumn off and on.° alternately

EDMUND SPENSER
1552-1599

Edmund Spenser set out, consciously and deliberately, to become the great English poet of his age. In a culture in which most accomplished poetry was written by those who were, or at least professed to be, principally interested in something else—advancement at court, diplomacy, statecraft, or the church—Spenser's ambition was altogether remarkable, and it is still more remarkable that he succeeded in reaching his goal. Unlike such poets as Wyatt, Surrey, and Sidney, born to privilege and social distinction, Spenser was born to parents of modest means and station, in London, probably in 1552. He nonetheless received an impressive education, first at the Merchant Taylors' School, under its demanding humanist headmaster, Richard Mulcaster, then at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he was enrolled as a "sizar" or poor (meaning impoverished) scholar. At Cambridge, which harbored many Puritans, Spenser started as a poet by translating some poems for a volume of anti-Catholic propaganda. He also began his friendship with Gabriel Harvey, an eccentric Cambridge don, humanist, and pamphleteer. Their correspondence shows that they shared a passionate and patriotic interest in the reformation of English verse. In a 1580 letter to Harvey, Spenser demanded, "Why a God's name may not we, as else the Greeks, have the kingdom of our own language?"

After receiving the B.A. degree in 1573 and the M.A. in 1576, Spenser served as personal secretary and aide to several prominent men, including the earl of Leicester, the queen's principal favorite. During his employment in Leicester's household he came to know Sir Philip Sidney and his friend Sir Edward Dyer, courtiers who sought to promote a new English poetry. Spenser's contribution to the movement was The Shepheardes Calender, published in 1579 and dedicated to Sidney.

In The Shepheardes Calender Spenser used a deliberately archaic language, partly in homage to Chaucer, whose work he praised as a "well of English undefiled," and partly to achieve a rustic effect, in keeping with the feigned simplicity of pastoral poetry's shepherd singers. Sidney did not entirely approve, and another contemporary, Ben Jonson, growled that Spenser "writ no language." In the eighteenth century, Samuel Johnson described the language of The Shepheardes Calender as "studied barbarity." Johnson's characterization is, in a way, quite accurate, for Spenser was attempting to conjure up a native English style to which he could wed the classical mode of the pastoral. Moreover, since pastoral was traditionally viewed as the prelude in a great national poet's career to more ambitious undertakings, Spenser was also in effect announcing his extravagant ambition.

Spenser was a prolific and daring experimenter: the poems of The Shepheardes Calender use no fewer than thirteen different metrical schemes. In his later poems, he went on to make further innovations: the special rhyme scheme of the Spenserian sonnet; the remarkably beautiful adaptation of the Italian canzone forms for the Epithalamion and Prothalamion; and the nine-line or "Spenserian" stanza of The Faerie Queene, with its hexameter (six-stress) line at the end, are the best-known. Spenser is sometimes called the "poet's poet" because so many later English poets learned the art of versification from him. In the nineteenth century alone his influence may be seen in Shelley's Revolt of Islam, Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Keats's Eve of St. Agnes, and Tennyson's "The Lotos-Eaters."

The year after the publication of The Shepheardes Calender, Spenser went to Ireland as secretary and aide to Lord Grey of Wilton, lord deputy of Ireland. Although he tried continually to obtain appointments in England and to secure the patronage of the queen, he spent the rest of his career in Ireland, holding various minor government posts and hence participating actively in the English struggle against those who resisted colonial domination. The grim realities of that struggle—massacre, the burning of miserable hovels and of crops with the deliberate intention of starving the inhabitants, the forced relocation of whole communities, the manipulation of treason charges so as to facilitate the seizure of lands, the endless repetition of acts of military "justice" calculated to intimidate and break the spirit—may be glimpsed in distorted and on occasion direct form throughout Spenser's writings, along with dreamlike depictions of the beauty of the Irish landscape. Those writings include an anonymously published political tract, A View of the Present State of Ireland, which was unusual in its time both for its genuine fascination with Irish culture and for the ruthlessness of the policies it prescribed.

Spenser's attitudes toward Ireland and his conduct there raise difficult questions concerning the relationship between literature and colonialism. Are the harsh policies of the View echoed, allegorically, in The Faerie Queene? What does it mean to admire a poet who might, by modern standards, be judged a war criminal (as his master, Lord Grey, was judged to be, even by notoriously brutal Elizabethan standards)? Does Spenser use his Irish vantage point to launch daring criticisms of Queen Elizabeth and the English form of government? In addition to sharpening racial chauvinism, the experience of Ireland seems to have given English settlers a new perspective on events back home. As one of Spenser's contemporaries remarked, words that would be considered treasonous in England were common table talk among the Irish settlers.

Spenser was rewarded for his efforts in Ireland with a castle and 3,028 acres of expropriated land at Kilcolman in the province of Munster. There he was visited by another colonist and poet, the powerful and well-connected Sir Walter Ralegh, to whom Spenser showed the great chivalric epic on which he was at work. With Ralegh's influential backing, Spenser traveled to England and published, in 1590, the first three books of The Faerie Queene, which made a strong bid for the queen's favor and patronage. He was rewarded with a handsome pension of fifty pounds a year for life, though the queen's principal councilor, Lord Burghley, is said to have complained that it was a lot for a song. Soon after, Spenser published a volume of poems called Complaints; a pastoral called Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (1595), commenting on the courtiers and ladies at the center of English court life at the time of his 1590 visit; his sonnet cycle, Amoretti; and two wedding poems, Epithalamion and Prothalamion. The six-book Faerie Queene was published in 1596, with some revisions in the first part and a changed ending to Book 3 to provide a bridge to the added books; the two so-called Mutability Cantos and two stanzas of a third—perhaps part of an intended seventh book—appeared posthumously in the edition of 1609.

In 1598 there was an uprising in Munster, and rebels burned down the house in which Spenser lived. The poet fled with his wife; their newborn baby is said to have died in the flames. Spenser was sent to England with messages from the besieged English garrison. He died in Westminster on January 13, 1599, and was buried near his beloved Chaucer in what is now called the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Spenser cannot be put into neatly labeled categories. His work is steeped in Renaissance Neoplatonism but is also earthy and practical. He is a lover and celebrator of physical beauty yet also a profound analyst of good and evil in all their perplexing shapes and complexities. Strongly influenced by Puritanism in his early days, he remained a thoroughgoing Protestant all his life, and portrayed the Roman Catholic church as a demonic villain in The Faerie Queene; yet his understanding of faith and of sin owes much to Catholic thinkers. He is a poet of sensuous images yet also something of an iconoclast, deeply suspicious of the power of images (material and verbal) to turn into idols. He is an idealist, drawn to courtesy, gentleness, and exquisite moral refinement, yet also a celebrant of English nationalism, empire, and martial power. He is the author of the most memorable literary idealization of Elizabeth I, yet he fills his poem with coded criticisms of the queen. He is in some ways a backward-looking poet who paid homage to Chaucer, used archaic language, and compared his own age unfavorably with the feudal past. Yet as a British epic poet and poet-prophet, he points forward to the poetry of the Romantics and especially Milton—who himself paid homage to the "sage and serious" Spenser as "a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas."

Because it was a deliberate choice on Spenser's part that his language should seem antique, his poetry is always printed in the original spelling and punctuation; a few of the most confusing punctuation marks have, however, been altered in the present text. Spenser also spells words variably in such a way as to suggest rhymes to the eye or to suggest etymologies (often incorrect ones). This inconsistency in his spelling is typical of his time; in the sixteenth century people varied even the spelling of their own names.*

The Shepheardes Calender Pastoral poetry—with its odd idea of shepherds among their flocks piping on their flutes and singing beautiful songs of love, sadness, and complaint—was an influential classical form whose most famous practitioners were the Alexandrian poet Theocritus (third century B.C.E.) and the Roman poet Virgil (first century B.C.E.). The singers of the pastoral, or eclogue, were depicted as simple rustics who inhabited a world in which human beings and nature lived in harmony, but the form was always essentially urban, and Spenser, a Londoner, was self-consciously assuming a highly conventional literary role. That role enabled him at once to lay claim to the prestige of classical poetry and to insist upon his native Englishness, an insistence that is signaled by the deliberately archaic, pseudo-Chaucerian language. The rustic mask also allowed Spenser, in certain of the eclogues, to make sharply satirical comments on controversial religious and political issues of his day, such as Elizabeth's suppression of Puritan clergy in the Church of England, and to reflect on his own marginal position.

The twelve eclogues of The Shepheardes Calender are titled for the months of the year. Each is prefaced by an illustrative woodcut representing the characters and theme of the poem and picturing, in the clouds above, the sign of the zodiac for that month, and each is accompanied by a commentary ascribed to "E. K.," who also wrote an introductory epistle to the work as a whole. "E. K.," who has not been identified but must have been someone close to Spenser (or, in the opinion of some, Spenser himself), trumpets the arrival of a "new poet" whose skills are conspicuously displayed in the sequence of poems. "October" deals with the place of poetry and the responsibility of the poet in the world, an important theme throughout the Calender and in much of Spenser's work.

[3] When The Shepheardes Calender was published in 1579, each of the twelve eclogues was followed by a "Glosse," which contained explications of difficult or archaic words, together with learned discussions of—and disagreements with—Spenser's ideas, imagery, and poetics. These glosses by "E. K." are made to look authoritative, but in fact serve to complicate the process of interpretation. We have included several of the glosses, to give the reader some sense of them. The original spelling is retained.

[4] Tenth Eclogue. An eclogue ("aeglogue") is a short pastoral poem in the form of a dialogue or soliloquy. Spenser's spelling is based on a false etymology i(aix, "goat" + logos, "speech"), signifying, according to E. K., "Goteheards tales." For this eclogue, E. K. identifies as sources Theocritus's Idyl 16, which reproves the tyrant Hiero of Syracuse for his neglect of poets, and also Baptista Spagnuoli (1448-1516), called Mantuan (the fifth eclogue). The illustration portrays Cuddie (left) holding a pipe and crowned with a laurel wreath (emblems of a poet). He talks with his fellow shepherd, Piers, in a pastoral landscape, with the court in the background. The astrological sign for October, Scorpio, is at the top of the picture.

[5] E. K. queries "whether by Cuddie be specified the authour selfe, or some other," noting that in "August" he was introduced as singing a song "of Colins making. So that some doubt, that the persons be different." It may be that Cuddie and Piers present different aspects of Spenser the poet.

[6] Esteem.

[7] The English Poete is evidently a lost work by Spenser. "Enthousiasmos": inspiration. The Greek word originally meant "possessed by a god."

[7] E. K. compares these lines with The Laws 1, in which Plato declares "that the first invention of Poetry was of very vertuous intent."

[8] I.e., hypnotize them. E. K. cites Plato and Pythagoras for the theory that the mind is made of "a certaine harmonie and musicall nombers," and gives several examples of music's irresistible power over the emotions.

[9] In classical mythology, the three-headed dog Cerberus guards the entrance to Hades. But he let pass Orpheus, "of whom is sayd, that by his excellent skil in Musick and Poetry, he recovered his wife Eurydice from hell" [E. K.]; that is, from "Plutoes balefull bowre."

[1] E. K. recounts the myth of Argus of the hundred eyes, who, set by Juno to guard Io, Jupiter's current paramour, was lulled asleep by Mercury's music and then killed. Juno placed his eyes in the tail of her bird, the peacock, whose splendor elicits the praises even of "babes."

[2] "Unwounded in warre, doe rust through long peace" [E. K.].

[3] E. K. explains this "poeticall metaphore" as indicating the heroic subjects available to Cuddie if he wishes to "showe his skill in matter of more dignitie, then is the homely Aeglogue." These include "our most gratious soveraign, whom (as before) he calleth Elisa" and also the "noble and valiaunt men" who deserve his praise and have been his patrons.

[4] "He meaneth (as I guesse) the most honorable and renowmed the Erie of Leycester" [E. K.]. Leicester's device was the bear and ragged staff.

[5] "That is when thou chaungest thy verse from stately discourse, to matter of more pleasaunce and delight" [E. K.].

[6] "A kind of daunce" [E. K.].

[7] A "company of dauncers" [E. K.].

[8] Wel "knowen to be Virgile, who by Mecaenas means was brought into the favour of the Emperor Augustus, and by him moved to write in loftier kinde, then he erst had doen" [E. K.]. Maecenas ("Mecaenas") was Virgil's patron.

[9] "In these three verses are the three severall workes of Virgile intended. For in teaching his flocks to feede, is meant his Aeglogues. In labouring of lands, is hys Georgiques. In singing of wars and deadly dreade, is his divine Aeneis figured" [E. K.] The Georgics ("Georgiques") is Virgil's idealizing poem about farm life.

[2] "He sheweth the cause of contempt of Poetry to be idlenesse and basenesse of mynd" [E. K.].

[4] "An Ironicall Sarcasmus, spoken in derision of these rude wits, whych make more account of a ryming rybaud, then of skill grounded upon learning and judgment" [E. K.].

[5] "The meaner sort of men" [E. K.].

[6] Cuddie explains that the imperfect, patched wings ("peeced pyneons") of his own poetic powers are not in condition, but that it is proper for ("fittes") Colin to attempt ("scanne") such a high poetic flight.

[7] "It is sayd of the learned that the swan a little before hir death, singeth most pleasantly" [E. K.].

[7] The Latin line, of which Spenser gives the first three words, is from Ovid's Fasti 6.5: "There is a god within us; it is from his stirring that we feel warm." E. K. comments, "Hereby is meant, as also in the whole course of this Aeglogue, that Poetry is a divine instinct and unnatural rage passing the reache of comen reason."

The Faerie Queene In a letter to Sir Walter Ralegh, appended to the first, 1590, edition of The Faerie Queene, Spenser describes his exuberant, multifaceted poem as an allegory—an extended metaphor or "dark conceit"—and invites us to interpret the characters and adventures in the several books in terms of the particular virtues and vices they enact or come to embody. Thus the Redcrosse Knight in Book I is the knight of Holiness (and also St. George, the patron saint of England); Sir Guyon in Book 2 is the knight of Temperance; the female knight Britomart in Book 3 is the knight of Chastity (chastity here meaning chaste love leading to marriage). The heroes of Books 4, 5, and 6 represent Friendship, justice, and Courtesy. The poem's general end, Spenser writes, is "to fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle discipline," and the individual moral qualities, taken together, constitute the ideal human being.

However, Spenser's allegory is not as simple as the letter to Ralegh might suggest, and the fashioning of identity proves to be anything but straightforward. Far from being the static embodiments of abstract moral precepts, the knights have a surprisingly complex, altogether human relation to their allegorical identities, identities into which they grow only through painful trial and error in the course of their adventures. These adventures repeatedly take the form of mortal combat with sworn enemies—hence the Redcrosse Knight of Holiness smites the "Saracen" (that is, Muslim) Sansfoy (literally, "without faith")—but the enemies are revealed more often than not to be weirdly dissociated aspects of the knights themselves: when he encounters Sansfoy, Redcrosse has just been faithless to his lady Una, and his most dangerous enemy ultimately proves to be his own despair. Accordingly, the meaning of the various characters, episodes, and places is richly complex, revealed to us (and to the characters themselves) only by degrees.

The complexity is heightened by the inclusion, in addition to the moral allegory, of a historical allegory to which Spenser calls attention, in the letter to Ralegh, by observing that both the Faerie Queene and Belphoebe are personifications of Queen Elizabeth. (In fact, they are only two among many oblique representations of Queen Elizabeth in the poem, some of them far from complimentary.) Throughout the poem there is a dense network of allusions to events, issues, and particular persons in England and Ireland—for example, the queen, her rival Mary, Queen of Scots, the Spanish Armada, the English Reformation, the controversies over religious images, and the bitter colonial struggles against Irish rebellion. Some of Spenser's characters are identified by conventional symbols and attributes that would have been obvious to readers of his time. For example, they would know immediately that a woman who wears a miter and scarlet clothes and dwells near the river Tiber represents (in one sense at least) the Roman Catholic Church, which had often been identified by Protestant preachers with the Whore of Babylon in the Book of Revelation. Marginal notes jotted in early copies of The Faerie Queene suggest, however, that there was no consensus among Spenser's contemporaries about the precise historical referents of others of the poem's myriad figures. (Sir Walter Ralegh's wife BeSs, for example, seems to have identified many of the virtuous female characters as allegorical representations of herself.) Spenser's poem may be enjoyed as a fascinating story with multiple meanings, a story that works on several levels at once and continually eludes the full and definitive allegorical explanation it constantly piromises to deliver.

The poem is also an epic. In moving from The Shepheardes Calender to The Faerie Queene Spenser deliberately fashioned himself after the great Roman poet Virgil, who began his poetic career with pastoral poetry and moved on to his epic poem, the Aeneid. Spenser was acutely conscious that poets elsewhere in Europe, such as Ariosto and Tasso in Italy, and Camoens in Portugal, had already produced works modeled on Virgil's, in celebration of their respective nations. In weaving together classical and medieval sources, drawing on pictorial traditions, and adapting whole episodes from Ariosto and Tasso, he was providing his country with the epic it had hitherto lacked. Like Virgil, Spenser is deeply concerned with the dangerous struggles and painful renunciations required to achieve the highest values of human civilization. The heroic deeds of Spenser's brave knights are the achievements of individual aristocratic men and women, not the triumphs of armies or communities united in serving a common purpose, not even the triumph of the virtually invisible; royal court of Gloriana, the Faerie Oueene. Yet, taken together, the disjointed adventures of these solitary warriors constitute in Spenser's fervent vision the glory of Britain, the collective memory of its heroic past and the promise of a still more glorious future. And if the Faerie Queene herself is consigned to the margins of the poem that bears her name, she nonetheless is the symbolic embodiment of a shared national destiny, a destiny that reaches beyond mere political success to participate in the ultimate, millennial triumph of good over evil.

If The Faerie Queene is thus an epic celebration of Queen Elizabeth, the Protestant faith, and the English nation, it is also a chivalric romance, full of jousting knights and damsels in distress, dragons, witches, enchanted trees, wicked magicians, giants, dark caves, shining castles, and "payriims" (with French names). A clear, pleasant stream may be dangerous to drink from because to do so produces loss of strength. A pious hermit may prove to be a cunningly disguised villain. Houses, castles, and gardens are often places of education and challenge or of especially dense allegorical significance, as if they possess special, half-hidden keys to the meaning of the books in which they appear. As a romance, Spenser's poem is designed to produce wonder, to enthrall its readers with sprawling plots, marvelous adventures, heroic characters, ravishing descriptions, and esoteric mysteries.

In addition to enthralling readers, the poem habitually entraps, misleads, and deludes them. Like Spenser's protagonists, readers are constantly in danger of mistaking hypocritical evil for good, or cunningly disguised foulness for true beauty. The Faerie Queene demands vigilance from readers, and many passages must be reread in light of what follows after. In some sections, such as the dialogue between Redcrosse and Despair (Book I, canto 9), the repeated use of pronouns instead of proper names can lead to confusion as to who is speaking; the effect is intentional, for the promptings of evil are not always easy to disentangle from the voice of conscience.

The whole of The Faerie Queene is written in a remarkable nine-line stanza of closely interlocking rhymes (ababbcbec), the first eight lines with five stresses each (iambic pentameter) and the final line with six stresses (iambic hexameter or alexahdrine). The stanza gives the work a certain formal regularity, but the various books are composed on quite different structural principles. Book I is almost entirely self-contained; it has been called a miniature epic in itself, centering on the adventures of one principal hero, Redcrosse, who at length achieves the quest he undertakes at Una's behest: killing the dragon who has imprisoned her parents and thereby winning her as his bride. The spiritual allegory is similarly self-contained; it presents the Christian struggling heroically against many evils and temptations—doctrinal error, hypocrisy, the Seven Deadly Sins, and despair—to some of which he succumbs before finally emerging triumphant. It shows him separated from the one true faith and, aided by interventions of divine grace, at length reunited with it. Then it treats his purgation from sin, his education in the House of Holiness, and his final salvation. By contrast the structure of Book 3 is more romancelike, with its multiplicity of principal characters (who present, allegorically, several varieties of chaste and unchaste love), its interwoven stories, its heightened attention to women, and its conspicuous lack of closure.

To some degree a lack of closure characterizes all of The Faerie Queene, including the more self-contained of the six finished books, and it is fitting that there survives the fragment of another book, the cantos of Mutability, in which Spenser broods on the tension in nature between systematic order and ceaseless change. The poem as a whole is built around principles that pull tautly against one another: a commitment to a life of constant struggle and a profound longing for rest; a celebration of human heroism and a perception of ineradicable human sinfulness; a vision of evil as a terrifyingly potent force and a vision of evil as mere emptiness and filth; a faith in the supreme value of visionary art and a recurrent suspicion that art is dangerously allied to graven images and deception. That Spenser's knights never quite reach the havens they seek may reflect irresolvable tensions to which we owe much of the power and beauty of this great, unfinished work.

FROM THE FAERIE QUEENE

A Letter of the Authors[1]

EXPOUNDING HIS WHOLE INTENTION IN THE COURSE OF THIS WORKE: WHICH FOR THAT IT GIVETH GREAT LIGHT TO THE READEFT, FOR THE BETTER UNDERSTANDING IS HEREUNTO ANNEXED

To the Right noble, and Valorous, Sir Walter Raleigh knight, Lo. Wardein of the Stanneryes,[2] and her Majesties liefetenaunt of the County of Cornewayll

Sir knowing how doubtfully all Allegories may be construed, and this booke of mine, which I have entituled the Faery Queene, being a Continued Allegory, or darke conceit,[3] I have thought good as well for avoyding of gealous opinions and misconstructions, as also for your better light in reading thereof, (being so by you commanded,) to discover Unto you the general intention and meaning, which in the whole course thereof I have fashioned, without expressing of any particular purposes or by-accidents[4] therein occasioned. The generall end therefore of all the booke is to fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle[5] discipline: Which for that I conceived shoulde be most plausible and pleasing, being coloured with an historicall fiction, the which the most part of men delight to read, rather for variety of matter, then for profite of the ensample:[6] I chose the historye of King Arthure, as most fitte for the excellency of his person, being made famous by many mens former workes, and also furthest from the daunger of envy, and suspition of present time.[7] In which I have followed all the antique Poets historicall,[8] first Homere, who in the Persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hslth ensampled a good governour and a vertuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseis: then Virgil, whose like intention was to doe in the person of Aeneas: after him Ariosto comprised them both in his Orlando: and lately Tasso dissevered them againe, and formed both parts in two persons, namely that part which they in Philosophy call Ethice, or vertues of a private man, coloured in his Rinaldo: The other named Politice in his Godfredo.[9] By ensample of which excellente Poets, I labour to pourtraict in Arthure, before he was king, the image of a brave knight, perfected in the twelve private morall vertues, as Aristotle hath devised,[1] the which is the purpose of these first twelve bookes: which if I finde to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged, to frame the other part of polliticke vertues in his person, after that hee came to be king. To some I know this Methode will seeme displeasaunt, which had rather have good discipline[2] delivered plainly in way of precepts, or sermoned at large, as they use, then thus clowdily enwrapped in Allegoricall devises. But such, me seeme, should be satisfide with the use of these dayes, seeing all things accounted by their showes, and nothing esteemed of, that is not delightfull and pleasing to commune sence.[3] For this cause is Xenophon preferred before Plato, for that the one in the exquisite depth of his judgment, formed a Commune welth such as it should be, but the other in the person of Cyrus and the Persians fashioned a governement such as might best be:[4] So much more profitable and gratious is doctrine by ensample, then by rule. So have I laboured to doe in the person of Arthure: whome I conceive after his long education by Timon, to whom he was by Merlin delivered to be brought up, so soone as he was borne of the Lady Igrayne, to have seene in a dream or vision the Faery Queen, with whose excellent beauty ravished, he awaking resolved to seeke her out, and so being by Merlin armed, and by Timon throughly[5] instructed, he went to seeke her forth in Faerye land. In that Faery Queene I meane glory in my generall intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our soveraine the Oueene, and her kingdome in Faery land. And yet in some places els, I doe otherwise shadow[6] her. For considering she beareth two persons, the one of a most royall Queene or Empresse, the other of a most vertuous and beautifull Lady, this latter part in some places I doe express in Belphoebe, fashioning her name according to your owne excellent conceipt of Cynthia,[7] (Phoebe and Cynthia being both names of Diana.) So in the person of Prince Arthure I sette forth magnificence in particular, which vertue for that (according to Aristotle and the rest) it is the perfection of all the rest,[8] and conteineth in it them all, therefore in the whole course I mention the deedes of Arthure applyable to that vertue, which I write of in that booke. But of the xii. other vertues, I make xii. other knights the patrones, for the more variety of the history. Of which these three bookes contayn three, The first of the knight of the Redcrosse, in whome I expresse Holynes: The seconde of Sir Guyon, in whome I sette forth Temperaunce: The third of Britomartis a Lady knight, in whome I picture Chastity. But because the beginning of the whole worke seemeth abrupte and as depending upon other antecedents, it needs that ye know the occasion of these three knights severall adventures. For the Methode of a Poet historical is not such, as of an Historiographer.[9] For an Historiographer discourseth of affayres orderly as they were donne, accounting as well the times as the actions, but a Poet thrusteth into the middest, even where it most concerneth him, and there recoursing to the thinges forepaste,[1] and divining of thinges to come, maketh a pleasing Analysis of all. The beginning therefore of my history, if it were to be told by an Historiographer, should be the twelfth booke, which is the last, where I devise that the Faery Queene kept her Annuail feaste xii. dayes, uppon which xii. severall dayes, the occasions of the xii. severall adventures hapned, which being undertaken by xii. severall knights, are in these xii books severally handled and discoursed. The first was this. In the beginning of the feaste, there presented him selfe a tall clownishe[2] younge man, who falling before the Queen of Faeries desired a boone (as the manner then was) which during that feast she might not refuse: which was that hee might have the atchievement of any adventure, which during that feaste should happen; that being graunted, he rested him on the floore, unfitte through his rusticity for a better place. Soone after entred a faire Ladye in mourning weedes, riding on a white Asse, with a dwarfe behind her leading a warlike steed, that bore the Armes of a knight, and his speare in the dwarfes hand. Shee falling before the Queene of Faeries, complayned that her father and mother an ancient King and Queene, had bene by an huge dragon many years shut up in a brasen Castle* who thence sUffred them not to yssew:[3] and therefore besought the Faery Queene to assygne her some one of her knights to take on him that exployt. Presently that clownish person upstarting, desired that adventure: whereat the Queene much wondering, and the Lady much gainesaying, yet he earnestly importuned his desire. In the end the Lady told him that unlesse that armour which she brought, would serve him (that is the armour of a Christian man specified by Saint Paul v. Ephes.[4]) that he could not succeed in that enterprise, which being forthwith put upon him with dewe furnitures[5] thereunto, he seemed the goodliest man in al that company, and was well liked of the Lady. And eftesoones[6] taking on him knighthood, and mounting on that straunge Courser, he went forth with her on that adventure: where beginneth the first booke, vz.

[1] Though Aristotle distinguished between private and public virtues, he did not devise lists of twelve of each. Spenser was in fact relying on more modern philosophers—his friend Lodowick Bryskett and the Italian Piccolomini. That Spenser contemplated (as he proceeds to indicate) a poem four times as long as the six books we now have rather staggers the imagination.

The second day ther came in a Palmer[7] bearing an Infant with bloody hands, whose Parents he complained to have bene slayn by an Enchaunteresse called Acrasia: and therfore craved of the Faery Oueene, to appoint him some knight, to performe that adventure, which being assigned to Sir Guyon, he presently went forth with that same Palmer: which is the beginning of the second booke and the whole subject thereof. The third day there came in, a Groome who complained before the Faery Queene, that a vile Enchaunter called Busirane had in hand a most faire Lady called Amoretta, whom he kept in most grievous torment, because she would not yield him the pleasure of her body. Whereupon Sir Scudamour the lover of that Lady presently tooke on him that adventure. But being unable to performe it by reason of the hard Enchaunt-

And rushed forth, hurling her hideous taile
About her cursed head, whose folds displaid° extended

[7] "Needlesse" because the spear is used only on horseback. "By tract" (line 95): by following the track.

[8] The description echoes both classical and biblical monsters (cf. Revelation 9.7—10).

Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile.° coiling
She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle
Armed to point,° sought backe to turne againe; i.e., completely
For light she hated as the deadly bale,° injury
Ay wont° in desert darknesse to remain, ever accustomed.
Where plaine none might her see, nor she see any plaine.

Which when the valiant Elfe[9] perceived, he lept
As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,
And with his trenchand° blade her boldly kept cutting
From turning backe, and forced her to stay:
Therewith enraged she loudly gan to bray,
And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst,
Threatning her angry sting, him to dismay:° defeat
Who nought aghast, his mightie hand enhaunst:° lifted up
The stroke down from her head unto her shoulder glaunst

Much daunted with that dint,° her sence was dazd, blow
Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,
And all attonce her beastly body raizd
With doubled forces high above the ground:
Tho° wrapping up her wrethed sterne arownd, then
Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine° tail
All suddenly about his body wound,
That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:
God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint,
Cride out, "Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,
Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:
Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee."
That when he heard, in great perplexitie,[1]
His gall did grate[2] for griefe° and high disdaine, wrath
And knitting all his force got one hand free,
Wherewith he grypt her gorge° with so great paine, throat
That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw
A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,
Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,
Which stunck so vildly, that it forst him slacke
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:
Her vomit full of bookes and papers was,[3]
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,

[2] I.e., his gall bladder (considered the seat of anger) was violently disturbed.

And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
Her filthy parbreake° all the place defiled has.[4] vomit

As when old father Nilus gins to swell
With timely° pride above the Aegyptian vale, in season
His fattie° waves do fertile slime outwell, rich
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
But when his later spring gins to avale,° subside
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elswhere may no man reed.°

The same so sore annoyed has the knight,
That welnigh choked with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne can no longer fight.
Whose corage when the feend perceived to shrinke,
She poured forth out of her hellish sinke
Her fruitfull cursed spawne of serpents small,
Deformed monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,
Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
When ruddy Phoebus gins to welke° in west, sink
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,

All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish° hands their tender wings rustic
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings

Thus ill bestedd,° and fearful more of shame, situated
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolved in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;° cease
And strooke at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
He raft° her hatefull head without remorse; cut away
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushed from her corse

Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely° falling to the ground, with great force
Groning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
Gathred themselves about her body round,

[4] Revelation 16.13: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet."

Weening° their wonted entrance to have found thinking
At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flocked all about her bleeding wound,
And sucked up their dying mothers blood,
Making her death their life, and eke° her hurt their good. also

26

That detestable sight him much amazde,° stunned
To see th' unkindly Impes° of heaven accurst, unnatural offspring
Devoure their dam; on whom while so he gazd,
Having all satisfide their bloudy thurst,
Their bellies swolne he saw with fulnesse burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger° labour spend, longer
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst, from farre Approcht in hast to greet° his victorie, congratulate
And said, "Faire knight, borne under happy starre,
Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye;
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,°
Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And prooved your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may."

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,
And with the Lady backward sought to wend;°
That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,
Ne ever would to any by-way bend,
But still did follow one unto the end,
The which at last out of the wood them brought.
So forward on his way (with God to frend)° with God as friend
He passed forth, and new adventure sought;
Long way he traveled, before he heard of ought.° aught, anything

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
An aged Sire, in long blacke weedes yclad,[5]
His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie gray,
And by his belt his booke he hanging had;
Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,° grave
And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
Simple in shew,° and voyde of malice bad, show
And all the way he prayed, as he went,
And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

He faire the knight saluted, louting° low, bowing
Who faire him quited,° as that courteous was: answered

[5] Dressed in long black garments.

And after asked him, if he did know
Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.
"Ah my deare Sonne," quoth he, "how should, alas,
Silly^0 old man, that lives in hidden cell, simple
Bidding his beades^0 all day for his trespas, saying his prayers
Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?
With holy father sits not with such things to riiell.[6]

31

"But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evill ye desire to heare,
Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,
That wasteth all this countrey farre and neare."
"Of such," said he, "I chiefly do inquere,
And shall you well reward to shew the place,
In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare. spend
For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursed creature lives so long a space."

"Far hence," quoth he, "in wastfuIP wildernesse desolate
His dwelling is, by which no living wight^0 creature
May ever passe, but thorough^0 great distresse." through
"Now," sayd the Lady, "draweth toward night,
And well I wote, that of your later^0 fight recent
Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,
But wanting^0 rest will also want of might? lacking
The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth baite^0 his steedes the Ocean waves emong. feed, refresh

33

"Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,
And with new day new worke at once begin:
Untroubled night they say gives counsell best."
"Right well Sir knight ye have advised bin," Quoth then that aged man; "the way to win
Is wisely to advise:^{0} now day is spent; tafee thought
Therefore with me ye may take up your In^0 lodging
For this same night." The knight was well content.
So with that godly father to his home they went.

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale, hard by° a forests side, close to
Far from resort of people, that did pas
In travell to and froe: a little wyde° apan
There was an holy Chappell edifyde,^{0} built
Wherein the Hermite dewly wont^0 to say was accustomed
His holy things^0 each morne and eventyde: prayers
Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine welled forth alway.

[6] I.e., it is not fitting for a holy hermit to meddle ("mell") with such things.

35

Arrived there, the little house they fill,
  Ne looke for entertainement,° where none was: elegant provision
  Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;
  The noblest mind the best contentment has.
  With faire discourse the evening so they pas:
  For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,
  And well-could file° his tongue as smooth as glas; polish
  He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
He strowd an Ave-Maty[7] after and before.

The drouping Night thus creepeth on them fast,
  And the sad humour;° loading their eye liddes, heavy moisture
  As messenger of Morpheus[8] on them cast
  Sweet slombring deaw, the which to sleepe them biddes.
  Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:° leads
  Where when all drownd in deadly sleepe° he findes, sleep like death
  He to his study goes, and there amiddes
  His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

Then choosing out few wordes most horrible
  (Let none them read), thereof did verses frame,
  With which and other spelles like terrible,
  He bade awake blacke Plutoes griesly Dame,[9]
  And cursed heaven, and spake reprochfull shame
  Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
  A bold bad man, that dared to call by name
  Great Gorgon,[1] Prince of darknesse and dead night,
At which Cocytus quakes, and Styx is put to flight.

And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred
  Legions of Sprights,° the which like little flyes[2] spirits
  Fluttring about his ever damned hed,
  A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
  To aide his friends, or fray° his enimies: frighten
  Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
  And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
  The one of them he gave a message too,
The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

39

He making speedy way through spersed° ayre, dispersed
  And through the world of waters wide and deepe,

[8] Here (as often) Morpheus, the classical god of dreams, is conflated with his father Somnus, god of sleep.

[9] Proserpine, as patron of witchcraft.

[1] Demogorgon, in some myths the progenitor of all the gods, so powerful that the mention of his name causes hell's rivers (Styx and Cocytus) to tremble.

[2] The simile associates him with Beelzebub ("Lord of Flies"), the name given to "the prince of the devils."

To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
His dwelling is; there Tethys° his wet bed the wife of Ocean
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia[3] still° doth steepe continually
In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
Whiles sad° Night over him her mantle black doth spred. sober

Watching to banish Care their enimy,

By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
And unto Morpheus comes, whom drowned deepe

And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,° aloft, above
Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne sound
Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:° swoon

As still° are wont t'annoy the walled towne, always

The messenger approching to him spake,
But his wast° wordes returnd to him in vaine: wasted
So sound he slept, that nought mought° him awake. might
Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine,° effort

As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine[5]
Is tost with troubled sights and fancies° weake, fantasies
He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
And threatned unto him the dreaded name
Of Hecate:° whereat he gan to quake, queen of Hades
And lifting up his lumpish° head, with blame heavy
Halfe angry asked him, for what° he came. why
"Hither," quoth he, "me Archimago[6] sent,

[9] The three graces of classical mythology were personifications of grace and beauty; here they sing a call to the pleasures of the marriage bed (Hymen was god of marriage). In the March eclogue ad The Sheapheardes Calender, E. K. glossed Flora as "the Goddesse of fiowres, but indede (as saith Tacitus) a famous harlot."

"Love of your selfe," she said, "and deare° constraint dire

In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drowned quight."
Her doubtfull words made that redoubted[2] knight

Her fawning love with foule disdainefull spight
He would not shend,° but said, "Deare dame I rew, reject
That for my sake unknowne such griefe unto you grew.

Full envious that night so long his roome° did fill. place

When those accursed messengers of hell,
That feigning dreame, and that faire-forged Spright
Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
Their bootelesse° paines, and ill succeeding night: useless
Who all in rage to see his skilfull might

Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

Forthwith he runnes with feigned faithfull hast

All in amaze he suddenly up start

Returning to his bed in torment great,
And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,
He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
And wast his inward gall with deepe despight,° malice
Yrkesome° of life, and too long lingring night. tired
At last faire Hesperus[6] in highest skie

And after him she rode with so much speede
As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
Pricked with wrath and fiery fierce disdaine,° indignation
That him to follow was but fruitlesse paine;
Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine

But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,

And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride
And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,

And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication."

For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.

[4] The Tiber River runs through Rome. The lady is hence associated with the Catholic church. Her father, she says, is ruler of the west—but Una's father had the rule of both east and west (1.1.41); historically, the true church once embraced east and west.

[5] The lady claims to have been betrothed to Christ, bridegroom of the church (Matthew 9.15).

But this good knight soone as he them can° spie, did
For the coole shade him thither hastly got:
For golden Phoebus now ymounted hie,
From fiery wheeles of his faire chariot

That living creature mote° it not abide; might
And his new Lady it endured not.
There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.° time

And thinking of those braunches greene to frame
A girlond for her dainty forehead fit,
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came
Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
Crying, "O spare with guilty hands to teare

But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare

Astond° he stood, and up his haire did hove° stunned / rise
And with that suddein horror could no member move.

At last whenas the dreadfull passion
Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
Yet musing at the straunge occasion
And doubting much his sence, he thus bespake;
"What voyce of damned Ghost from Limbo[8] lake,
Or guilefull spright wandring in empty aire,
Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,° mislead
Sends to my doubtfull eares these speaches rare,° strange
And ruefull plaints, me bidding guiltlesse bloud to spare?"

Then groning deepe, "Nor damned Ghost," quoth he,
"Nor guilefull sprite to thee these wordes doth speake,

Where Boreas° doth blow full bitter bleake, the north wind
And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines."

"But how long time," said then the Elfin knight,
"Are you in this misformed house to dwell?"
"We may not chaunge," quoth he, "this evil plight,
Till we be bathed in a living well;[7]
That is the terme prescribed by the spell."
"O how," said he, "mote° I that well out find, might

To thinke how she through guilefull handeling,[0] treatment
Though true as touch,[0] though daughter of a king, touchstone
Though faire as ever living wight was faire,

Yet wished tydings none[0] of him unto her brought. no one

The Lyon would not leave her desolate,

And when she wakt, he waited diligent,
With humble service to her will prepard:

But the rude° wench her answered nought at all, impolite; ignorant

Till seeing by her side the Lyon stand,
With suddaine feare her pitcher downe she threw,
And fled away: for never in that land
Face of faire Ladie she before did vew,
And that dread Lyons looke her cast in deadly° hew. deathlike

Full fast she fled, ne ever lookt behynd,
As if her life upon the wager lay,° were at stake
And home she came, whereas her mother blynd

But suddaine catching hold, did her dismay
With quaking hands, and other signes of feare:
Who full of ghastly fright and cold affray,° terror
Gan shut the dore. By this arrived there
Dame Una, wearie Dame, and entrance did requere.° request

Which when none yeelded, her unruly Page

Where that old woman day and night did pray
Upon her beades° devoutly penitent; rosary
Nine hundred Pater nosters every day,
And thrise nine hundred A*ves* she was wont to say.[6]

And to augment her painefull pennance more,
Thrise every weeke in ashes she did sit,
And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth wore,[7]
And thrise three times did fast from any bit:° food
But now for feare her beads she did forget.
Whose needlesse dread for to remove away,
Faire Una framed words and count'nance fit:
Which hardly° doen, at length she gan them pray, with difficulty

The day is spent, and commeth drowsie night,
When every creature shrowded is in sleepe;
Sad Una downe her laies in wearie plight,
And at her feet the Lyon watch doth keepe:
In stead of rest, she does lament, and weepe
For the late° losse of her deare loved knight, recent
And sighes, and grones, and evermore does steepe
Her tender brest in bitter teares all night,
All night she thinks too long, and often lookes for light.

Now when Aldeboran was mounted hie
Above the shynie Cassiopeias chaire,[9]
And all in deadly sleepe did drowned lie,
One knocked at the dore, and in would fare;° coyne
He knocked fast,° and often curst, and sware, insistently
That readie entrance was not at his call:
For on his backe a heavy load he bare
Of nightly stelths and pillage severall,[1]
Which he had got abroad by purchase° criminall. acquisition

17

He was to weete° a stout and sturdie thiefe, in fact
Wont to robbe Churches of their ornaments,
And poore mens boxes[2] of their due reliefe,
Which given was to them for good intents;
The holy Saints of their rich vestiments
He did disrobe, when all men carelesse slept,
And spoild the Priests of their habiliments,° vestments
Whiles none the holy things in safety kept;
Then he by cunning sleights in at the window crept.

And all that he by right or wrong could find,
Unto this house he brought, and did bestow
Upon the daughter of this woman blind,
Abessa daughter of Corceca[3] slow,
With whom he whoredome usd, that few did know,
And fed her fat with feast of offerings,
And plentie, which in all the land did grow;
Ne spared he to give her gold and rings:
And now he to her brought part of his stolen things.

Thus long the dore with rage and threats he bet,° beat
Yet of those fearefull women none durst rize,

Ne dare to weepe, nor seeme to understand
The heavie hap,° which on them is alight,°   lot / fallen
Affraid, least to themselves the like mishappen might.[6]

Now when broad day the world discovered° has,   revealed
Up Una rose, up rose the Lyon eke,°   also
And on their former journey forward pas,
In wayes unknowne, her wandring knight to seeke,
With paines farre passing that long wandring Greeke,
That for his love refused deitie;[7]
Such were the labours of this Lady meeke,
Still seeking him, that from her still did flie,
Then furthest from her hope, when most she weened nie.°   believed near

22

Soone as she parted thence, the fearefull twaine,
That blind old woman and her daughter deare
Came forth, and finding Kirkrapine° there slaine,   church robber
For anguish great they gan to rend their heare,
And beat their brests, and naked flesh to teare.
And when they both had wept and wayld their fill,
Then forth they ramie like two amazed deare,
Halfe mad through malice, and revenging will,°   desire of revenge
To follow her, that was the causer of their ill.

Whom overtaking, they gan loudly bray,
With hollow howling, and lamenting cry,
Shamefully at her rayling all the way,
And her accusing of dishonesty,°   unchastity
That was the flowre of faith and chastity;
And still amidst her rayling,. she[8] did pray,
That plagues, and mischiefs, and long misery
Might fall on her, and follow all the way,
And that in endlesse error° she might ever stray.   wandering

[5] It does him no good to resist.

[6] I.e., lest the same thing might happen amiss ("mishappen") to them.

[7] Odysseus, who rejected immortality and the love of the nymph Calypso for his wife, Penelope.

[8] Corceca. (Abessa cannot speak.)

35

But when she saw her prayers nought prevaile,
She backe returned with some labour lost;
And in the way as she did weepe and waile
A knight her met in mighty armes embost,° encased
Yet knight was not for all his bragging bost,° boast
But subtill Archimag, that Una sought
By traynes° into new troubles to have tost: tricks
Of that old woman tydings he besought,
If that of such a Ladie she could tellen ought.[9]

Therewith she gan her passion to renew,
And cry, and curse, and raile, and rend her heare,° hair
Saying, that harlot she too lately knew,
That causd her shed so many a bitter teare,
And so forth told the story of her feare:
Much seemed he to mone her haplesse chaunce,
And after for that Ladie did inquere;
Which being taught, he forward gan advaunce
His fair enchaunted steed, and eke his charmed launce.

Ere long he came, where Una traveild slow,
And that wilde Champion wayting° her besyde: attending
Whom seeing such, for dread he durst not show
Himselfe too nigh at hand, but turned wyde
Unto an hill; from whence when she him spyde,
By his like seeming shield, her knight by name
She weend it was, and towards him gan ryde:
Approching nigh, she wist° it was the same, believed
And with faire fearefull humblesse° towards him shee came humility

And weeping said, "Ah my long lacked Lord,
Where have ye bene thus long out of my sight?
Much feared I to have bene quite abhord,
Or ought° have done, that ye displeasen might, aught
That should as death unto my deare hart light:[1]
For since mine eye your joyous sight did mis,
My chearefull day is turnd to chearelesse night,
And eke my night of death the shadow is;
But welcome now my light, and shining lampe of blis."

He thereto meeting[2] said, "My dearest Dame,
Farre be it from your thought, and fro my will,
To thinke that knighthood I so much should shame,
As you to leave, that have me loved still.
And chose in Faery court of meere° goodwill, pure
Where noblest knights were to be found on earth:

---

[9] I.e., if she could tell anything ("ought") about such a lady.

[1] I.e., be as a death blow to my loving heart. ("Deare" can also mean heavy, sore.)

[2] Answering in like manner.

The earth shall sooner leave her kindly° skill natural
To bring forth fruit, and make eternall derth,° desert
Then I leave you, my liefe,° yborne of heavenly berth. beloved

29

"And sooth to say, why I left you so long,
Was for to seeke adventure in strange place,
Where Archimago said a felon strong
To many knights did daily worke disgrace;
But knight he now shall never more deface:° discredit
Good cause of mine excuse; that mote° ye please may
Well to accept, and evermore embrace
My faithfull service, that by land and seas
Have vowd you to defend, now then your plaint appease."° cease

30

His lovely° words her seemd due recompence loving
Of all her passed paines: one loving howre
For many yeares of sorrow can dispence:° make amends
A dram of sweet is worth a pound of sowre:
She has forgot, how many a wofull stowre° trouble
For him she late endured; she speakes no more
Of past: true is, that true love hath no powre
To looken backe; his eyes be fixt before.
Before her stands her knight, for whom she toyld so sore.

31

Much like, as when the beaten marinere,
That long hath wandred in the Ocean wide,
Oft soust° in swelling Tethys[3] saltish teare, soaked
And long time having tand his tawney hide
With blustring breath of heaven, that none can bide,
And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound,[4]
Soone as the port from farre he has espide,
His chearefull whistle merrily doth sound,
And Nereus crownes with cups;[5] his mates him pledg° around. toast

32

Such joy made Una, when her knight she found;
And eke th' enchaunter joyous seemd no lesse,
Then the glad marchant, that does vew from ground
His ship farre come from watrie wildernesse,
He hurles out vowes, and Neptune oft doth blesse:
So forth they past, and all the way they spent
Discoursing of her dreadfull late distresse,
In which he askt her, what the Lyon ment:
Who told her all that fell in journey as she went.[6]

33

They had not ridden farre, when they might see
One pricking° towards them with hastie heat, spurring

[3] The wife of Ocean; here, the ocean itself.

[4] Sirius, the dog star, symbolizing hot weather (the dog days).

[5] Nereus, a benevolent sea god, to whom the mariner in gratitude makes libations.

[6] I.e., she told all that had befallen her on her journey.

Full strongly armd, and on a courser free,° eager to charge
That through his fiercenesse fomed all with sweat,
And the sharpe yron° did for anger eat, bit
When his hot ryder spurd his chauffed° side; clwfed, heated
His Iooke was sterne, and seemed still to threat
Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde,
And on his shield Sans loy in bloudie lines was dyde.

When nigh he drew unto this gentle payre
And saw the Red-crosse, which the knight did beare,
He burnt in fire, and gan eftsoones prepare Himselfe to battell with his couched° speare. leveled
Loth was that other, and did faint through feare,
To taste th' untryed dint° of deadly Steele; blow
But yet his Lady did so well him cheare,
That hope of new good hap he gan to feele;
So bent° his speare, and spurnd° his horse with yron heele. lowered /

35

But that proud Paynim° forward came so fierce, pagan
And full of wrath, that with his sharp-head speare
Through vainely crossed shield[7] he quite did pierce,
And had his staggering steede not shrunke for feare,
Through shield and bodie eke he should him beare:° thrust
Yet so great was the puissance° of his push, force
That from his saddle quite he did him beare:
He tombling rudely° downe to ground did rush, violently
And from his gored wound a well of bloud did gush.

Dismounting lightly from his loftie steed,
He to him lept, in mind to reave° his life, take
And proudly said, "Lo there the worthie meed° recompense
Of him, that slew Sans foy with bloudie knife;
Henceforth his ghost freed from repining strife,
In peace may passen over Lethe[8] lake,
When mourning altars purgd° with enemies life, cleansed
The blacke infernall Furies[9] doen aslake:° appease
Life from Sans foy thou tookst, Sans loy shall from thee take."

37

Therewith in haste his helmet gan unlace,
Till Una cride, "O hold that heavie hand,
Deare Sir, what ever that thou be in place:° whoever you are Enough is, that thy foe doth vanquisht stand
Now at thy mercy: Mercie not withstand:
For he is one the truest knight alive,[1]
Though conquered now he lie on lowly land,° i.e., low on the ground

[7] The cross on Archimago's shield was false and did Hiot give him the protection the Redcrosse knight received in his fight with Sansfoy (see canto 2, stanza 18).

[8] The river of forgetfulness in Hades (but Styx—the river at Hell's entrance—would seem more appropriate here: see canto 5, stanza 10).

[9] Spirits of discord and revenge.

[1] I.e., do not withhold mercy, for he is the one truest knight.

And whilest him fortune favourd, faire did thrive
In bloudie field: therefore of life him not deprive."

38
Her piteous words might° not abate his rage, could
But rudely rending up his helmet, would
Have slaine him straight: but when he sees his age,
And hoarie head of Archimago old,
His hastie hand he doth amazed hold,
And halfe ashamed, wondred at the sight:
For the old man well knew he, though untold,[2]
In charmes and magicke to have wondrous might,
Ne ever wont° in field, ne in round lists[3] to fight. accustomed

39
And said, "Why Archimago, lucklesse syre,
What doe I see? what hard mishap is this,
That hath thee hither brought to taste mine yre?
Or thine the fault, or mine the error is,
In stead of foe to wound my friend amis?"
He answered nought, but in a traunce still lay,
And on those guilefull dazed eyes of his
The cloud of death did sit. Which doen away,° when the swoon passed
He left him lying so, ne would no lenger stay.

But to the virgin comes, who all this while
Amased stands, her selfe so mockt° to see deceived
By him, who has the guerdon° of his guile, reward
For so misfeigning her true knight to bee:
Yet is she now in more perplexitie,° trouble
Left in the hand of that same Paynim bold,
From whom her booteth not° at all to flie; is of no use
Who by her cleanly° garment catching hold, pure
Her from her Palfrey pluckt, her visage to behold.

41
But her fierce servant full of kingly awe° awesomeness
And high disdaine,° whenas his soveraine Dame indignation
So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
With gaping jawes full greedy at him came,
And ramping° on his shield, did weene° the same rearing / intend
Have reft away with his sharpe rending clawes:
But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
His corage more, that from his griping pawes
He hath his shield redeemed,° and foorth his swerd he drawes. recovered

42
O then too weake and feeble was the forse
Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand:
For he was strong, and of so mightie corse,° body
As ever wielded speare in warlike hand,

[2] I.e., without needing to be told.

[3] Enclosures for fighting tournaments.

And feates of armes did wisely° understand. skillfully
Eftsoones he perced through his chaufed chest
With thrilling point of deadly yron brand,[4]
And launcht° his Lordly hart: with death opprest pierced
He roared aloud, whiles life forsooke his stubborne brest.

43

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne maid
From raging spoile° of lawlesse victors will? plunder
Her faithfull gard removed, her hope dismaid,
Her selfe a yeelded pray to save or spill.° destroy
He now Lord of the field, his pride to fill,
With foule reproches, and disdainfull spight
Her vildly entertaines, and will or nill,
Beares her away upon his courser light:[5]
Her prayers nought prevaile; his rage is more of might.

44

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
And piteous plaints she filleth his dull° eares, deaf
That stony hart could riven have in twaine,
And all the way she wets with flowing teares:
But he enraged with rancor, nothing heares.
Her servile beast° yet would not leave her so, the palfrey
But followes her farre off, ne ought° he feares, aught, anything
To be partaker of her wandring woe,
More mild in beastly kind,° then that her beastly foe. nature

Canto 4

To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa guides the faithfull knight,
Where brothers death to wreak° Sansjoy avenge doth chalenge him to fight.

Young knight, what ever that dost armes professe,
And through long labours huntest after fame,
Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
In choice, and change of thy deare loved Dame,
Least thou of her beleeve too lightly blame,[6]
And rash misweening° doe thy hart remove: misjudgment
For unto knight there is no greater shame,
Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample° plainly prove. example

Who after that he had faire Una lorne,° forsaken
Through light misdeeming° of her loialtie, misjudging
And false Duessa in her sted had borne,° taken as companion

[5] I.e., he treats her basely ("vildly") and willingly or not bears her away quickly ("light") on his horse.

Called Fidess', and so supposd to bee;
Long with her traveild, till at last they see
A goodly building, bravely garnished,° adorned
The house of mightie Prince it seemd to bee:
And towards it a broad high way[7] that led,
All bare through peoples feet, which thither travelled.

Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
Both day and night, of each degree and place,° rank
But few returned, having scaped hard,° with difficulty
With balefull° beggerie, or foule disgrace, wretched
Which ever after in most wretched case,
Like loathsome lazars,° by the hedges lay. lepers
Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace:° direct his steps
For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
And also nigh consumed is the lingring day.

A stately Pallace built of squared bricke,
Which cunningly was without morter laid,
Whose wals were high, but nothing strong, nor thick,
And golden foile° all over them displaid, thin layer of gold
That purest skye with brightnesse they dismaid:° outdid
High lifted up were many loftie towres,
And goodly galleries farre over laid,° placed above
Full of faire windowes, and delightfull bowres;
And on the top a Diall told the timely howres.[8]

It was a goodly heape° for to behould, building
And spake the praises of the workmans wit;° skill
But full great pittie, that so faire a mould° structure
Did on so weake foundation ever sit:
For on a sandie hill,[9] that still did flit,° shift
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shaked it:
And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

Arrived there they passed in forth right;
For still° to all the gates stood open wide, always
Yet charge of them was to a Porter hight° committed
Cald Malvenu,[1] who entrance none denide:
Thence to the hall, which was on every side
With rich array and costly arras dight:[2]
Infinite sorts of people did abide

[2] Decorated with costly wall hangings.

There waiting long, to win the wished sight
Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

By them they passe, all gazing on them round,
And to the Presence* mount; whose glorious vew
Their frayle amazed senses did confound:
In living Princes court none ever knew
Such eridlesse richesse, and so sumptuous shew;° show
Ne° Persia selfe, the nourse of pompous pride nor
Like ever saw. And there a noble crew
Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side,
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

High above all a cloth of State° was spred, canopy
And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sate most brave embellished° handsomely clad
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene, that shone as Titans° ray, the sun's
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious stone
Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay° attempt
To dim the brightnesse of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

Exceeding shone, like Phoebus fairest childe,
That did presume his fathers firie wayne,° chariot
And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted° wilde unusually
Through highest heaven with weaker° hand to rayne; too weak
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble eyen,
He leaves the welkin° way most beaten plaine, heavenly
And rapt° with whirling wheeles, inflames the skyen, carried away
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.[4]

10

So proud she shyned in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven; for earth she did disdayne,
And sitting high; for lowly° she did hate: lowliness
Lo underneath her scornefull feete, was layne
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,° tail
And in her hand she held a mirrhour bright,[5]
Wherein her face she often vewed fayne,° with pleasure
And in her selfe-loved semblance tooke delight;
For she was wondrous faire, as any living wight.

[5] Pride and figures associated with her in Renaissance literature and art often hold a mirror, emblematic of self-love.

Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas° surpass
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,
And thundring Jove, that high in heaven doth dwell,
And wield° the world, she claymed for her syre, govern
Or if that any else did Jove excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought° higher were then that, did it desyre. anything

And proud Lucifera men did her call,
That made her selfe a Queene, and crownd to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at all,
Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie
Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,° political cunning
And strong advizement of six wisards old,

Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
And false Duessa seeming Lady faire,

Suddein upriseth from her stately place
The royall Dame, and for her coche doth call:
All hurtlen° forth and she with Princely pace, rush
As faire Aurora in her purple pall,[7]
Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode° doth blaze; abroad
The heapes of people thronging in the hall,
Do ride° each other, upon her to gaze: climb up on
Her glorious glitterand° light doth all mens eyes amaze. glittering

17

So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme,
Adorned all with gold, and girlonds gay,
That seemd as fresh as Flora° in her prime, the goddess of flowers
And strove to match, in royall rich array,
Great Junos golden chaire,° the which they say chariot
The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
To Joves high house through heavens bras-paved way
Drawne of faire Pecocks, that excell in pride,

But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,
On which her six sage Counsellours did ryde,
Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts,° bidding
With like conditions to their kinds applyde:[9]
Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,
Was sluggish Idlenesse the nourse of sin;
Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde,
Arayd in habit blacke, and amis thin,[1]
Like to an holy Monck, the service to begin.

19

And in his hand his Portesse° still he bare, breviary, prayerbook
That much was worne, but therein little red,
For of devotion he had little care,
Still drownd in sleepe, and most of his dayes ded;
Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
To looken, whether it were night or day:
May seeme the wayne° was very evill led, chariot
When such an one had guiding of the way,
That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray.

[7] Goddess of dawn, in her crimson robe ("purple pall").

[8] Peacocks, with their tails outspread ("dispredden wide"), are a symbol of pride. The hundred-eyed monster Argus was set by Juno to watch Io, one of Jupiter's loves. When Mercury killed Argus, his eyes were put in the peacock's tail feathers.

[9] I.e., each bestial rider gave commands to his beast appropriate to its particular nature: the beasts and riders are suited to each other. This procession of the Seven Deadly Sins—of which Pride is queen—had a long tradition in medieval art and literature (see also Marlowe, Dr. Faustus, scene 5, lines 280-330).

[1] Idleness wears the gown ("habit") and hood or amice ("amis") of a monk. Traditionally, Idleness led the procession of the deadly sins.

From every worke he chalenged essoyne,° claimed exemption
For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
His life he led in lawlesse riotise;° riotous conduct
By which he grew to grievous malady;
For in his lustlesse° limbs through evill guise° feeble / living
A shaking fever raignd continually:
Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deformed creature, on a filthie swyne,
His belly was up-blowne with luxury,° indulgence
And eke° with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,° also / eyes
And like a Crane his necke was long and fyne,[2]
With which he swallowd up excessive feast,
For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;°
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spued up his gorge,[3] that° all did him deteast. so that

22

In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
For other clothes he could not weare for heat,
And on his head an yvie girland had,[4]
From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:
Still as he rode, he somewhat° still did eat, something
And in his hand did beare a bouzing° can, drinking
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His dronken corse° he scarse upholden can, body

Whose mind in meat and drinke was drowned so,
That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:
Full of diseases was his carcas blew,
And a dry dropsie through his flesh did flow,
Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

24

And next° to him rode lustfull Lechery, just after
Upon a bearded Goat,[5] whose rugged° haire, shaggy
And whally° eyes (the signe of gelosy,°) glaring /jealousy

[2] The crane is a common symbol of gluttony because its long and thin ("fyne") neck allows extended pleasure in swallowing.

[3] Vomited up what he had swallowed.

[4] He resembles the drunken satyr Silenus, foster father of Bacchus, god of wine; ivy is sacred to Bacchus.

[5] Traditional symbol of lust.

35

In a greene gowne he clothed was full faire,
Which underneath did hide his filthinesse,
And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
Full of vaine follies, and new fangleness:° fickleness
For he was false, and fraught with ficklenesse,
And learned had to love with secret lookes,
And well could daunce, and sing with ruefulnesse,° pathos
And fortunes tell, and read in loving bookes,[6]
And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes.

Inconstant man, that loved all he saw,
And lusted after all, that he did love,

Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine

Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

And greedy Avarice by him did ride,
Upon a Camell loaden all with gold;[7]
Two iron coffers hong on either side,
With precious mettall full, as they might hold,
And in his lap an heape of coine he told;° counted
For of his wicked pelfe° his God he made, money
And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
Accursed usurie was all his trade,
And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.[8]

28

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,
And thread-bare cote, and cobled° shoes he ware, roughly mended
Ne scarse good morsell all his life did tast,
But both from backe and belly still did spare,
To fill his bags, and richesse to compare;° acquire
Yet chylde ne° kinsman living had he none nor
To leave them to; but thorough° daily care through
To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
He led a wretched life unto him selfe unknowne.

29

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffise,
Whose greedy lust did lacke in greatest store,° plenty
Whose need had end, but no end covetise,
Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
Who had enough, yet wished ever more;
A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand

[6] Either manuals on the art of love (e.g., Ovid's Are Amatoria) or more ordinary erotica.

[7] The camel as a symbol of avarice is based on Matthew 19.24: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."

[8] I.e., he made no distinction between right and wrong.

A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
That well he could not touch, nor go,° nor stand: walk
Such one was Avarice, the fourth of this faire band.

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still° did chaw continually
Betweene his cankred° teeth a venemous tode, infected
That all the poison ran about his chaw;° jaw
But inwardly he chawed his owne maw° entrails
At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
For death it was, when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
But when he heard of harme, he wexed wondrous glad

31

All in a kirtle of discolourd say[9]
He clothed was, ypainted full of eyes;
And in his bosome secretly there lay
An hatefull Snake,[1] the which his taile uptyes
In many folds, and mortall sting implyes.° enfolds
Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
Those herpes of gold with griple Covetyse,° grasping Avarice
And grudged at the great felicitie
Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

32

He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
And him no lesse, that any like did use,° perform
And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;[2]
So every good to bad he doth abuse:° twist
And eke the verse of famous Poets witt
He does backebite, and spightfull poison spues
From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
Such one vile Envie was, that fifte in row did sitt.

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
Upon a Lion, loth for to be led;
And in his hand a burning brond° he hath, sword
The which he brandisheth about his hed;
His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And stared sterne on all, that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded;
And on his dagger still his hand he held,
Trembling through hasty rage, when choler° in him sweld. anger

34

His ruffin° raiment all was staind with blood, disorderly
Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,° torn ^ Through unadvised rashnesse woxen wood,° grown insane

[9] Robe or gown of many-colored cloth.
[1] Traditional attribute of envy.
[2] Envy perversely discounts others' good works by attributing them to a selfish motive: the desire to compensate (in God's eyes) for lack of faith.

For of his hands he had no governement,° control
Ne cared for° bloud in his avengement: minded
But when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruell facts° he often would repent; actions
Yet wilfull man he never would forecast,
Flow many mischieves should ensue his heedlesse hast.[3]

35

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath;
Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
Unmanly murder, and unthrifty scath,[4]
Bitter despight,° with rancours rusty knife, malice
And fretting griefe the enemy of life;
All these, and many evils moe° haunt ire,° morel anger
The swelling Splene,[5] and Frenzy raging rife,
The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces fire:[6]
Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungoldly tire.° train

36

And after all, upon the wagon beame
Rode Sathan,° with a smarting whip in hand, Satan
With which he forward lasht the laesie teme,
So oft as Slowth° still in the mire did stand. Idleness
Huge routs° of people did about them band, crowds
Showting for joy, and still before their way
A foggy mist had covered all the land;
And underneath their feet, all scattered lay
Dead sculs and bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

37

So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,° company
To take the solace° of the open aire, pleasure
And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine:
But that good knight would not so nigh repaire,° approach
Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce° vaine, festivity
Whose fellowship seemd far unfit for warlike swaine.

38

So having solaced themselves a space
With pleasaunce of the breathing° fields yfed, emitting fragrance
They backe returned to the Princely Place;
Whereas an errant knight in armes ycled,° clad
And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
Was writ Sans joy, they new arrived find:
Enflamed with fury and fiers hardy-hed,° hardihood
He seemd in hart to harbour thoughts unkind,
And nourish bloudy vengeaunce in his bitter mind.

[3] I.e., he never would foresee ("forecast") the calamities his careless haste caused.

[4] I.e., inhuman murder and destructive harm.

[5] In Renaissance physiology, the spleen was regarded as the seat of ill-humor.

Who when the shamed shield[7] of slaine Sans foy
He spied with that same Faery champions page,
Bewraying° him, that did of late destroy revealing
His eldest brother, burning all with rage
He to him leapt, and that same envious gage° envied prize
Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
But th 'Elfin knight, which ought that warlike wage,[8]
Disdaind to loose the meed he wonne in fray,° battle
And him rencountring° fierce, reskewd the noble pray. encountering

40

Therewith they gan to hurtlen° greedily, rush together
Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,° contest
And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
That with their sturre° they troubled all the traine; tumult
Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
Of high displeasure, that ensewen° might, ensue
Commaunded them their fury to refraine,
And if that either to that shield had right,
In equall lists[9] they should the morrow next it fight.

"Ah dearest Dame," quoth then the Paynim° bold, pagan
"Pardon the errour of enraged wight,° creature, man
Whom great griefe made forget the raines to hold
Of reasons rule, to see this recreant° knight, cowardly
No knight, but treachour° full of false despight° traitor / disdain
And shamefull treason, who through guile° hath slayn deceit
The prowest° knight, that ever field did fight, bravest
Even stout Sans foy (O who can then refrayn?)
Whose shield he beares renverst, the more to heape disdayn.

42

"And to augment the glorie of his guile,
His° dearest love the faire Fidessa loe i.e., Sansfoy's
Is there possessed of[1] the traytour vile,
Who reapes the harvest sowen by his foe,
Sowen in bloudy field, and bought with woe:
That° brothers hand shall dearely well requight that act
So be, O Queene, you equall favour showe."[2]
Him litle answerd th 'angry Elfin knight:
He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

43

But threw his gauntlet as a sacred pledge,
His cause in combat the next day to try:
So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
To be avenged each on his enimy.
That night they pas in joy and jollity,

[7] Carrying a shield upside down, with the heraldic arms reversed, was a great insult (see line 369).

[8] The knight (Redcrosse) who owned ("ought") that spoil of war ("warlike wage").

[9] I.e., in impartial formal combat.

[1] Possessed by (i.e., sexually).

[2] I.e., if, O Queen, you show impartiality ("equall favour").

Feasting and courting both in bowre and hall;
For Steward was excessive Gluttonie,
That of his plenty poured forth to all;
Which doen,° the Chamberlain[3] Slowth did to rest them call. done

44

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,
The warlike youthes on dayntie° couches layd, fine
Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish eye,
To muse on meanes of hoped victory.
But whenas Morpheus[4] had with leaden mace
Arrested all that courtly company,
Up-rose Duessa from her resting place,
And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

45

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,° troubled mood
Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,° injure
And him amoves° with speaches seeming fit: arouses
"Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans foy,
Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
And greeved, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye."

46

With gentle wordes he can° her fairely° greet, did / courteously
And bad say on the secret of her hart.
Then sighing soft, "I learne that litle sweet
Oft tempred is," quoth she, "with muchell° smart: much
For since my brest was launcht with lovely dart[5]
Of deare Sans foy, I never joyed howre,
But in eternall woes my weaker° hart too weak
Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
And for his sake have felt full many an heavie stowre.° grief

47

"At last when perils all I weened past,
And hoped to reape the crop of all my care,
Into new woes unweeting° I was cast, unknowing
By this false faytor,° who unworthy ware° imposter / wore
His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
Entrapped slew, and brought to shamefull grave.
Me silly° maid away with him he bare, helpless
And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
For that I would not yeeld, that° to Sans foy I gave what 48

"But since faire Sunne hath sperst° that Iowring clowd, dispersed
And to my loathed life now shewes some light,

[3] The court attendant in charge of the bedchambers.

[4] Here, the god of sleep (cf. 1.1. 318 and note).

[5] I.e., since my breast was pierced with the arrow of love.

Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,° take shelter
From dreaded storme of his disdainfull spight:
To you th' inheritance belongs by right
Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs° his love. belongs
Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright° ghost
Be unrevenged, that calles to you above
From wandring Stygian[6] shores, where it doth endlesse move."

49

Thereto said he, "Faire Dame be nought dismaid
For sorrowes past; their griefe is with them gone:
Ne yet of present perill be affraid;
For needlesse feare did never vantage° none, aid
And helplesse hap it booteth not to mone.[7]
Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall° paines are past, living
Though greeved ghost for vengeance deepe do grone:
He lives, that shall him pay his dewties° last, rites
And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast."

5°

"O but I feare the fickle freakes,"° quoth shee, unpredictable triclts
"Of fortune false, and oddes of armes[8] in field."
"Why dame," quoth he, "what oddes can ever bee,
Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?"
"Yea but," quoth she, "he beares a charmed shield,
And eke enchaunted armes, that none can perce,
Ne none can wound the man, that does them wield."
"Charmd or enchaunted," answerd he then ferce,° fiercely
"I no whit reck,[9] ne you the like need to reherce.° recount

51

"But faire Fidessa, sithens° fortunes guile, since
Or enimies powre hath now captived you,
Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while
Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
And with Sans foyes dead dowry you endew."[1]
"Ay me, that is a double death," she said,
"With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
Where ever yet I be, my secrete aid
Shall follow you." So passing forth she him obaid.

Canto 5

The faithfull knight in equall field
subdewes his faithlesse foe,
Wliom false Duessa saves, and for his cure to hell does goe.

i

The noble hart, that harbours vertuous thought,
And is with child of glorious great intent,

[6] I.e., from wandering on the banks of the river Styx, in Hades.

[7] I.e., it does not help to moan over that which is beyond help ("helplesse hap").

[8] Advantage of superior arms.

[9] I do not care at all.

[1] I.e., endow you with the legacy of the dead Sansfoy.

Can never rest, untill it forth have brought
Th 'eternall brood of glorie excellent:[2]
Such restlesse passion did all night torment
The flaming corage° of that Faery knight, heart; mind
Devizing, how that doughtie° turnament worthy
With greatest honour he atchieven might;
Still did he wake, and still did watch for dawning light.

At last the golden Orientall gate
Of greatest heaven gan to open faire,
And Phoebus[3] fresh, as bridegrome to his mate,
Came dauncing forth, shaking his deawie haire:
And hurld his glistring beames through gloomy aire.
Which when the wakeful Elfe perceived, streight way
He started up, and did him selfe prepaire,
In sun-bright armes, and battailous° array: warlike
For with that Pagan proud he combat will that day.

And forth he comes into the commune hall,
Where earely waite him many a gazing eye,
To weet° what end to straunger knights may fall°. learn / befall
There many Minstrales maken melody,
To drive away the dull melancholy,
And many Bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely° voyces cunningly, measured
And many Chroniclers, that can record
Old loves, and warres for ladies doen° by many a Lord.[4] done

Soone after comes the cruell Sarazin,° Saracen
In woven maile all armed warily,
And sternly lookes at him, who not a pin
Does care for looke of living creatures eye.
They bring them wines of Greece and Araby,
And daintie spices fetcht from furthest Ynd,° India
To kindle heat of courage privily:° within
And in the wine a solemne oth they bynd
T'observe the sacred lawes of armes, that are assynd.

At last forth comes that far renowmed Queene,
With royall pomp and Princely majestie;
She is ybrought unto a paled° greene, fenced
And placed under stately canapee,° canopy
The warlike feates of both those knights to see.
On th' other side in all mens open vew
Duessa placed is, and on a tree

[2] That good must be manifested in action, not in mere intent, is an important Renaissance commonplace.

[3] I.e., the sun. Cf. Psalm 19.4-5: "In them hath he sat a Tabernacle for the sun, Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber."

[4] Minstrels play the music on their instruments, bards sing the words, chroniclers—historians, epic poets—write of love and war.

Sans-foy his shield is hangd with bloudy hew:
Both those the Iawrell girlonds[5] to the victor dew.

A shrilling trompet sownded from on hye,
And unto battaill bad° them selves addresse: bade
Their shining shieldes about their wrestes° they tye, wrists
And burning blades about their heads do blesse,° brandish
The instruments of wrath and heavinesse:° rage
With greedy force each other doth assayle,
And strike so fiercely, that they do impresse
Deepe dinted furrowes in the battred mayle;
The yron walles to ward their blowes are weake and fraile.[6]

The Sarazin was stout,° and wondrous strong, bold
And heaped blowes like yron hammers great:
For after bloud and vengeance he did long.
The knight was fiers,° and full of youthly heat: high-spirited
And doubled strokes, like dreaded thunders threat:
For all for prayse and honour he did fight.
Both stricken strike, and beaten both do beat,
That from their shields forth flyeth firie light,
And helmets hewen deepe, shew marks of eithers might.

So th' one for wrong, the other strives for right:
As when a Gryfon[7] seized° of his pray, in possession
A Dragon fiers encountreth in his flight,
Through widest ayre making his ydle° way, casual
That would his rightfull ravine° rend away; plunder
With hideous horrour both together smight,
And souce° so sore, that they the heavens affray:° strike / startle
The wise Southsayer° seeing so sad sight, soothsayer
Th' amazed vulgar tels of warres and mortall fight.

So th' one for wrong, the other strives for right,
And each to deadly shame would drive his foe:
The cruell Steele so greedily doth bight
In tender flesh, that streames of bloud down flow,
With which the armes, that earst° so bright did show, at first
Into a pure vermillion now are dyde:
Great ruth° in all the gazers harts did grow, pity
Seeing the gored woundes to gape so wyde,
That victory they dare not wish to either side.

At last the Paynim chaunst to cast his eye,
His suddein° eye, flaming with wrathfull fyre, darting
Upon his brothers shield, which hong thereby:

---

[5] Laurel wreaths were awarded to the victor of a joust.

[6] I.e., their armor is too frail to withstand such blows.

[7] A legendary monster, half-eagle, half-lion.

Therewith redoubled was his raging yre,° anger
And said, "Ah wretched sonne of wofull syre,
Doest thou sit wayling by black Stygian Lake
Whilest here thy shield is hangd for victors hyre,° reward
And sluggish german[8] doest thy forces siake,° slacken
To after-send his foe, that him may overtake?

11

"Goe caytive° Elfe, him quickly overtake, servile
And soone redeeme from his long wandring woe;
Goe guiltie ghost, to him my message make,
That I his shield have quit° from dying foe." rescued
Therewith upon his crest he stroke him so,
That twise he reeled, readie twise to fall;
End of the doubtfull battell deemed tho
The lookers on,[9] and lowd to him gan call
The false Duessa, "Thine the shield, and I, and all."

Soone as the Faerie heard his Ladie speake,
Out of his swowning dreame he gan awake,
And quickning° faith, that earst was woxen weake, life-restoring
The creeping deadly cold away did shake:
Tho moved with wrath, and shame, and Ladies sake,° cause
Of all attonce he cast° avengd to bee, determined
And with so'exceeding furie at him strake,
That forced him to stoupe upon his knee;
Had he not stouped so, he should have cloven bee.

13

And to him said, "Goe now proud Miscreant,° misbeliever
Thy selfe thy message doe° to german deare, give Alone he wandring thee too long doth want:
Goe say, his foe thy shield with his doth beare."
Therewith his heavie hand he high gan reare,
Him to have slaine; when loe a darkesome clowd
Upon him fell: he no where doth appeare,
But vanisht is. The Elfe him cals alowd,
But answer none receives: the darknes him does shrowd.[1]

In haste Duessa from her place arose,
And to him running said, "O prowest° knight, bravest
That ever Ladie to her love did chose,
Let now abate the terror of your might,
And quench the flame of furious despight,° anger
And bloudie vengeance; io th' infernall powres
Covering your foe with cloud of deadly night,
Have borne him hence to Plutoes balefull bowres.° i.e., Hades
The conquest yours, I yours, the shield, and glory yours."

[8] Kinsman; here, brother.

[9] I.e., the onlookers then ("tho") thought this would end the battle, heretofore in doubt ("doubtfull").

[1] The device of a god rescuing a hero in danger by hiding him in a cloud has parallels in Iliad 3.380, Aeneid 5.810—12, and Gerusalemme liberata 7.44-45.

Not all so satisfi.de, with greedie eye
He sought all round about, his thirstie blade
To bath in bloud of faithlesse enemy;
Who all that while lay hid in secret shade:
He standes amazed, how he thence should fade.
At last the trumpets Triumph sound on hie,
And running Heralds humble homage made,
Greeting him goodly° with new victorie, respectfully
And to him brought the shield, the cause of enmitie.

Wherewith he goeth to that soveraine Queene,
And falling her before on lowly knee,
To her makes present of his service seene;° proved
Which she accepts, with thankes, and goodly gree,° favor
Greatly advauncing° his gay chevalree. extolling
So marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee,
Shouting, and clapping all their hands on hight,° aloud
That all the aire it fills, and flyes to heaven bright.

17

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed:
Where many skilfull leaches° him abide,° doctors / attend
To salve° his hurts, that yet still freshly bled. anoint
In wine and oyle they wash his woundes wide,
And softly can embalme° on every side. carefully did anoint
And all the while, most heavenly melody
About the bed sweet musicke did divide,° descanted
Him to beguile oP griefe and agony: divert from
And all the while Duessa wept full bitterly.

As when a wearie traveller that strayes
By muddy shore of broad seven-mouthed Nile,
Unweeting of the perillous wandring wayes,
Doth meet a cruell craftie Crocodile,
Which in false griefe hyding his harmefull guile,
Doth weepe full sore, and sheddeth tender teares:[2]
The foolish man, that pitties all this while
His mournefuil plight, is swallowed up unwares,° unexpectedly
Forgetfull of his owne, that mindes anothers cares.

19

So wept Duessa untill eventide,
That shyning lampes in Joves high house were light:[3]
Then forth she rose, ne Ienger° would abide, longer
But comes unto the place, where th' Hethen knight
In slombring swownd nigh voyd of vitall spright,[4]
Lay covered with inchaunted cloud all day:
Whom when she found, as she him left in plight,[5]

---

[2] Medieval bestiaries popularized the legend of the hypocritical crocodile's tears.

[3] I.e., when ("that") the stars came out.

[4] Nearly ("nigh") devoid of life.

[5] I.e., in the same desperate state in which she had left him.

To wayle his woefull case she would not stay,
But to the easterne coast of heaven makes speedy way.

Where griesly° Night, with visage deadly sad, grim, horrible
That Phoebus chearefull face durst never vew,
And in a foule blacke pitchie mantle clad,
She findes forth comming from her darkesome mew,° den
Where she all day did hide her hated hew.° shape; color
Before the dore her yron charet stood,
Alreadie harnessed for journey new;
And cole blacke steedes yborne of hellish brood,
That on their rustie bits did champ, as° they were wood.° as if/mad

21

Who when she saw Duessa sunny bright,
Adorned with gold and jewels shining cleare,° brightly
She greatly grew amazed at the sight,
And th' unacquainted° light began to feare: unfamiliar
For never did such brightnesse there appeare,
And would have backe retyred to her cave,
Untill the witches speech she gan to heare,
Saying, "Yet O thou dreaded Dame, I crave Abide,° till I have told the message, which I have stay

22

She stayd, and foorth Duessa gan proceede,
"O thou most auncient Grandmother of all,[6]
More old then Jove, whom thou at first didst breede,
Or that great house of Gods caelestiall,
Which wast begot in Daemogorgons hall,
And sawst the secrets of the world unmade,° before it was made
Why suffredst thou thy Nephewes° deare to fall grandsons
With Elfin sword, most shamefully betrade?
Lo where the stout Sans joy doth sleepe in deadly shade.

"And him before, I saw with bitter eyes
The bold Sans foy shrinke underneath his speare;
And now the pray of fowles in field he lyes,
Nor wayld of friends, nor laid on groning beare,[7]
That whylome° was to me too dearely deare. formerly
O what of Gods then boots it° to be borne, is it worth
If old Aveugles sonnes so evill heare?[8]
Or who shall not great Nightes children scorne,
When two of three her Nephews are so fowle forlorne?° wretchedly lost

24

"Up then, up dreary Dame, of darknesse Oueene,
Go gather up the reliques° of thy race, remnants

[6] By tradition Night was eldest of the gods, existing before the world was formed and the Olympian gods were begotten in the hall of Demogorgon (Chaos).

[7] Bier attended by mourners (thus "groning").

[8] I.e., are so badly thought of. "Aveugle": "blind." He is the son of Night and father of Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy.

Or else goe them avenge, and let be seene,
That dreaded Night in brightest day hath place,
And can the children of faire light deface."° destroy
Her feeling speeches some compassion moved
In hart, and chaunge in that great mothers face:
Yet pittie in her hart was never proved° known
Till then: for evermore she hated, never loved.

25

And said, "Deare daughter rightly may I rew
The fall of famous children borne of mee,
And good successes, which their foes ensew:° attend
But who can turne the streame of destinee,
Or breake the chayne of strong necessitee,
Which fast is tyde to Joves eternall seat?[9]
The sonnes of Day he favoureth, I see,
And by my ruines thinkes to make them great:
To make one great by others losse, is bad excheat.° exchange

26

"Yet shall they not escape so freely all;
For some shall pay the price of others guilt:
And he the man that made Sans foy to fall,
Shall with his owne bloud price° that he hath spilt. pay for
But what art thou, that telst of Nephews kilt?"
"I that do seeme not I, Duessa am,"
Ouoth she, "how ever now in garments gilt,
And gorgeous gold arayd I to thee came:
Duessa I, the daughter of Deceipt and Shame."

2-7

Then bowing downe her aged backe, she kist
The wicked witch, saying; "In that faire face
The false resemblance of Deceipt, I wist°
Did closely° Iurke; yet so true-seeming grace secretly
It carried, that I scarse in darkesome place
Could it discerne, though I the mother bee
Of falshood, and root of Duessaes race.
O welcome child, whom I have longd to see,
And now have seene unwares.° Lo now I go with thee." unexpectedly

28

Then to her yron wagon she betakes,
And with her beares the fowle welfavourd witch:
Through mirkesome° aire her readie way she makes. murky; dense
Her twyfold° Teme, of which two bla'cke as pitch, twofold

So well they sped, that they be come at length
Unto the place, whereas the Paynim lay,
Devoid of outward sense, and native strength,
Coverd with charmed cloud from vew of day,
And sight of men, since his late° luckelesse fray. recent
His cruell wounds with cruddy° bloud congealed, clotted
They binden up so wisely,° as they may, skillfully
And handle softly, till they can be healed:
So lay him in her charet, close in night concealed.

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakefull dogs did never cease to bay,
As giving warning of th' unwonted° sound, unusual
With which her yron wheeles did them affray,
And her darke griesly° looke them much dismay; horrid
The messenger of death, the ghastly Owle
With drearie shriekes did also her bewray;° reveal
And hungry Wolves continually did howle,
At her abhorred face, so filthy and so fowle.

31

Thence turning backe in silence soft they stole,
And brought the heavie corse with easie pace
To yawning gulfe of deepe Avernus hole.[1]
By that same hole an entrance darke and bace
With smoake and sulphure hiding all the place,
Descends to hell: there creature never past,
That backe returned without heavenly grace;
But dreadfull Furies, which their chaines have brast,° burst
And damned sprights sent forth to make ill° men aghast. evil

Which passing through, on every side them stood
The trembling ghosts with sad amazed mood,
Chattring their yron teeth, and staring wide
With stonie eyes; and all the hellish brood
Of feends infernall flockt on every side,
To gaze on earthly wight, that with the Night durst ride

33

They pas the bitter waves of Acheron,
Where many soules sit wailing woefully,
And come to fiery flood of Phlegeton,[2]
Whereas the damned ghosts in torments fry,
And with sharpe shrilling shriekes doe bootlesse° cry, -without avail
Cursing high Jove, the which them thither sent.

---

[1] In classical mythology Avernus is hell, where Pluto (line 282) reigns.

[2] Acheron and Phlegeton are rivers in hell.

The house of endlesse paine is built thereby,
In which ten thousand sorts of punishment
The cursed creatures doe eternally torment.

Before the threshold dreadfull Cerberus[3]
His three deformed heads did lay along,° at full length

And felly gnarre,° untill dayes enemy savagely snarl
Did him appease; then downe his taile he hong
And suffered them to passen quietly:
For she in hell and heaven had power equally.

And Sisyphus an huge round stone did reele° roll

And Tityus fed a vulture on his maw;° liver

Hippolytus a jolly° huntsman was, gallant

But Ladies love as losse of time forbore:
His wanton stepdame°[5] loved him the more,
But when she saw her offred sweets refused
Her love she turnd to hate, and him before
His father fierce of treason false accused,
And with her gealous° termes his open eares abused. arousing jealousy

[3] The three-headed dog that guards hell. Stanzas 31-35 recall Aeneas's descent into hell (Virgil, Aeneid 6.200, 239-40).

[4] Ixion was being punished for attempting to seduce Juno; Sisyphus, for refusing to pray to the gods; Tantalus, for stealing the gods' nectar; Tityus, for his attempted assault on Apollo's mother Leto; the monster Typhoeus, for creating destructive winds; Theseus, for stealing Persephone from Hades; and the fifty daughters of King Danaus, for having killed their husbands on their wedding night. Tantalus stood chin-deep in water that receded whenever he tried to drink—hence he is "thirstie." Ovid, Virgil, and Homer are Spenser's sources here.

[5] Phaedra, the wife of his father, Theseus.

Who all in rage his Sea-god syre° besought, Poseidon (Neptune)
Some cursed vengeance on his sonne to cast:
From surging gulf two monsters straight were brought,
With dread whereof his chasing steedes aghast,
Both charet swift and huntsman overcast.
His goodly corps on ragged cliffs yrent,° torn
Was quite dismembred, and his members chast
Scattered on every mountaine, as he went,
That of Hippolytus was left no moniment.[6]

His cruell stepdame seeing what was donne,
Her wicked dayes with wretched knife did end,
In death avowing th' innocence of her sonne.
Which hearing his rash Syre, began to rend
His haire, and hastie tongue, that did offend:
Tho° gathering up the relicks of his smart[7] then
By Dianes meanes, who was Hippolyts frend,
Them brought to Aesculape, that by his art
Did heale them all againe, and joyned every part.

Such wondrous science in mans wit to raine
When Jove avizd,° that could the dead revive, discovered
And fates expired[8] could renew againe,
Of endlesse life he might him not deprive,
But unto hell did thrust him downe alive,
With flashing thunderbolt ywounded sore:
Where long remaining, he did alwaies strive
Himselfe with salves to health for to restore,
And slake the heavenly fire, that raged evermore.

There auncient Night arriving, did alight
From her nigh wearie waine,[9] and in her armes
To Aesculapius brought the wounded knight:

Beseeching him with prayer, and with praise,
If either salves, or oyles, or herbes, or charmes
A fordonne° wight from dore of death mote raise, undone
He would at her request prolong her nephews daies.

42

"Ah Dame," quoth he, "thou temptest me in vaine,

And the old cause of my continued paine
With like attempt to like end to renew.

"Not so," quoth she; "but sith° that heavens king   since

Why fearest thou, that canst not hope for thing,°   anything
And fearest not, that more thee hurten might,

Great paines, and greater praise, both never to be donne."°   ended

They were by law of that proud Tyrannesse[2]
Provokt with Wrath, and Envies false surmise,
Condemned to that Dongeon mercilesse,
Where they should live in woe, and die in wretchednesse.

All these together in one heape were throwne,

And in another corner wide° were strowne lying apart
The antique ruines of the Romaines fall:
Great Romulus the Grandsyre of them all,
Proud Tarquin, and too lordly Lentulus,
Stout Scipio, and stubborne Hanniball,
Ambitious Sylla, and sterne Marius,
High Caesar, great Pompey, and fierce Antonius.[8]

Amongst these mighty men were wemen mixt,
Proud wemen, vaine, forgetfull of their yoke:°
The bold Semiramis,° whose sides transfixt wife of Ninus

Faire Sthenoboea,[9] that her selfe did choke
With wilfull cord, for wanting° of her will; lacking
High minded Cleopatra, that with stroke
Of Aspes sting her selfe did stoutly kill:
And thousands moe the like, that did that dongeon fill.

[4] King of Lydia, famous for his riches.

[5] King of Syria, who desecrated the Jewish temple of Jerusalem (1 Maccabees 1.20—24).

[6] In classical mythology, Ninus was founder of Nineveh, archetype of the wicked city (see the Book of Jonah). Nimrod, identified as the first tyrant, caused the Tower of Babel to be built in defiance of God (Genesis 10.9-10, 11.1-9).

[7] The reference is to Alexander the Great, whose "shamefull death" came ten days after he fell ill at a drinking party. The son of Philip II of Macedon, Alexander was occasionally worshiped as the son of Jupiter Ammon.

[8] Romulus was the founder of Rome; Tarquin, a Roman tyrant; Lentulus, a conspirator with Catiline to overthrow the Republic; Scipio, a Roman general, conqueror of Carthage; Hannibal, a Carthaginian general; Sulla, a Roman civil war general; Marius, Sulla's rival. The figures in the final line are Julius Caesar, Pompey the Great, and Mark Antony.

[9] Queen of King Proteus of Argos; she lusted after her brother-in-law Bellerophon.

From all the world after their wofull falles,
Through wicked pride, and wasted wealthes decay.

And lastly throwne themselves into these heavy stowres.° disasters

Of murdred men which therein strowed lay,
Without remorse, or decent funerall:
Which all through that great Princesse pride did fall
And came to shamefull end. And them beside

A donghill of dead carkases he spide,
The dreadfull spectacle of that sad house of Pride.[1]

From lawlesse lust by wondrous grace

Yet sad he was that his too hastie speed

Yet crime in her could never creature find,
But for his love, and for her owne selfe sake,
She wandred had from one to other Ynd,[3]

And made the vassall of his pleasures vilde.° vile
Yet first he cast by treatie,° and by traynes,°

With fawning wordes he courted her a while,
And looking lovely,° and oft sighing sore, lovingly

But wordes, and lookes, and sighes she did abhore,
As rocke of Diamond stedfast evermore.[4]
Yet for to feed his fyrie lustfull eye,
He snatcht the vele, that hong her face before;
Then gan her beautie shine, as brightest skye,
And burnt his beastly hart t' efforce° her chastitye. violate

And win rich spoile of ransackt chastetee.
Ah heavens, that do this hideous act behold,
And heavenly virgin thus outraged see,
How can ye vengeance just so long withhold,
And hurle not flashing flames upon that Paynim bold?

The pitteous maiden carefull° comfortlesse, full of cares
Does throw out thrilling° shriekes, and shrieking cryes, piercing
The last vaine helpe of womens great distresse,
And with loud plaints importuneth the skyes,

[3] I.e., she would have wandered from the East to the West Indies.

[4] The diamond, because of its hardness, was an emblem of fidelity.

Eternall providence exceeding° thought, transcending
Where none appeares can make her selfe a way:
A wondrous way it for this Lady wrought,
From Lyons clawes to pluck the griped° pray. grasped
Her shrill outcryes and shriekes so loud did bray,
That all the woodes and forestes did resownd;
A troupe of Faunes and Satyres[6] far away
Within the wood were dauncing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus slept in shady arber sownd.

Who when they heard that pitteous strained, voice,
In hast forsooke their rurall meriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded° noyce, re-echoed
To weet, what wight so loudly did lament.

Whose like he never saw, he durst not bide,
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ride.

The wyld woodgods arrived in the place,
There find the virgin dolefull desolate,
With ruffled rayments, and faire blubbred° face, flooded with tears
As her outrageous foe had left her late,
And trembling yet through feare of former hate;

And gin to pittie her unhappie state,

In their rude° eyes unworthie° of so wofull plight. rustic / undeserving

[6] Woodland deities with men's bodies above the waist and goats' bodies below, noted for their sensuality. Sylvanus, Roman god of the woods, is traditionally associated with fauns.

The salvage nation feele her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nance sad;
Their frowning forheads with rough hornes yclad,
And rusticke horror° all a side doe lay, roughness
And gently grenning, shew a semblance glad
To comfort her, and feare to put away,
Their backward bent knees teach her humbly to obay.[7]

12

The doubtfull Damzell dare not yet commit
Her single person to their barbarous truth,[8]
But still twixt feare and hope amazd does sit,
Late learnd° what harme to hastie trust ensu'th: taught
They in compassion of her tender youth,
And wonder of her beautie soveraine,° supreme
Are wonne with pitty and unwonted ruth,° unaccustomed pity
And all prostrate upon the lowly plaine,
Do kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nance faine.° glad

Their harts she ghesseth by their humble guise,° appearance
And yieldes her to extremitie of time;[9]
So from the ground she fearelesse doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect° of crime: suspicion
They all as glad, as birdes of joyous Prime,° springtime
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepheards ryme,
And with greene braunches strowing all the ground,
Do worship° her, as Queene, with olive girlond cround honor

14

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled Eccho ring,
And with their horned feet do weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant Spring.
So towards old Sylvanus they her bring;
Who with the noyse awaked, commeth out,
To weet° the cause, his weake steps governing learn
And aged limbs on Cypresse stadle° stout, staff
And with an yvie twyne his wast is girt about.

15

Far off he wonders, what them makes so glad,
Or Bacchus merry fruit they did invent,[1]
Or Cybeles franticke rites[2] have made them mad;
They drawing nigh, unto their God present
That flowre of faith and beautie excellent.
The God himselfe vewing that mirrhour rare,
Stood long amazd, and burnt in his intent;[3]

[7] I.e., teach their knees, bent backward like a goat's, to obey her.

[8] I.e., her solitary self to their wild allegiance ("barbarous truth").

[9] I.e., necessity of the time.

[1] I.e., whether ("or") they did find ("invent") wine grapes.

[2] Orgiastic dances in worship of Cybele, goddess of the powers of Nature.

[3] Glowed with intense concentration. Una is a "mirrhour rare" in the sense that she is a paragon, a perfect reflection of heavenly faith and beauty.

His owne faire Dryope now he thinkes not faire,
And Pholoe fowle, when her to this he doth compaire.[4]

16

The woodborne people fall before her flat,
And worship her as Goddesse of the wood;
And old Sylvanus selfe bethinkes not,° what cannot decide
To thinke of wight so faire, but gazing stood,
In doubt to deeme her borne of earthly brood;
Sometimes Dame Venus selfe he seemes to see,
But Venus never had so sober mood;
Sometimes Diana he her takes to bee,
But misseth bow, and shaftes, and buskins° to her knee. soft boots

17

By vew of her he ginneth to revive
His ancient love, and dearest Cyparisse,[5]
And calles to mind his pourtraiture alive,[6]
How faire he was, and yet not faire to° this, compared to
And how he slew with glauncing dart amisse
A gentle Hynd, the which the lovely boy

For griefe whereof the lad n'ould° after joy, would not
But pynd away in anguish and selfe-wild annoy.° self-willed suffering

The wooddy Nymphes, faire Hamadryades[7]

And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades,° water nymphs

But when they vewed have her heavenly grace,
They envie her in their malitious mind,
And fly away for feare of fowle disgrace:
But all the Satyres scorne their woody kind,° woodborn race
And henceforth nothing faire, but her on earth they find.

19

Glad of such lucke, the luckelesse lucky maid,
Did her content to please their feeble eyes,
And long time with that salvage people staid,
To gather breath in many miseries.
During which time her gentle wit she plyes,
To teach them truth, which worshipt her in vaine,
And made her th' Image of Idolatryes;[8]
But when their bootlesse° zeale she did restraine useless
From her own worship, they her Asse would worship fayn.° willingly

But in vaine glorious frayes° he litle did delight. frays, fights

And could not lacke° her lovers company, he without
But to the wood she goes, to serve her turne,
And seeke her spouse, that from her still° does fly, always
And followes other game and venery:[1]
A Satyre chaunst her wandring for to find,
And kindling coles of lust in brutish eye,
The loyall links of wedlocke did unbind,
And made her person thrall unto his beastly kind.

So long in secret cabin there he held
Her captive to his sensuall desire,
Till that with timely° fruit her belly sweld, ripening
And bore a boy unto that salvage sire:
Then home he suffred her for to retire,°
For ransome leaving him the late borne childe;
Whom till to ryper yeares he gan aspire,° grow up
He noursled° up in life and manners wilde, reared
Emongst wild beasts and woods, from lawes of mien exilde.

24

For all he taught the tender ymp,° was but child
To banish cowardize and bastard° feare; hose
His trembling hand he would him force to put Upon the Lyon and the rugged Beare,
And from the she Beares teats her whelps to teare;
And eke° wyld roring Buls he would him make also
To tame, and ryde their backes not made to beare;
And the Robuckes[2] in flight to overtake,
That every beast for feare of him did fly and quake.

(A lesson hard) and make the Libbard° sterne leopard
Leave roaring, when in rage he for revenge did earne.° yearn

26

And for to make his powre approved° more, demonstrated
Wyld beasts in yron yokes he would compell;
The spotted Panther, and the tusked Bore,
The Pardale° swift, and the Tigre cruell; female leopard
The Antelope, and Wolfe both fierce and fell;° savage
And them constraine in equall teme[3] to draw.
Such joy he had, their stubborne harts to quell,
And sturdie courage tame with dreadfull aw,
That his beheast they feared, as a tyrans law.

His loving mother came upon a day
Unto the woods, to see her little sonne;
And chaunst unwares° to meet him in the way, unexpectedly
After his sportes, and cruell pastime donne,
When after him a Lyonesse did runne,
That roaring all with rage, did lowd requere° dematid
Her children deare, whom he away had wonne:° seized
The Lyon whelpes she saw how he did beare,
And lull in rugged armes, withouten childish feare.

28

The fearefull Dame all quaked at the sight,
And turning backe, gan fast to fly away,
Untill with love revokt° from vaine affright, recalled
She hardly° yet perswaded was to stay, with difficulty
And then to him these womanish words gan say;
"Ah Satyrane, my dearling, and my joy,
For love of me leave off this dreadfull play;
To dally thus with death, is no fit toy,
Go find some other play-fellowes, mine own sweet boy.

29

In these and like delights of bloudy game
He trayned was, till ryper yeares he raught,° reached
And there abode, whilst any beast of name
Walkt in that forest, whom he had not taught
To feare his force: and then his courage haught° high
Desird of forreine foemen to be knowne;
And far abroad for straunge adventures sought:

[3] Side by side, yoked together in a team.

In which his might was never overthrowne,
But through all Faery lond his famous worth was blown.° spread

30

Yet evermore it was his manner faire,
After long labours and adventures spent,
Unto those native woods for to repaire,° return
To see his sire and ofspring° auncient. origin
And now he thither came for like intent;
Where he unwares the fairest Una found,
Straunge Lady, in so straunge habiliment,° , attire
Teaching the Satyres, which her sat around,
Trew sacred lore, which from her sweet lips did redound.° flow

31

He wondred at her wisedome heavenly rare,
Whose like in womens wit he never knew;
And when her curteous deeds he did compare,
Gan her admire, and her sad sorrowes rew,° pity
Blaming of Fortune, which such troubles threw,
And joyd to make proofe of her crueltie
On gentle Dame, so hurtlesse,° and SO trew. harmless
Thenceforth he kept her goodly company,
And learnd her discipline° of faith and veritie. teachings

32

But she all vowd° unto the Redcrosse knight, entirely promised
His wandring perill closely° did lament, secretly
Ne in this new acquaintaunce could delight,
But her deare° heart with anguish did torment, loving
And all her wit in secret counsels spent,
How to escape. At last in privie wise° privately
To Satyrane she shewed her intent;
Who glad to gain such favour, gan devise,
How with that pensive Maid he best might thence arise.° depart

33

So on a day when Satyres all were gone,
To do their service to Sylvanus old,
The gentle virgin left behind alone
He led away with courage stout and bold.
Too late it was, to Satyres to be told,
Or ever hope recover her againe:
In vaine he seekes that having cannot hold.
So fast he carried her with carefull paine,° painstaking care
That they the woods are past, and come now to the plaine.

34

The better part now of the lingring day,
They traveild had, when as they farre espide
A wearie wight forwandring° by the way, wandering far and wide
And towards him they gan in hast to ride,
To weet of newes, that did abroad betide,
Or tydings of her knight of the Redcrosse.

But he them spying, gan to turne aside,
For feare as seemd, or for some feigned Iosse;° pretended harm
More greedy they of newes, fast towards him do crosse.

35

A silly° man, in simple weedes forworne,° simple / worn out
And soild with dust of the long dried way;
His sandales were with toilesome travell torne,
And face all tand with scorching sunny ray,
As° he had traveild many a sommers day, as if
Through boyling sands of Arabie and Ynde;° India
And in his hand a Jacobs staffe,° to stay pilgrim's staff
His wearie limbes upon: and eke behind,
His scrip° did hang, in which his needments he did bind. hag

36

The knight approching nigh, of him inquerd
Tydings of warre, and of adventures new;
But warres, nor new adventures none he herd.
Then Una gan to aske, if ought° he knew, aught, anything
Or heard abroad of that her champion trew,
That in his armour bare a croslet° red. small cross
"Aye me, Deare dame," quoth he, "well may I rew
To tell the sad sight, which mine eies have red:° beheld
These eyes did see that knight both living and eke ded."

37

That cruell word her tender hart so thrild,° pierced
That suddein cold did runne through every vaine,
And stony horrour all her sences fild
With dying fit,° that downe she fell for paine. deathlike swoon
The knight her lightly° reared up againe, quickly
And comforted with curteous kind reliefer
Then wonne from death, she bad him tellen plaine
The further processe° of her hidden griefe; account
The lesser pangs can beare, who hath endured the chiefe.

38

Then gan the Pilgrim thus, "I chaunst this day,
This fatall day, that shall I ever rew,° rue, regret
To see two knights in travell on my way
(A sory° sight) arraunged° in battell new, grievous / drawn up
Both breathing vengeaunce, both of wrathfull hew:
My fearefull flesh did tremble at their strife,
To see their blades so greedily imbrew,[4]
That drunke with bloud, yet thristed after life:
What more? the Redcrosse knight was slaine with Paynim knife."

39

"Ah dearest Lord," quoth she, "how might that bee,
And he the stoutest knight, that ever wonne?"° lived
"Ah dearest dame," quoth he, "how might I see

[4] Soak themselves in blood.

The thing, that might not be, and yet was donne?"
"Where is," said Satyrane, "that Paynims sonne,
That him of life, and us of joy hath reft?"
"Not far away," quoth he, "he hence doth wonne[0] stay
Foreby[0] a fountaine, where I late him left close by Washing his bloudy wounds, that through[0] the Steele were cleft." by

40

Therewith the knight thence marched forth in hast,
Whiles Una with huge heavinesse[0] opprest, grief
Could not for sorrow follow him so fast;
And soone he came, as he the place had ghest,
Whereas that Pagan proud him selfe did rest,
In secret shadow by a fountaine side:
Even he it was, that earst° would have supprest[0] before / violated
Faire Una: whom when Satyrane espide,
With fowle reprochfull words he boldly him defide.

41

And said, "Arise thou cursed Miscreaunt,[0] infidel
That hast with knightlesse[0] guile and trecherous tramunknightly / deceit
Faire knighthood fowly shamed, and doest vaunt
That good knight of the Redcrosse to have slain:
Arise, and with like treason now maintain[0] defend Thy guilty wrong, or else thee guilty yield."
The Sarazin this hearing, rose amain,[0] at once
And catching up in hast his three square[0] shield, triangular
And shining helmet, soone him buckled to the field.

42

And drawing nigh him said, "Ah misborne Elfe,[5]
In evill houre thy foes thee hither sent,
Anothers wrongs to wreake upon thy selfe:
Yet ill thou blamest me, for having blent[0] stained
My name with guile and traiterous intent;
That Redcrosse knight, perdie,[0] I never slew, by God (pardieu)
But had he beene, where earst his armes were lent,
Th' enchaunter vaine his errour should not rew:
But thou his errour shalt, I hope now proven trew."[6]

Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,[0] fierce
To thunder blowes, and fiersly to assaile
Each other bent[0] his enimy to quell,[0] determined / hill
That with their force they perst[0] both plate and maile, pierced
And made wide furrowes in their fleshes fraile,
That it would pitty[0] any living eie. bring pity to Large floods of bloud adowne their sides did raile:° flow
But floods of bloud could not them satisfie:
Both hungred after death: both chose to win, or die.

[5] Base-born knight of Faerie Land ("Elfe").

[6] I.e., had Redcrosse been wearing his arms the enchanter Archimago would not have to regret his error in fighting rne. But you will now repeat that error and that regret,

So long they fight, and fell revenge pursue,
That fainting° each, themselves to breathen let, weakening
And oft refreshed, battell oft renue:
As when two Bores with rancling malice met,
Their gory sides fresh bleeding fiercely fret,° tear
Til breathlesse both them selves aside retire,
Where faming wrath, their cruell tuskes they whet,
And trample th' earth, the whiles they may respire;
Then backe to fight againe, new breathed and entire.° fresh

45

So fiersly, when these knights had breathed once,
They gan to fight returne, increasing more
Their puissant° force, and cruell rage attonce, mighty
With heaped strokes more hugely, then before,
That with their drerie° wounds and bloudy gore gory
They both deformed,° scarsely could be known. disfigured
By this sad Una fraught° with anguish sore, burdened
Led with their noise, which through the aire was thrown,
Arrived, where they in erth their fruitles bloud had sown.

Whom all so soone as that proud Sarazin
Espide, he gan revive the memory
Of his lewd lusts, and late attempted sin,
And left the doubtfull° battell hastily, undecided
To catch her, newly offred to his eie:
But Satyrane with strokes him turning, staid,
And sternely bad him other businesse plie,
Then° hunt the steps of pure unspotted Maid: than Wherewith he all enraged, these bitter speaches said

47

"O foolish faeries sonne, what furie mad
Hath thee incenst, to hast thy dolefull fate?
Were it not better, I that Lady had,
Then that thou hadst repented it too late?
Most sencelesse man he, that himselfe doth hate,
To love another. Lo then for thine ayd
Here take thy lovers token on thy pate."
So they to fight; the whiles the royall Mayd
Fled farre away, of that proud Paynim sore afrayd.

48

But that false Pilgrim, which that leasing° told, lie
Being in deed old Archimage, did stay
In secret shadow, all this to behold,
And much rejoyced in their bloudy fray:
But when he saw the Damsell passe away
He left his stond,° and her pursewd apace,
In hope to bring her to her last decay.° i.e., her death

But for to tell her lamentable cace,
And eke° this battels end, will need another place.[7] also

Canto 7

The Redcrosse knight is captive made
By Gyaunt proud opprest,° overwhelmed
Prince Arthur meets with Una greatly with those newes distrest.

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,° Wary
As to descry° the crafty cunning traitie,° perceive / guile
By which deceipt doth maske in visour° faire, a mask
And cast her colours dyed deepe in graine,[8]
To seeme like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame,
The guiltlesse man with guile to entertaine?° engage
Great maistresse of her art was that false Dame,
The false Duessa, cloked with Fidessaes name.

Who when returning from the drery Night,
She fownd not in that perilous house of Pryde,
Where she had left, the noble Redcrosse knight,
Her hoped pray, she would no Ienger bide,
But forth she went, to seeke him far and wide.
Ere long she fownd, whereas° he wearie sate, where
To rest him selfe, foreby° a fountaine side, beside Disarmed all of yron-coted Plate,
And by his side his steed the grassy forage ate.

He feedes upon the cooling shade, and bayes° bathes
His sweatie forehead in the breathing wind,
Which through the trembling leaves full gently playes
Wherein the cherefull birds of sundry kind
Do chaunt sweet musick, to delight his mind:
The Witch approaching gan him fairely° greet, courteously
And with reproch of carelesnesse° unkind indifference
Upbrayd, for leaving her in place unmeet,° unfitting
With fowle words tempring° faire, soure gall with hony sweet, mingling

Unkindnesse past, they gan of solace treat,° pleasure speak
And bathe in pleasaunce of the joyous shade,
Which shielded them against the boyling heat,
And with greene boughes decking a gloomy glade,
About the fountaine like a girlond made;
Whose bubbling wave did ever freshly well,
Ne ever would through fervent° sommer fade:° hot / dry up

---

[7] In fact Spenser never tells how the battle ended. But Satyrane reappears in Book 3.

[8] I.e., Deceit disposes her colors, thoroughly dyed, so as to seem like Truth.

The sacred Nymph, which therein wont° to dwell, was accustomed
Was out of Dianes favour, as it then befell.

The cause was this: one day when Phoebe[9] fayre
With all her band was following the chace,° hunt
This Nymph, quite tyred with heat of scorching ayre
Sat downe to rest in middest of the race:
The goddesse wroth gan fowly her disgrace,
And bad the waters, which from her did flow,
Be such as she her selfe was then in place.[0] there
Thenceforth her waters waxed dull and slow,
And all that drunke thereof, did faint and feeble grow.

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting[0] was, ignorant
And lying downe upon the sandie graile,[0] gravel
Drunke of the streame, as cleare as cristall glas;
Eftsoones[0] his manly forces gan to faile, immediately
And mightie strong was turnd to feeble fraile.
His chaunged powres at first themselves not felt,
Till crudled[0] cold his corage[0] gan assaile, congealing / vigor
And chearefuIP bloud in faintnesse chill did melt, lively
Which like a fever fit through all his body swelt.° raged

Yet goodly court he made still to his Dame,
Pourd out in loosnesse[1] on the grassy grownd,
Both carelesse of his health, and of his fame:[0] reputation
Till at the last he heard a dreadfull sownd,
Which through the wood loud bellowing, did rebownd,
That all the earth for terrour seemed to shake,
And trees did tremble. Th' Elfe therewith astownd,[0] amazed
Upstarted lightly[0] from his looser make,[2] quickly
And his unready weapons gan in hand to take.

But ere he could his armour on him dight,
Or get his shield, his monstrous enimy
With sturdie steps came stalking in his sight,
An hideous Geant horrible and hye,
That with his talnesse seemd to threat the skye,
The ground eke° groned under him for dreed;[0] also / dread
His living like saw never living eye,
Ne durst behold: his stature did exceed
The hight of three the tallest sonnes of mortall seed.

The greatest Earth his uncouth[0] mother was, vile; strange
And blustring Aeolus his boasted sire,[3]

I.e., Diana, goddess of the moon and of chas-

Spread out in lewdness ("loosnesse"); sexually pended.

[2] Too licentious ("looser") companion.

[3] Aeolus was keeper of the winds. The giant's descent from Earth and Wind links him to earthquakes.

Who with his breath, which through the world doth pas,
Her hollow womb did secretly inspire,° breathe into
And fild her hidden caves with stormie yre,° ire, anger
That she conceived; and trebling the dew time,
In which the wombes of women do expire, bring forth
Brought forth this monstrous masse of earthly slime,
Puft up with emptie wind, and fild with sinfull crime.

So growen great through arrogant delight
Of th' high descent, whereof he was yborne,
And through presumption of his matchlesse might,
All other powres and knighthood he did scorne.
Such now he marcheth to this man forlorne,° abandoned
And left to losse:° his stalking steps are stayde° destruction / supported
Upon a snaggy Oke,[4] which he had tome
Out of his mothers bowelles, and it made
His mortall° mace, wherewith his foemen he dismayde.[5] death-dealing

11

That when the knight he spide, he gan advance
With huge force and insupportable mayne,° hresistible power
And towardes him with dreadfull fury praunce;° strut
Who haplesse, and eke hopelesse, all in vaine
Did to him pace, sad battaile to darrayne,° engage
Disarmd, disgrast, and inwardly dismayde,
And eke so faint in every joynt and vaine,
Throtigh that fraile° fountaine, which him feeble made, enfeebling
That scarsely could he weeld his bootlesse° single blade. useless

12

The Geaunt strooke so maynly° mercilesse, mightily
That could have overthrowne a stony towre,
And were not heavenly grace, that him did blesse,
He had beene pouldred° all, as thin as flowre: powdered
But he was wary of that deadly stowre,° peril
And lightly° lept from underneath the blow: quickly
Yet so exceeding was the villeins powre,
That with the wind it did him overthrow,
And all his sences stound,° that still he lay full low. stunned

As when that divelish yron Engin° wrought i.e., cannon
In deepest Hell, and framd by Furies skill,
With windy Nitre and quick Sulphur fraught,[6]
And ramd with bullet round, ordaind to kill,
Conceiveth fire, the heavens it doth fill
With thundring noyse, and all the ayre doth choke,
That none can breath, nor see, nor heare at will,
Through smouldry cloud of duskish stincking smoke,
That th' onely breath him daunts,[7] who hath escapt the stroke.

---

[4] I.e., he uses as walking stick a knotty ("snaggy") oak tree.

[5] In its usual sense, but also "dis-made, dissolved."

[6] Filled ("fraught") with gunpowder ("Nitre" and "Sulphur").

[7] I.e., the blast or smell alone ("onely") overcomes him.

14

So daunted when the Geaunt saw the knight,
His heavie hand he heaved up on hye,
And him to dust thought to have battred quight,
Untill Duessa loud to him gan crye;
"O great Orgoglio,[8] greatest under skye,
O hold thy mortall hand for Ladies sake,
Hold for my sake, and do him not to dye,° do not cause him to die
But vanquisht thine eternall bondslave make,
And me thy worthy meed unto thy Leman take."[9]

15

He hearkned, and did stay° from further harmes, refrain
To gayne so goodly guerdon,° as she spake: reward
So willingly she came into his armes,
Who her as willingly to grace° did take, favor
And was possessed of his new found make.° mate
Then up he tooke the slombred° sencelesse corse, unconscious
And ere he could out of his swowne awake,
Him to his castle brought with hastie forse,
And in a Dongeon deepe him threw without remorse

16

From that day forth Duessa was his deare,
And highly honourd in his haughtie eye,
He gave her gold and purple pall° to weare, crimson robe of royalty
And triple crowne set on her head full hye,[1]
And her endowd with royall majestye:
Then for to make her dreaded more of men,
And peoples harts with awfull terrour tye,° bind
A monstrous beast ybred in filthy fen
He chose, which he had kept long time in darksome den.

17

Such one it was, as that renowmed Snake
Which great Alcides in Stremona slew,
Long fostred in the filth of Lerna lake,[2]
Whose many heads out budding ever new,
Did breed° him endlesse labour to subdew: cause
But this same Monster much more ugly was;
For seven great heads out of his body grew,
An yron brest, and backe of scaly bras,
And all embrewd° in bloud, his eyes did shine as glas. stained

18

His tayle was stretched out in wondrous length,
That to the house of heavenly gods it raught,° reached
And with extorted powre, and borrowed strength,

[8] Italian: pride, haughtiness, disdain.

[9] I.e., take me, your worthy reward, as your mistress.

[1] Duessa is attired like the Whore of Babylon in Revelation 17.3—4; the triple crown is that of the papacy (see canto 2, stanzas 13 and 22).

[2] The nine-headed Lernean hydra slain by Hercules (Alcides). The seven-headed monster recalls the red dragon of Revelation: "behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth . . . [he is] that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world" (12.3—14.9). Many Protestants associated the Beast with the Roman church.

The ever-burning lamps° from thence it brought, stars
And prowdly threw to ground, as things of nought;
And underneath his filthy feet did tread
The sacred things, and holy heasts foretaught.[3]
Upon this dreadfull Beast with sevenfold head
He set the false Duessa, for more aw and dread.

19

The wofull Dwarfe, which saw his maisters fall,
Whiles he had keeping of his grasing steed,
And valiant knight become a caytive° thrall, captive
When all was past, tooke up his forlorne weed,° abandoned garment
His mightie armour, missing most at need;
His silver shield, now idle maisterlesse;
His poynant° speare, that many made to bleed, sharp
The ruefull moniments° of heavinesse,° memorials / grief
And with them all departes, to tell his great distresse.

20

He had not travaild long, when on the way
He wofull Ladie, wofull Una met,
Fast flying from the Paynims greedy pray,° clutch
Whilest Satyrane him from pursuit did Iet:° prevent
Who when her eyes she on the Dwarfe had set,
And saw the signes, that deadly tydings spake,
She fell to ground for sorrowfull regret,° grief
And lively breath her sad brest did forsake,
Yet might her pitteous hart be seene to pant and quake.

21

The messenger of so unhappie newes
Would faine° have dyde: dead was his hart within, gladly
Yet outwardly some little comfort shewes:
At last recovering hart, he does begin
To rub her temples, and to chaufe her chin,
And every tender part does tosse and turne:
So hardly he the flitted life does win,
Unto her native prison to retourne:[4]
Then gins her grieved ghost° thus to lament and mourne. spirit

22

"Ye dreary instruments of dolefull sight,
That doe this deadly spectacle behold,
Why do ye Ienger feed on loathed light,
Or liking find to gaze on earthly mould,[5]
Sith° cruell fates the carefull° threeds unfould, since / intricate
The which my life and love together tyde?
Now let the stony dart of senselesse cold° i.e., death
Perce to my hart, and pas through every side,
And let eternall night so sad sight fro me hide.

[3] Doctrines ("holy heasts") previously taught.

[4] I.e., with such difficulty ("so hardly") he persuades ("does win") the life back to her body ("native prison").

[5] I.e., or find it pleasure to gaze on earthly forms ("mould").

"O lightsome day, the Iampe of highest Jove,
First made by him,[6] mens wandring wayes to guyde,
When darknesse he in deepest dongeon drove,
Henceforth thy hated face for ever hyde,
And shut up heavens windowes shyning wyde:
For earthly sight can nought but sorrow breed,
And late°-repentance, which shall long abyde. too late
Mine eyes no more on vanitie shall feed,
But seeled up with death, shall have their deadly meed."° reward of death

24

Then downe againe she fell unto the ground;
But he her quickly reared up againe:
Thrise did she sinke adowne in deadly swownd,
And thrise he her revived with busie paine:° care
At last when life recovered had the raine,° rein
And over-wrestled his strong enemie,
With foltring° tong, and trembling every vaine, faltering
"Tell on," quoth she, "the wofull Tragedie,
The which these reliques° sad present unto mine eie. remains

25

"Tempestuous fortune hath spent all her spight,
And thrilling° sorrow throwne his utmost dart; piercing
Thy sad tongue cannot tell more heavy plight,
Then that I feele, and harbour in mine hart:
Who hath endured the whole, can beare each part.
If death it be, it is not the first wound,
That launched° hath my brest with bleeding smart. pierced
Begin, and end the bitter balefuil stound;° time (of sorrow)
If lesse, then that° I feare, more favour I have found." than what

26

Then gan the Dwarfe the whole discourse° declare, story
The subtill traines° of Archimago old; wiles
The wanton loves of false Fidessa faire,
Bought with the bloud of vanquisht Paynirri bold:
The wretched payre transformed to treeri mould;° shape of a tree
The house of Pride, and perils round about;
The combat, which he with Sans joy did hould;
The lucklesse conflict with the Gyant stout,
Wherein captived, of life or death he stood in doubt.

27

She heard with patience all unto the end,
And strove to maister sorrowfull assay,° affliction
Which greater grew, the more she did contend,
And almost rent her tender hart in tway;° two
And love fresh coles unto her fire did lay:
For greater love, the greater is the Iosse.
Was never Ladie loved dearer day,[7]

[6] An allusion to Genesis 1.3: "And God said, Let there be light: and there was light."

[7] I.e., there was never a lady who loved life ("day") more dearly than she loved Redcrosse.

Then she did love the knight of the Redcrosse;
For whose deare sake so many troubles her did tosse.

28

At last when fervent sorrow slaked was,
She up arose, resolving him to find
Alive or dead: and forward forth doth pas,
All° as the Dwarfe the way to her assynd:° just / showed
And evermore in constant carefull mind
She fed her wound with fresh renewed bale;° anguish
Long tost with stormes, and bet° with bitter wind, beaten
High over hils, and low adowne the dale,
She wandred many a wood, and measurd many a vale.

29

At last she chaunced by good hap to meet
A goodly knight, faire marching by the way
Together with his Squire, arayed meet:° properly
His glitterand° armour shined farre away, glittering
Like glauncing° light of Phoebus brightest ray; flashing
From top to toe no place appeared bare,
That deadly dint° of Steele endanger may: stroke
Athwart his brest a bauldrick[8] brave° he ware, splendid
That shynd, like twinkling stars, with stons most pretious rare.

30

And in the midst thereof one pretious stone
Of wondrous worth, and eke of wondrous mights,° powers
Shapt like a Ladies head, exceeding shone,
Like Hesperus° emongst the lesser lights,° evening star / stars
And strove for to amaze the weaker sights;
Thereby his mortall blade full comely hong

Of mother pearle, and buckled with a golden tong.° pin

His haughtie helmet, horrid° all with gold, bristling
Both glorious brightnesse, and great terrour bred;
For all the crest a Dragon did enfold
With greedie pawes, and over all did spred
His golden wings: his dreadfull hideous hed
Close couched on the bever,° seemed to throw visor
From flaming mouth bright sparkles fierie red,
That suddeine horror to faint harts did show;
And scaly tayle was stretcht adowne his backe full low.

32

Upon the top of all his loftie crest,° top of helmet
A bunch of haires discolourd° diversly, dyed
With sprincled pearle, and gold full richly drest,
Did shake, and seemed to daunce for jollity,

On top of greene Selinis[9] all alone,
With blossomes brave bedecked daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one
At every little breath, that under heaven is blowne.

His warlike shield all closely covered was,
Ne might of mortall eye be ever seene;
Not made of Steele, nor of enduring bras,
Such earthly mettals soone consumed bene:
But all of Diamond perfect pure and cleene° clear
It framed was, one massie entire mould,[1]
Hewen out of Adamant rocke with engines° keene, tools
That point of speare it never percen could,
Ne dint of direfull sword divide the substance would.

The same to wight° he never wont disclose, creature
But° when as monsters huge he would dismay, except
Or daunt unequall armies of his foes,
Or when the flying heavens he would affray;[2]
For so exceeding shone his glistring ray,
That Phoebus golden face it did attaint,° make dim
As when a cloud his beames doth over-lay;
And silver Cynthia° wexed pale and faint, the moon
As when her face is staynd with magicke arts constraint.[3]

35

No magicke arts hereof had any might,
Nor bloudie wordes of bold Enchaunters call,
But all that was not such, as seemd in sight,
Before that shield did fade, and suddeine fall:
And when him list° the raskall routes° appall, wanted to / unruly mobs

And stones to dust, and dust to nought at all;

Both shield, and sword, and armour all he wrought
For this young Prince,[4] when first to armes he fell;° came

[4] The reference to Merlin indicates that the prince is Arthur (who had been mentioned in the canto's prefatory quatrain). In the Letter to Ralegh, he is identified with "magnificence," understood as the perfection of all the virtues and containing them all.

But when he dyde, the Faerie Queene it brought

With lovely court° he gan her entertaine; kind courtesy
But when he heard her answers loth, he knew

Which to allay, and calme her storming paine,
Faire feeling words he wisely gan display,° pour forth
And for her humour fitting purpose faine/[1]

Wherewith emmoved, these bleeding words she gan to say.

"What worlds delight, or joy of living speach
Can heart, so plunged in sea of sorrowes deepe,
And heaped with so huge misfortunes, reach?
The carefuIP cold beginneth for to creepe, afflicting
And in my heart his yron arrow steepe,

Such helplesse harmes yts better hidden keepe,
Then rip up° griefe, where it may not availe, than lay open
My last left comfort is, my woes to weepe and waile."

4°

"Ah Ladie deare," quoth then the gentle knight,
"Well may I weene,° your griefe is wondrous great; suppose
For wondrous great griefe groneth in my spright,° spirit
Whiles thus I heare you of your sorrowes treat.
But wofull Ladie let me you intrete,
For to unfold the anguish of your hart:
Mishaps are maistred by advice discrete,
And counsell mittigates the greatest smart;
Found never helpe, who never would his hurts impart."[7]

41

"O but," quoth she, "great griefe will not be tould,
And can more easily be thought, then said."
"Right so"; quoth he, "but he, that never would,
Could never: will to might gives greatest aid."[8]

If then it find not helpe, and breedes despaire."
"Despaire breedes not," quoth he, "where faith is staid."° firm
"No faith so fast," quoth she, "but flesh does paire."° impair
"Flesh may empaire," quoth he, "but reason can repaire."

His goodly reason, and well guided speach

That her perswaded to disclose the breach,° wound
Which love and fortune in her heart had wrought,

Ere she had ended all, she gan to faint:
But he her comforted and faire bespake,
"Certes, Madame, ye have great cause of plaint,
That stoutest heart, I weene, could cause to quake.
But be of cheare, and comfort to you take:
For till I have acquit° your captive knight, freed
Assure your selfe, I will you not forsake."
His chearefull words revived her chearelesse spright,
So forth they went, the Dwarfe them guiding ever right.

Canto 8

Faire virgin to redeeme her deare brings Arthur to the fight:
Who slayes the Gyant, wouitds the beast,
and strips Duessa quight. ° free

Ay me, how many perils doe enfold
The righteous man, to make him daily fall?
Were not, that heavenly grace doth him uphold,
And stedfast truth acquite° him out of all. deliver
Her love is firme, her care continuall,
So oft as he through his owne foolish pride,
Or weaknesse is to sinfull bands° made thrall: bonds
Else should this Redcrosse knight in bands have dyde,
For whose deliverance she this Prince doth thither guide.

They sadly traveild thus, untill they came
Nigh to a castle builded strong and hie:
Then cryde the Dwarfe, "Io yonder is the same;
In which my Lord my liege doth lucklesse lie,
Thrall to that Gyants hatefull tyrannie:
Therefore, deare Sir, your mightie powres assay."° put to trial
The noble knight alighted by and by° immediately

[8] I.e., forever ("for aie") without hope of rescue ("remedilesse").

From loftie steede, and bad the Ladie stay.
To see what end of fight should him befall that day.

So with the Squire, th' admirer of his might,
He marched forth towards that castle wall;
Whose gates he found fast shut, ne living wight
To ward° the same, nor answere commers call. guard
Then tooke that Squire an home of bugle° small, wild ox
Which hong adowne his side in twisted gold,
And tassels gay. Wyde wonders over all° everywhere
Of that same homes great vertues weren told,[9]
Which had approved° bene in uses manifold. demonstrated

Was never wight, that heard that shrilling sound,
But trembling feare did feele in every vaine;
Three miles it might be easie heard around,
And Ecchoes three answered it selfe againe:
No false enchauntment, nor deceiptfull traine°
Might once abide the terror of that blast,
But presently° was voide and wholly vaine: at once
No gate so strong, no Iocke so firme and fast,
But with that percing noise flew open quite, or birast.° burst

The same before the Geants gate he blew,
That all the castle quaked from the ground,
And every dore of freewill open flew.
The Gyant selfe dismaied with that sownd,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance° fownd, amorous play
In hast came rushing forth from inner bowre,
With staring° countenance sterne, as one astownd, glaring
And staggering steps, to weet, what suddein stowre° disturbance
Had wrought that horror strange, and dared his dreaded powre.

And after him the proud Duessa came,
High mounted on her manyheaded beast,
And every head with fyrie tongue did flame,
And every head was crowned on his creast,
And bloudie mouthed with late cruell feast.
That when the knight beheld, his mightie shild
Upon his manly arme he soone addrest,° made ready
And at him fiercely flew, with courage fild,
And eger greedinesse° through every member thrild eagerness for battle

Therewith the Gyant buckled him to fight,
Inflamed with scornefull wrath and high disdaine,° indignation
And lifting up his dreadfull club on hight,
All armed with ragged snubbes° and knottie graine, snags

"Wide wonders" (marvelous tales) told of the horn connect it with the horn of the legendary French ro Roland and the ram's horn of Joshua, with which he razed the walls of Jericho (Joshua 6.5).

Him thought at first encounter to have slaine.
But wise and warie was that noble Pere,° peer
And lightly leaping from so monstrous maine,° force
Did faire° avoide the violence him nere; quite
It booted nought, to thinke, such thunderbolts to beare.[1]

Ne shame he thought to shunne so hideous might:
The idle° stroke, enforcing furious way, useless
Missing the marke of his misaymed sight
Did fall to ground, and with his° heavie sway° its I force
So deepely dinted in the driven clay,
That three yardes deepe a furrow up did throw:
The sad earth wounded with so sore assay,° assault
Did grone full grievous underneath the blow,
And trembling with strange feare, did like an earthquake show.

As when almightie Jove in wrathfull mood,
To wreake° the guilt of mortall sins is bent,° punish / disposed Hurles forth his thundring dart with deadly food,° hatred (feud)
Enrold in flames, and smouldring dreriment,° smothering darkness
Through riven cloudes and molten firmament;
The fierce threeforked engin° making way, weapon
Both loftie towres and highest trees hath rent,
And all that might his angrie passage stay,
And shooting in the earth, casts up a mount of clay.

10

His boystrous° club, so buried in the ground, massive
He could not rearen up againe so light,° easily
But that the knight him at avantage found,
And whiles he strove his combred° clubbe to quight° encumbered / release
Out of the earth, with blade all burning bright
He smote off his left arme, which like a blocke
Did fall to ground, deprived of native might;
Large streames of bloud out of the truncked stocke° truncated stump
Forth gushed, like fresh water streame from riven rocke.[2]

Dismaied with so desperate deadly wound,
And eke° impatient of unwonted paine,[3] also
He loudly brayd with beastly yelling sound,
That all the fields rebellowed againe;
As great a noyse, as when in Cymbrian[4] plaine
An heard of Bulles, whom kindly° rage doth sting, natural
Do for the milkie mothers want complaine,[5]
And fill the fields with troublous bellowing,
The neighbour woods around with hollow murmur ring.

[1] I.e., it was useless to think of withstanding such blows.

29

That when his deare Duessa heard, and saw
The evill stownd, that daungerd her estate,[6]
Unto his aide she hastily did draw
Her dreadfull beast, who swolne with bloud of late
Came ramping° forth with proud presumpteous gate,° rearing / gait
And threatned all his heads like flaming brands.° torches
But him the Squire made quickly to retrate, Encountring fierce with single° sword in hand, only
And twixt him and his Lord did like a bulwarke stand.

13

The proud Duessa full of wrathfull spight,
And fierce disdaine, to be affronted so,
Enforst her purple° beast with all her might scarlet
That stop° out of the way to overthroe, obstacle
Scorning the let° of so unequall foe: hindrance
But nathemore° would that courageous swayne never the more
To her yeeld passage, gainst his Lord to goe,
But with outrageous° strokes did him restraine, exceedingly fierce
And with his bodie bard the way atwixt them twaine.

14

Then tooke the angrie witch her golden cup,
Which still° she bore, replete with magick artes;[7] always
Death and despeyre did many thereof sup,
And secret poyson through their inner parts,
Th' eternall bale° of heavie wounded harts;
Which after charmes and some enchauntments said,
She lightly sprinkled on his weaker° parts; too weak
Therewith his sturdie courage soone was quayd,° quelled
And all his senses were with suddeine dread dismayd.

15

So downe he fell before the cruell beast,
Who on his necke his bloudie clawes did seize,
That life nigh crusht out of his panting brest:
No powre he had to stirre, nor will to rize.
That when the carefull° knight gan well avise,° watchful / observe
He lightly° left the foe, with whom he fought, quickly
And to the beast gan turne his enterprise;
For wondrous anguish in his hart it wrought,
To see his loved Squire into such thraldome° brought. slavery

16

And high advauncing° his bloud-thirstie blade, lifting up
Stroke one of those deformed heads so sore,[8]
That of his puissance° proud ensample made; strength
His monstrous scalpe° downe to his teeth it tore skull
And that misformed shape mis-shaped more:

[6] I.e., the peril ("stownd") that endangered her state.

[7] Alludes to the golden cup of the woman in Revelation, which is "full of abominations and filthiness of her fornications" (17.4); the chalice of the Roman church; and the cup of Circe, the sorceress who turned men into beasts (in Odyssey 10).

[8] "I saw one of. . . [the beast's] heads as it were wounded to death" (Revelation 13.3).

A sea of bloud gusht from the gaping wound,
That her gay garments staynd with filthy gore,
And overflowed all the field around;
That over shoes in bloud he waded on the ground.

17

Thereat he roared for exceeding paine,
That to have heard, great horror would have bred,° produced
And scourging th' emptie ayre with his long traine,° tail
Through great impatience of his grieved hed[9]
His gorgeous ryder from her loftie sted° place
Would have cast downe, and trod in durtie myre,
Had not the Gyant soone her succoured;
Who all enraged with smart° and franticke yre,° pain / anger
Came hurtling in full fierce, and forst the knight retyre.

The force, which wont° in two to be disperst, used
In one alone left hand[1] he now unites,
Which is through rage more strong then both were erst;° before
With which his hideous club aloft he dites,° raises
And at his foe with furious rigour° smites, violence
That strongest Oake might seeme to overthrow:
The stroke upon his shield so heavie lites,
That to the ground it doubleth him full low:
What mortall wight could ever beare so monstrous blow?

*9

And in his fall his shield, that covered was,
Did loose his vele° by chaunce, and open flew: its covering
The light whereof, that heavens light did pas,° surpass
Such blazing brightnesse through the aier threw,
That eye mote not the same endure to vew.
Which when the Gyaunt spyde with staring eye,
He downe let fall his arme, and soft withdrew
His weapon huge, that heaved was on hye
For to have slaine the man, that on the ground did lye.

20

And eke the fruitfull-headed° beast, amazed many-headed
At flashing beames of that sunshiny shield,
Became starke blind, and all his senses dazed,
That downe he tumbled on the durtie field,
And seemed himselfe as conquered to yield.
Whom when his maistresse proud perceived to fall,
Whiles yet his feeble feet for faintnesse reeld,
Unto the Gyant loudly she gan call,
"O helpe Orgoglio, helpe, or else we perish all."

At her so pitteous cry was much amooved
Her champion stout, and for to ayde his frend,° lover
Againe his wonted° angry weapon prooved:° usual / tried

---

[9] I.e., through inability to endure ("impatience") his afflicted ("grieved") head.

[1] I.e., in the one hand left to him.

But all in vaine: for he has read his end
In that bright shield, and all their forces spend Themselves in vaine: for since that glauncing° sight, flashing
He hath no powre to hurt, nor to defend;
As where th' Almighties lightning brond° does light, firebrand
It dimmes the dazed eyen, and daunts the senses quight

22

Whom when the Prince, to battell new addrest,
And threatning high his dreadfull stroke did see,
His sparkling blade about his head he blest,° brandished
And smote off quite his right leg by the knee,
That downe he tombled; as an aged tree,
High growing on the top of rocky clift,
Whose hartstrings with keene Steele nigh hewen be,
The mightie trunck halfe rent, with ragged rift° split
Doth roll adowne the rocks, and fall with fearefull drift.° impact

23

Or as a Castle reared high and round,
By subtile engins and malitious slight[2]
Is undermined from the lowest ground,
And her foundation forst,° and feebled quight, shattered
At last downe falles, and with her heaped hight
Her hastie ruine does more heavie make,
And yields it selfe unto the victours might;
Such was this Gyaunts fall, that seemed to shake
The stedfast globe of earth, as° it for feare did quake. as if

24

The knight then lightly° leaping to the pray, quickly
With mortall Steele him smot againe so sore,
That headlesse his unweldy bodie lay,
All wallowd in his owne fowle bloudy gore,
Which flowed from his wounds in wondrous store.° abundance
But soone as breath out of his breast did pas,
That huge great body, which the Gyaunt bore,
Was vanisht quite, and of that monstrous mas
Was nothing left, but like an emptie bladder was.

25

Whose grievous fall, when false Duessa spide,
Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crowned mitre[3] rudely° threw aside; violently
Such percing griefe her stubborne hart did wound,
That she could not endure that dolefull stound,° sorrow
But leaving all behind her, fled away:
The light-foot Squire her quickly turned around,
And by hard meanes enforcing her to stay,
So brought unto his Lord, as his deserved pray.

[3] An allusion to the pope's triple tiara,

26

The royall Virgin, which beheld from farre,
In pensive° plight, and sad perplexitie, anxious
The whole atchievement of this doubtfull warre,[4]
Came running fast to greet his victorie,
With sober gladnesse, and myld modestie,
And with sweet joyous cheare° him thus bespake; countenance
"Faire braunch of noblesse, flowre of chevalrie,
That with your worth the world amazed make,
How shall I quite° the paines, ye suffer for my sake? requite

"And you° fresh bud of vertue springing fast, i.e., the Squire
Whom these sad eyes saw nigh unto deaths dore,
What hath poore Virgin for such perill past,
Wherewith you to reward? Accept therefore
My simple selfe, and service evermore;
And he that high does sit, and all things see
With equall° eyes, their merites to restore,° impartial / reward
Behold what ye this day have done for mee,
And what I cannot quite, requite with usuree.° interest

28

"But sith° the heavens, and your faire handeling° since / conduct
Have made you maister of the field this day,
Your fortune maister eke with governing,[5]
And well begun end all so well, I pray,
Ne let that wicked woman scape away;
For she it is, that did my Lord bethrall,
My dearest Lord, and deepe in dongeon lay,
Where he his better dayes hath wasted all.[6]
O heare, how piteous he to you for ayd does call."

29

Forthwith he gave in charge unto his Squire,
That scarlot whore to keepen carefully;
Whiles he himselfe with greedie° great desire eager
Into the Castle entred forcibly,
Where living creature none he did espye;
Then gan he lowdly through the house to call:
But no man cared to answere to his crye.
There raignd a solemne silence over all,
Nor voice was heard, nor wight was seene in bowre or hall.

30

At last with creeping crooked pace forth came
An old old man, with beard as white as snow,
That on a staffe his feeble steps did frame,° support
And guide his wearie gate° both too and fro: gait
For his eye sight him failed long ygo,

Those were the keyes of every inner dore,
But he could not them use, but kept them still in store.

But very uncouth° sight was to behold, strange
How he did fashion his untoward° pace, awkward
For as he forward mooved his footing old,
So backward still was turned his wrincled face,
Unlike to men, who ever as they trace,° walk
Both feet and face one way are wont to lead.
This was the auncient keeper of that place,
And foster father of the Gyant dead;
His name Ignaro° did his nature right aread.° Ignorance / declare

32

His reverend haires and holy gravitie
The knight much honord, as beseemed well,° seemed proper
And gently° askt, where all the people bee, courteously
Which in that stately building wont to dwell.
Who answerd him full soft, he could not tell.
Againe he askt, where that same knight was layd,
Whom great Orgoglio with his puissaunce fell
Had made his caytive° thrall; againe he sayde, captive
He could not tell: ne ever other answere made.

33

Then asked he, which way he in might pas:
He could not tell, againe he answered.
Thereat the curteous knight displeased was,
And said, "Old sire, it seemes thou hast not red° recognized
How ill it sits with° that same silver hed suits
In vaine to mocke, or mockt in vaine to bee:
But if thou be, as thou art pourtrahed
With natures pen, in ages grave degree,
Aread° in graver wise, what I demaund° of thee." answer/ask

34

His answere likewise was, he could not tell.
Whose sencelesse speach, and doted° ignorance foolish
When as the noble Prince had marked well,
He ghest his nature by his countenance,
And calmd his wrath with goodly temperance.
Then to him stepping, from his arme did reach
Those keyes, and made himselfe free enterance.
Each dore he opened without any breach;° forcing
There was no barre to stop, nor foe him to empeach.° hinder

35

There all within full rich arayd he found,
With royal arras° and resplendent gold, tapestry
And did with store of every thing abound,
That greatest Princes presence° might behold. person

But all the floore (too filthy to be told)
With bloud of guiltlesse babes, and innocents trew,[7]
Which there were slaine, as sheepe out of the fold,
Defiled was, that dreadfull was to vew,
And sacred ashes over it was strowed new.

36

And there beside of marble stone was built
An Altare, carved with cunning imagery,° images
On which true Christians bloud was often spilt,
And holy Martyrs often doen to dye,° put to death
With cruell malice and strong tyranny:
Whose blessed sprites from underneath the stone
To God for vengeance cryde continually,[8]
And with great griefe were often heard to grone,
That hardest heart would bleede, to heare their piteous mone.

37

Through every rowme he sought, and every bowr,
But no where could he find that wofull thrall:
At last he came unto an yron doore,
That fast was lockt, but key found not at all
Emongst that bounch, to open it withall;
But in the same a little grate was pight,° placed
Through which he sent his voyce, and lowd did call
With all his powre, to weet,° if living wight learn
Were housed therewithin, whom he enlargen° might. set free

38

Therewith an hollow, dreary, murmuring voyce
These piteous plaints and dolours° did resound; laments
"O who is that, which brings me happy choyce
Of death,[9] that here lye dying every stound,° moment
Yet live perforce in balefull° darkenesse bound? evil
For now three Moones have changed thrice their hew,° shape
And have beene thrice hid underneath the ground,
Since I the heavens chearefull face did vew,
O welcome thou, that doest of death bring tydings trew."

39

Which when that Champion heard, with percing point
Of pitty deare° his hart was thrilled° sore, extreme / pierced
And trembling horrour ran through every joynt,
For ruth of gentle knight so fowle forlore:° grievously lost
Which shaking off, he rent that yron dore,
With furious force, and indignation fell;° fierce
Where entred in, his foot could find no flore,

[7] Probably alluding to Herod's massacre of the Innocents (Matthew 2.16), who were traditionally viewed as the first martyrs for Christ.

[8] "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" (Revelation 6.9-10).

[9] I.e., the chance or right to choose death.

But all a deepe descent, as darke as hell,
That breathed ever forth a filthie banefull smell.

40

But neither darkenesse fowle, nor filthy bands,° bonds
Nor noyous° smell his purpose could withhold,
(Entire affection hateth nicer° hands) too fastidious
But that with constant zeale, and courage bold,
After long paines and labours manifold,
He found the meanes that Prisoner up to reare;
Whose feeble thighes, unhable to uphold
His pined° corse, him scarse to light could beare, wasted
A ruefull spectacle of deathe and ghastly drere.° sorrow, wretchedness

41

His sad dull eyes deepe sunck in hollow pits,
Could not endure th' unwonted° sunne to view; unaccustomed
His bare thin cheekes for want of better bits,° food
And empty sides deceived° of their dew, cheated
Could make a stony hart his hap to rew;° to pity his lot
His rawbone armes, whose mighty brawned bowrs° brawny muscles
Were wont to rive Steele plates, and helmets hew,
Were cleane consumed, and all his vitall powres
Decayd, and all his flesh shrank up like withered flowres.

Whom when his Lady saw, to him she ran
With hasty joy: to see him made her glad,
And sad to view his visage pale and wan,
Who earst° in flowres of freshest youth was clad. formerly
Tho° when her well of teares she wasted° had, then / ext.
She said, "Ah dearest Lord, what evill starre
On you hath fround, and pourd his influence bad,
That of your selfe ye thus berobbed arre,
And this misseeming hew° your manly looks doth rnarre? unseemly appearance

43

"But welcome now my Lord, in wele or woe,
Whose presence I have Iackt to long a day;
And fie on Fortune mine avowed foe,
Whose wrathfull wreakes° them selves do now alay. punishments
And for these wrongs shall treble penaunce pay
Of treble good: good growes of evils priefe."[1]
The chearelesse man, whom sorrow did dismay,° unnerve
Had no delight to treaten° of his griefe; speak
His Ions endured famine needed more reliefe.

'Faire Lady," then said that victorious knight,° i.e., Arthur-
"The things, that grievous were to do, or beare,
Them to renew,° I wote,° breeds no delight; recall / know
Best musicke breeds delight in loathing eare:
But th' onely good, that growes of passed feare,

---

[1] I.e., Fortune will now make amends for his wrongs with triple benefits, as good comes from evils endured ("priefe").

Is to be wise, and ware° of like agein. wary
This dayes ensample hath this lesson deare
Deepe written in my heart with yron pen,
That blisse may not abide in state of mortall men.

45

"Henceforth sir knight, take to you wonted strength,
And maister these mishaps with patient might;
Loe where your foe lyes stretcht in monstrous length,
And loe that wicked woman in your sight,
The roote of all your care, and wretched plight,
Now in your powre, to let her live, or dye."
"To do her dye," quoth Una, "were despight,[2]
And shame t' avenge so weake an enimy;
But spoile° her of her scariot robe, and let her fly." despoil, strip

46

So as she bad, that witch they disaraid,
And robd of royall robes, and purple pall,° cloak
And ornaments that richly were displaid;
Ne spared they to strip her naked all.
Then when they had despoild her tire° and call,° robe/caul, headdress
Such as she was, their eyes might her behold,
That her misshaped parts did them appall,
A loathly, wrinckled hag, ill favoured, old,
Whose secret filth good manners biddeth not be told.

47

Her craftie head was altogether bald,
And as in hate of honorable eld,° age
Was overgrowne with scurfe° and filthy scald;[3] scabs
Her teeth out of her rotten gummes were feld,° fallen
And her sowre breath abhominably smeld;
Her dried dugs,° like bladders lacking wind, breasts
Hong downe, and filthy matter from them weld;° welled
Her wrizled° skin as rough, as maple rind, wrinkled
So scabby was, that would have loathd° all womankind revolted

48

Her neather parts, the shame of all her kind,° i.e., womankind
My chaster° Muse for shame doth blush to write; too chaste
But at her rompe she growing had behind
A foxes taile, with dong all fowly dight;° covered
And eke her feete most monstrous were in sight;
For one of them was like an Eagles claw,
With griping talaunts armd to greedy fight,
The other like a Beares uneven° paw: rough
More ugly shape yet never living creature saw.[4]

49

Which when the knights beheld, amazd they were,
And wondred at so fowle deformed wight.

---

[2] I.e., to cause her to die would be spiteful.

[3] A scabby disease of the scalp.

[4] The passage alludes to Revelation 17.16: "these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked." Foxes were emblems of cunning; eagles and bears, of rapacity, cruelty, and brutality.

"Such then," said Una, "as she seemeth here,
Such is the face of falshood, such the sight
Of fowle Duessa, when her borrowed light
Is laid away, and counterfesaunce° knowne."   deceit
Thus when they had the witch disrobed quight,
And all her filthy feature° open showne,   form
They let her goe at will, and wander wayes unknowne.

50

She flying fast from heavens hated face,
And from the world that her discovered° wide,   exposed to view
Fled to the wastful° wildernesse apace,   desolate
From living eyes her open shame to hide,
And lurkt in rocks and caves long unespide.
But that faire crew° of knights, and Una faire   company
Did in that castle afterwards abide,
To rest them selves, and weary powres repaire,
Where store they found of all, that dainty° was and rare.   precious

Canto 9

His loves and lignage° Arthur tells: lineage
The knights knit friendly hands:°   bonds
Sir Trevisan flies from Despayre,
Whom Redcrosse knight withstands.

O goodly golden chaine,[5] wherewith yfere°   together
The vertues linked are in lovely wize:°   manner
And noble minds of yore allyed were,
In brave poursuit of chevalrous emprize,°   adventure
That none did others safety despize,°   disregard
Nor aid envy° to him, in need that stands,   begrudge
But friendly each did others prayse devize
How to advaunce with favourable hands,
As this good Prince redeemd the Redcrosse knight from bands.

Who when their powres, empaird through labour long,
With dew repast° they had recured° well,   rest / restored
And that weake captive wight now wexed° strong,   waxed, grown
Them list° no lenger there at leasure dwell,   they cared
But forward fare, as their adventures fell,
But ere they parted, Una faire besought
That straunger knight his name and nation tell;
Least° so great good, as he for her had wrought,   lest
Should die unknown, and buried be in thanklesse thought.

"Faire virgin," said the Prince, "ye me require
A thing without the compas of° my wit: beyond the reach of

[5] The golden chain of love or concord that binds the world and the human race together (cf. 220—22 and note).

For both the lignage and the certain Sire,
From which I sprong, from me are hidden yit.
For all so soone as life did me admit
Into this world, and shewed heavens light,
From mothers pap I taken was unfit:° i.e., wot yet weaned
And streight delivered to a Faery knight,
To be upbrought in gentle thewes° and martiall might. manners

"Unto old Timon[6] he me brought bylive,° immediately
Old Timon, who in youthly yeares hath beene
In warlike feates th' expertest man alive,
And is the wisest now on earth I weene;
His dwelling is low in a valley greene,
Under the foot of Rauran mossy hore,° gray
From whence the river Dee as silver cleene° pure
His tombling billowes rolls with gentle rore:[7]
There all my dayes he traind me up in vertuous lore.

"Thither the great Magicien Merlin came,
As was his use,° ofttimes to visit me: custom
For he had charge my discipline° to frame, education
And Tutours nouriture° to oversee. upbringing
Him oft and oft I askt in privitie,
Of what Ioines and what lignage I did spring:
Whose aunswere bad me still assured bee,
That I was sonne and heire unto a king,
As time in her just terme° the truth to light should bring." due course

"Well worthy impe,"° said then the Lady gent,° offspring / gentle
"And Pupill fit for such a Tutours hand.
But what adventure, or what high intent
Hath brought you hither into Faery land,
Aread° Prince Arthur,[8] crowne of Martiall band?" declare
"Full hard it is," quoth he, "to read° aright discern
The course of heavenly cause, or understand
The secret meaning of th' eternall might,
That rules mens wayes, and rules the thoughts of living wight.

"For whither he through fatall deepe foresight[9]
Me hither sent, for cause to me unghest,
Or that fresh bleeding wound, which day and night
Whilome° doth rancle in my riven brest, all the while
With forced fury following his behest,° its command
Me hither brought by wayes yet never found,
You to have helpt I hold my selfe yet blest."

[6] The name means "honor."

[7] The hill Rauran is in Wales; the river Dee also flows in, and forms part of the boundary of, Wales. The Tudors (Queen Elizabeth's family) were originally Welsh, and the legends of Arthur had their beginnings in the Celtic mythology of early Wales.

[8] Arthur had been named in the quatrains that precede cantos 7 and 8, but not previously in the body of the text.

[9] I.e., whether he (God, "th' eternall might") sent me here through foresight ordained by fate ("fatall").

"Ah curteous knight," quoth she, "what secret wound
Could ever find,° to grieve the gentlest hart on ground?" succeed

"Deare Dame," quoth he, "you sleeping sparkes awake,
Which troubled once, into huge flames will grow,
Ne ever will their fervent fury slake
Till living moysture into smoke do flow,
And wasted° life do lye in ashes low. consumed
Yet sithens° silence lesseneth not my fire, since
But told it flames, and hidden it does glow,
I will revele, what ye so much desire:
Ah Love, lay downe thy bow, the whiles I may respire.° take breath

"It was in freshest flowre of youthly yeares,
When courage first does creepe in manly chest,
Then first the coale of kindly° heat appeares natural
To kindle love in every living brest;
But me had warnd old Timons wise behest,
Those creeping flames by reason to subdew,
Before their rage grew to so great unrest,
As miserable lovers use° to rew, are accustomed
Which still wex° old in woe, whiles woe still wexeth new. grow

10

"That idle name of love, and lovers life,
As° losse of time, and vertues enimy as being
I ever scornd, and joyd to stirre up strife,
In middest of their mournfull Tragedy,
Ay wont to laugh, when them I heard to cry,
And blow the fire, which them to ashes brent:° burned
Their God himselfe, grieved at my libertie,
Shot many a dart at me with fiers intent,
But I them warded all with wary government.[1]

11

"But all in vaine: no fort can be so strong,
Ne fleshly brest can armed be so sound,
But will at last be wonne with battrie° long, siege
Or unawares at disavantage found;
Nothing is sure, that growes on earthly ground:
And who most trustes in arme of fleshly might,
And boasts, in beauties chaine not to be bound,
Doth soonest fall in disaventrous° fight, disastrous
And yeeldes his caytive° neck to victours most° despight. captive / greatest

12

"Ensample make of him your haplesse joy,° i.e., Redcrosse
And of my selfe now mated,° as ye see; overcome
Whose prouder° vaunt that proud avenging boy too proud
Did soone pluck downe, and curbd my libertie.
For on a day prickt° forth with jollitie spurred

---

[1] I.e., self-control. The descriptions here of Cupid's archery and of the siege of the castle of chastity (in the next stanza) have many echoes from the courtly love tradition.

Of looser° life, and heat of hardiment,° too loose / boldness
Raunging the forest wide on courser free,
The fields, the floods, the heavens with one consent
Did seeme to laugh on me, and favour mine intent.

"For-wearied° with my sports, I did alight utterly wearied
From loftie steed, and downe to sleepe me layd;
The verdant° gras my couch did goodly dight,° green / make
And pillow was my helmet faire displayd:
Whiles every sence the humour sweet embayd,[2]
And slombring soft my hart did steale away,
Me seemed, by my side a royall Mayd
Her daintie limbes full softly down did lay:
So faire a creature yet saw never sunny day.

14

"Most goodly glee° and lovely blandishment° entertainment / compliment
She to me made, and bad me love her deare,
For dearely sure her love was to me bent,
As when just time expired[3] should appeare.
But whether dreames delude, or true it were,
Was never hart so ravisht with delight,
Ne living man like words did ever heare,
As she to me delivered all that night;
And at her parting said, She Queene of Faeries hight.[4]

15

"When I awoke, and found her place devoyd,° empty
And nought but pressed gras, where she had lyen,
I sorrowed all so much, as earst I joyd,
And washed all her place with watry eyen.
From that day forth I loved that face divine;
From that day forth I cast in careful° mind, care-filled
To seeke her out with labour, and long tyne,° hardship
And never vowd° to rest, till her I find, vowed never Nine monethes I seeke in vaine yet ni'll° that vow unbind." will not

16

Thus as he spake, his visage wexed pale,
And chaunge of hew great passion did bewray;° reveal
Yet still he strove to cloke his inward bale,° grief
And hide the smoke, that did his fire display,
Till gentle Una thus to him gan say;
"O happy Queene of Faeries, that hast found
Mongst many, one that with his prowesse may
Defend thine honour, and thy foes confound:
True Loves are often sown, but seldom grow on ground."

17

"Thine, O then," said the gentle Redcrosse knight,
"Next to that Ladies love, shalbe the place,

[2] I.e., while the dew ("humour") of sleep pervaded ("embayd") every sense.
[3] A fitting length of time having passed.
[4] Was called. In the background are many folktales and ballads of a hero bewitched by a fairy. Spenser's Letter to Ralegh identifies Gloriana allegorically with glory and with Queen Elizabeth.

O fairest virgin, full of heavenly light,
Whose wondrous faith, exceeding earthly race,
Was firmest fixt in mine extremest case.° plight
And you, my Lord, the Patrone° of my life, protector
Of that great Queene may well gaine worthy grace:
For onely worthy you through prowes priefe° demonstration of prowess
Yf living man mote° worthy be, to be her liefe."° may / love

18

So diversly discoursing of their loves,
The golden Sunne his glistring head gan shew,
And sad remembraunce now the Prince amoves,
With fresh desire his voyage to pursew:
Als° Una earnd° her traveill to renew. also / yearned
Then those two knights, fast friendship for to bynd,
And love establish each to other trew,
Gave goodly gifts, the signes of gratefull mynd,
And eke as pledges firme, right hands together joynd.

19

Prince Arthur gave a boxe of Diamond sure,° true
Embowd° with gold and gorgeous ornament,
Wherein were closd few drops of liquor pure,
Of wondrous worth, and vertue° excellent, power
That any wound could heale incontinent:° immediately
Which to requite, the Redcrosse knight him gave
A booke, wherein his Saveours testament
Was writ with golden letters rich and brave;° splendid
A worke of wondrous grace, and able soules to save.

20

Thus beene they parted, Arthur on his way
To seeke his love, and th' other for to fight
With Unas foe, that all her realme did pray.° prey on
But she now weighing the decayed plight,
And shrunken synewes of her chosen knight,
Would not a while her forward course pursew,
Ne bring him forth in face of dreadfull fight,
Till he recovered had his former hew:° appearance
For him to be yet weake and wearie well she knew.

So as they traveild, lo they gan espy
An armed knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemed from some feared foe to fly,
Or other griesly thing, that him agast.° terrified
Still° as he fled, his eye was backward cast, continually
As if his feare still followed him behind;
Als flew his steed, as he his bands had brast,° broken
And with his winged heeles did tread the wind,
As he had beene a fole of Pegasus his kind.[5]

---

[5] I.e., as if he had been a foal of a horse like Pegasus, the flying horse of classical mythology.

22

Nigh as he drew, they might perceive his head
To be unarmd, and curld uncombed heares
Upstaring° stiffe, dismayd with uncouth° dread;   bristling / strange
Nor drop of bloud in all his face appeares
Nor life in limbe: and to increase his feares,
In fowle reproch° of knighthoods faire degree,°   disgrace / condition
About his neck an hempen rope he weares,
That with his glistring armes does ill agree;
But he of rope or armes has now no memoree.

The Redcrosse knight toward him crossed fast,
To weet,° what mister° wight was so dismayd: learn / kind of
There him he finds all sencelesse and aghast,
That of him selfe he seemd to be afrayd;
Whom hardly° he from flying forward stayd,   with difficulty
Till he these wordes to him deliver might;
"Sir knight, aread° who hath ye thus arayd,   declare
And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight:
For never knight I saw in such misseeming° plight."   unseemly

24

He answerd nought at all, but adding new
Feare to his first amazment, staring wide
With stony eyes, and hartlesse hollow hew,[6]
Astonisht stood, as one that had aspide
Infernall furies, with their chaines untide.
Him yet againe, and yet againe bespake
The gentle knight; who nought to him replide,
But trembling every joynt did inly quake,
And foltring tongue at last these words seemd forth to shake.

25

"For Gods deare love, Sir knight, do me not stay;
For loe he comes, he comes fast after mee."
Eft° looking backe would faine have runne away;
But he him forst to stay, and tellen free
The secret cause of his perplexitie:°   distress
Yet nathemore° by his bold hartie speach,   not at all
Could his bloud-frosen hart emboldned bee,
But through his boldnesse rather feare did reach,
Yet forst, at last he made through silence suddein breach

26

"And am I now in safetie sure," quoth he,
"From him, that would have forced me to dye?
And is the point of death now turnd fro mee,
That I may tell this haplesse history?"°   story of misfortune
"Feare nought:" quoth he, "no daunger now is nye."
"Then shall I you recount a ruefull cace,"°   pitiable event

---

[6] I.e., with blanched, bloodless countenance.

Said he, "the which with this unlucky eye
I late beheld, and had not greater grace
Me reft° from it, had bene partaker of the place.[7] carried

27

"I lately chaunst (Would I had never chaunst)
With a faire knight to keepen companee,
Sir Terwin[8] hight,° that well himselfe advaunst named
In all affaires, and was both bold and free,
But not so happie as mote happie bee:
He loved, as was his lot, a Ladie gent,°
That him againe° loved in the least degree: in return
For she was propd, and of too high intent,° mind
And joyd to see her lover languish and lament.

28

"From whom returning sad and comfortlesse,° desolate
As on the way together we did fare,
We met that villen (God from him me blesse°) defend
That cursed wight, from whom I scapt whyleare,° a while before
A man of hell, that cals himselfe Despaire;[9]
Who first us greets, and after faire areedes° tells
Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:
So creeping close, as Snake in hidden weedes,
Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.

29

"Which when he knew, and felt our feeble harts
Embost° with bale,° and bitter byting griefe, exhausted / sorrow
Which love had launched° with his deadly darts, pierced
With wounding words and termes of foule repriefe° insult
He pluckt from us all hope of due reliefe,
That earst° us held in love of lingring life; formerly
Then hopelesse hartlesse, gan the cunning thiefe
Perswade us die, to stint° all further strife:
To me he lent this rope, to him a rustie° knife. i.e., bloodstained

30

"With which sad instrument of hastie death,
That wofull lover, loathing lenger° light, longer-
A wide way made to let forth living breath.
But I more fearefull, or more luckie wight,
Dismayd with that deformed dismall sight,
Fled fast away, halfe dead with dying feare:° fear of death
Ne yet assur'd of life by you, Sir knight,
Whose like infirmitie like chaunce may beare:
But God you never let his charmed speeches heare."[1]

31

"How may a man," said he, "with idle speach
Be wonne, to spoyle° the Castle of his health?" destroy

---

[7] I.e., shared the same fate.

[8] His name may connote weariness or fatigue ("terwyn").

[9] Despair is the ultimate Christian sin, denying the possibility of divine mercy and grace.

[1] I.e., may God never let you hear his mesmerizing ("charmed") speeches.

"I wote," quoth he, "whom trialP late did teach, experience
That like would not[2] for all this worldes wealth:
His subtill tongue, like dropping honny, mealt'th° melts
Into the hart, and searcheth every vaine,
That ere one be aware, by secret stealth
His powre is reft, and weaknesse doth remaine.
O never Sir desire to try° his guilefull traine."° test I treachery

32
"Certes,"° said he, "hence shall I never rest, surely
Till I that treachours art have heard and tride;
And you Sir knight, whose name mote° I request, might
Of grace° do me unto his cabin° guide." favor I cave
"I that hight° Trevisan,"[3] quoth he, "will ride am called Against my liking backe, to doe you grace:° a favor
But nor for gold nor glee[4] will I abide
By you, when ye arrive in that same place;
For lever° had I die, then° see his deadly face." rather/than 33

Ere long they come, where that same wicked wight
His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
Farre underneath a craggie clift ypight,° placed
Darke, dolefull, drearie, like a greedie grave,
That still° for carrion carcases doth crave: continually
On top whereof aye° dwelt the ghastly Owle,[5] ever
Shrieldng his balefull note, which ever drave
Farre from that haunt all other chearefull fowle;
And all about it wandring ghostes did waile and howle.

34
And all about old stockes° and stubs of trees, stumps
Whereon nor fruit, nor leafe was ever seene,
Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;° crags
On which had many wretches hanged beene,
Whose carcases were scattered on the greene,
And throwne about the cliffs. Arrived there,
That bare-head knight for dread and dolefull teene,° grief
Would faine° have fled, ne durst approachen neare, gladly
But th' other forst him stay, and comforted in feare.

35
That darkesome cave they enter, where they find
That cursed man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein° mind; morose
His griesie° lockes, long growen, and unbound, gray
Disordred hong about his shoulders round,
And hid his face; through which his hollow eyne
Lookt deadly dull, and stared as astound;° as if stunned
His raw-bone cheekes through penurie and pine,° starvation
Were shronke into his jawes, as° he did never dine. as if

[2] I.e., would not do the like again.

[3] The meaning is uncertain, but may be "flight" or "dread."

[4] Beauty; i.e., not for anything in the world.

[5] Traditionally a messenger of death,

His garment nought but many ragged clouts,° rags
With thornes together pind and patched was,
The which his naked sides he wrapt abouts;
And him beside there lay upon the gras
A drearie corse,° whose life away did pas, bloody corpse
All wallowd in his owne yet luke-warme blood,
That from his wound yet welled fresh alas;
In which a rustie knife fast fixed stood,
And made an open passage for the gushing flood

37

Which piteous spectacle, approving° trew confirming
The wofull tale that Trevisan had told,
When as the gentle Redcrosse knight did vew,
With firie zeale he burnt in courage bold,
Him to avenge, before his bloud were cold,
And to the villein said, "Thou aged damned wight,
The author of this fact,° we here behold, deed
What justice can but judge against thee right,
With thine owne bloud to price° his bloud, here shed in sight?" pay for

38

"What franticke fit," quoth he, "hath thus distraught
Thee, foolish man, so rash a doome° to give?
What justice ever other judgement taught,
But he should die, who merites not to live?
None else to death this man despayring drive,° drove
But his owne guiltie mind deserving death.
Is then unjust to each his due to give?
Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?° in hardship

39

"Who travels by the wearie wandring way,
To come unto his wished home in haste,
And meetes a flood, that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace to helpe him over past,
Or free his feet, that in the myre sticke fast?
Most envious man, that grieves at neighbours good,
And fond,° that joyest in the woe thou hast, foolish
Why wilt not let him passe, that long hath stood
Upon the banke, yet wilt thy selfe not passe the flood?

40

"He there does now enjoy eternall rest
And happie ease, which thou doest want and crave,
And further from it daily wanderest:
What if some litle paine the passage have,
That makes fraile flesh to feare the bitter wave?
Is not short paine well borne, that brings long ease,
And layes the soule to sleepe in quiet grave?

Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas,
Ease after warre, death after life does greatly please."[6]

41

The knight much wondred at his suddeine wit,° quick intelligence
And said, "The terme of life is limited,
Ne may a man prolong, nor shorten it;
The souldier may not move from watchfull sted,[7]
Nor leave his stand, untill his Captaine bed."° commands
"Who life did limit by almightie doome," Quoth he, "knowes best the termes established;
And he, that points the Centonell his roome,° station
Doth license him depart at sound of morning droome.[8]

42

"Is not his deed, what ever thing is donne,
In heaven and earth? did not he all create
To die againe? all ends that was begonne.
Their times in his eternall booke of fate
Are written sure, and have their certaine° date. fixed
Who then can strive with strong necessitie,
That holds the world in his still chaunging state,
Or shunne the death ordaynd by destinie?
When houre of death is come, let none aske whence, nor why.

43

"The Ienger° life, I wote° the greater sin, longer / know
The greater sin, the greater punishment:
All those great battels, which thou boasts to win,
Through strife, and bloud-shed, and avengement,
Now praysd, hereafter deare° thou shalt repent: bitterly
For life must life, and bloud must bloud repay.[9]
Is not enough thy evill life forespent?
For he, that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth goe, the further he doth stray.

44

"Then do no further goe, no further stray,
But here lie downe, and to thy rest betake,
Th' ill to prevent, that life ensewen may.[1]
For what hath life, that may it loved make,
And gives not rather cause it to forsake?
Feare, sicknesse, age, losse, labour, sorrow, strife,
Paine, hunger, cold, that makes the hart to quake;
And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,
Ail which, and thousands mo° do make a loathsome life. more

[6] Despaire's arguments on behalf of suicide as against a painful life are derived, like those of Hamlet in his third soliloquy (Hamlet 3.1.58-90), principally from Seneca, Marcus Aurelius, other ancient Stoics, and Old Testament statements on divine justice.

[7] The sentry post assigned him.

[8] Drum, with a pun on doom.

[9] An echo of Genesis 9.6: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

[1] I.e., to prevent the evil that will ensue in the rest of your life.

29

"Thou wretched man, of death hast greatest need,
If in true ballance thou wilt weigh thy state:
For never knight, that dared warlike deede,
More lucklesse disaventures° did amate:° mishaps / daunt
Witnesse the dongeon deepe, wherein of late
Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call;
And though good lucke prolonged hath thy date,° span of life
Yet death then, would the like mishaps forestall,
Into the which hereafter thou maiest happen fall.° happen to fall

46

"Why then doest thou, O man of sin, desire
To draw thy dayes forth to their last degree?
Is not the measure of thy sinfull hire° service to sin
High heaped up with huge iniquitie,
Against the day of wrath,° to burden thee? Judgment Day
Is not enough that to this Ladie milde
Thou falsed° hast thy faith with perjurie,° betrayed / oath-breaking
And sold thy selfe to serve Duessa vilde,° vile
With whom in all abuse thou hast thy selfe defilde?

47

"Is not he just, that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and beares an equall° eye? impartial
Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,
And guiltie be of thine impietie?
Is not his law, Let every sinner die:[2]
Die shall all flesh? what then must needs be donne,
Is it not better to doe willinglie,
Then linger, till the glasse° be all out ronne? hourglass
Death is the end of woes: die soone, O faeries sonne."

The knight was much enmoved with his speach,
That as a swords point through his hart did perse,
And in his conscience made a secret breach,° wound
Well knowing true all, that he did reherse° recount
And to his fresh remembrance did reverse° bring back
The ugly vew of his deformed crimes,
That all his manly powres it did disperse,
As he were charmed with inchaunted rimes,
That oftentimes he quakt, and fainted° oftentimes. lost heart

49

In which amazement, when the Miscreant° misbeliever
Perceived him to waver weake and fraile,
Whiles trembling horror did his conscience dant,° daunt
And hellish anguish° did his soule assaile, i.e., fear of hell
To drive him to despaire, and quite to quaile,° be dismayed
He shewed him painted in a table° plaine, picture

---

[2] Despaire cites only half of the Scripture verse: "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Romans 6.23).

The damned ghosts, that doe in torments waile,
And thousand feends that doe them endlesse paine
With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remaine.

50

The sight whereof so throughly him dismaid,
That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
And ever burning wrath before him laid,
By righteous sentence of th' Almighties law:
Then gan the villein him to overcraw,° exult over
And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison, fire,
And all that might him to perdition draw;
And bad him choose, what death he would desire:
For death was due to him, that had provokt Gods ire.

51

But when as none of them he saw him take,
He to him raught° a dagger sharpe and keene, reached
And gave it him in hand: his hand did quake,
And tremble like a leafe of Aspin greene,
And troubled bloud through his pale face was seene
To come, and goe with tydings from the hart,
As it a running messenger had beene.
At last resolved to worke his finall smart,
He lifted up his hand, that backe againe did start.

Which when as Una saw, through every vaine
The crudled° cold ran to her well of life,° congealing / heart
As in a swowne: but soone relived° againe, revived
Out of his hand she snatcht the cursed knife,
And threw it to the ground, enraged rife,° deeply
And to him said, "Fie, fie, faint harted knight,
What meanest thou by this reprochfull° strife°? deserving reproach
Is this the battell, which thou vauntst to fight
With the fire-mouthed Dragon, horrible and bright?

53

"Come, come away, fraile, feeble, fleshly wight,
Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
Ne divelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.° spirit
In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why shouldst thou then despeire, that chosen[3] art?
Where justice growes, there grows eke° greater grace, also
The which doth quench the brond° of hellish smart, firebrand
And that accurst hand-writing[4] doth deface.° blot out
Arise, Sir knight arise, and leave this cursed place."

[3] Cf. 2 Thessalonians 2.13: "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." This is one of several similar passages in the epistles of St. Paul that form the basis of the theological doctrine of predestination.

[4] An echo of Colossians 2.14: "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances [i.e., the Old Testament Law] that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross."

29

So up he rose, and thence amounted° streight. mounted his horse
Which when the carle° beheld, and saw his guest churl
Would safe depart, for° all his subtill sleight, in spite of
He chose an halter° from among the rest, noose
And with it hung himselfe, unbid° unblest. unprayedfor
But death he could not worke himselfe thereby;
For thousand times he so himselfe had drest,° made ready
Yet nathelesse it could not doe° him die, make
Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

Canto 10

Her faithfull knight faire Una brings to house of Holinesse,
Where he is taught repentance, and the way to heavenly blesse. ° bliss

i

What man is he, that boasts of fleshly might,
And vaine assurance of mortality,° mortal life
Which all so soone, as it doth come to fight,
Against spirituall foes, yeelds by and by,° immediately
Or from the field most cowardly doth fly?
Ne let the man ascribe it to his skill,
That thorough° grace hath gained victory. through
If any strength we have, it is to ill,
But all the good is Gods, both power and eke° will.[5] also

By that, which lately hapned, Una saw,
That this her knight was feeble, and too faint;
And all his sinews woxen weake and raw,° unready
Through long enprisonment, and hard constraint,° affliction
Which he endured in his late restraint,
That yet he was unfit for bloudie fight:
Therefore to cherish him with diets daint,° choice
She cast° to bring him, where he chearen° might, resolved / be cheered
Till he recovered had his° late decayed plight. i.e., from his

There was an auntient house not farre away,
Renowmd throughout the world for sacred lore,
And pure unspotted life: so well they say
It governd was, and guided evermore,
Through wisedome of a matrone grave and hore;° hoar, venerable
Whose onely joy was to relieve the needes
Of wretched soules, and helpe the helpelesse pore:
All night she spent in bidding of her bedes,° saying prayers
And all the day in doing good and godly deedes.

[5] "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Ephesians 2.8—9); "it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Philippians 2.13).

Dame Caelia° men did her call, as thought Heavenly
From heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters, well upbrought
In goodly thewes,° and godly exercise:° habits / deeds
The eldest two most sober, chast, and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza virgins were,
Though spousd, yet wanting° wedlocks solemnize; lacking
But faire Charissa to a lovely fere° loving mate
Was lincked, and by him had many pledges dere.[6]

Arrived there, the dore they find fast lockt;
For it was warely watched night and day,
For feare of many foes: but when they knockt,
The Porter opened unto them streight way:
He was an aged syre, all hory gray,
With lookes full lowly cast, and gate° full slow, gait
Wont° on a staffe his feeble steps to stay, accustomed
Hight Humilta.° They passe in stouping low; called Humility
For streight and narrow was the way, which he did show.[7]

Each goodly thing is hardest to begin,
But entred in a spacious court they see,
Both plaine, and pleasant to be walked in,
Where them does meete a francklin[8] faire and free,
And entertaines with comely courteous glee,
His name was Zele,° that him right well became, zeal
For in his speeches and behaviour hee
Did labour lively to expresse the same,
And gladly did them guide, till to the Hall they came.

There fairely them receives a gentle Squire,
Of milde demeanure, and rare courtesie,
Right cleanly clad in comely sad° attire; sober
In word and deede that shewed great modestie,
And knew his good° to all of each degree, proper respect
Hight Reverence. He them with speeches meet° fitting
Does faire entreat; no courting nicetie,[9]
But simple true, and eke unfained sweet,
As might become a Squire so great persons to greet.

And afterwards them to his Dame he leades,
That aged Dame, the Ladie of the place:

[6] I.e., many children. The daughters' names mean "faith," "hope," and "charity"; cf. the three Saracens: Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy. This canto draws heavily on scriptural references, especially 1 Corinthians 13.13: "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity." Many aspects of the House of Holiness oppose their counterparts in the House of Pride (1.4). "Spousd": betrothed. "Solemnize": solemnization.

[7] Alluding to Matthew 7.13-14: see the note to stanza 10 below.

[8] Freeholder, landowner.

[9] He treats them courteously ("faire"); no courtly affectation ("nicetie").

Who all this while was busie at her beades:
Which doen, she up arose with seemely grace,
And toward them full matronely[1] did pace.
Where when that fairest Una she beheld,
Whom well she knew to spring from heavenly race,
Her hart with joy unwonted inly sweld,° swelled
As feeling wondrous comfort in her weaker eld.° older age

And her embracing said, "O happie earth,
Whereon thy innocent feet doe ever tread,
Most vertuous virgin borne of heavenly berth,
That to redeeme thy woefull parents head,
From tyrans rage, and ever-dying dread,° constant fear of death
Hast wandred through the world now long a day° many a long day
Yet ceasest not thy wearie soles to lead,
What grace hath thee now hither brought this way?
Or doen thy feeble feet unweeting° hither stray? unwittingly

10

"Strange thing it is an errant° knight to see wandering
Here in this place, or any other wight,
That hither turnes his steps. So few there bee,
That chose the narrow path, or seeke the right:
All keepe the broad high way, and take delight
With many rather for to go astray,
And be partakers of their evill plight,
Then with a few to walke the rightest way;[2]
O foolish men, why haste ye to your owne decay?

11

"Thy selfe to see, and tyred limbs to rest,
O matrone sage," quoth she, "I hither came,
And this good knight his way with me addrest,° directed
Led with thy prayses and broad-blazed fame,
That up to heaven is blowne."[3] The auncient Dame
Him goodly greeted in her modest guise,
And entertaynd them both, as best became,
With all the court'sies,° that she could devise, courtesies
Ne wanted ought,° to shew her bounteous or wise. nor lacked anything

12

Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,° talk
Loe two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinked arme in arme in lovely wise,° loving fashion
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbred even steps and equall pace:
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,

---

[1] Like a matron, i.e., a woman in charge of an establishment.

[2] An echo of Matthew 7.13—14: "Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: . . . strait is the gate and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

[3] I.e., your praises and fame are widely celebrated ("blazed"), reaching ("blowne") up to heaven.

Like sunny beames threw from her Christall face,
That could have dazd° the rash beholders sight, dazzled
And round about her head did shine like heavens light.

She was araied° all in Iilly white, arrayed
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
With wine and water fild up to the hight,
In which a Serpent[4] did himselfe enfold,
That horrour made to all, that did behold;
But she no whit did chaunge her constant mood:° expression
And in her other hand she fast did hold
A booke, that was both signd and seald with blood,
Wherein darke° things were writ, hard to be understood.' obscure

r4

Her younger sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blew, that her beseemed well;
Not all
so chearefull seemed she of sight,° in appearance
As was her sister; whether dread° did dwell, fear
Or anguish in her hart, is har4 to tell:
Upon her arme a silver anchor[6] lay,
Whereon she leaned ever, as befell:° as was fitting
And
ever up to heaven, as she did pray,
Her stedfast eyes were bent, ne swarved other way.
They seeing Una, towards her gan wend,° walk
Who them encounters° with like courtesie; meets
Many kind speeches they betwene them spend,
And greatly joy each other well to see:
Then to the knight with shamefast° modestie humble
They turne themselves, at Unas meeke request,
And him salute with well beseeming glee;° appropriate joy
Who faire them quites,° as him beseemed best, requites
And goodly gan discourse of many a noble gest.° deed

16

Then Una thus; "But she your sister deare,
The deare Charissa where is she become'?° gone to
Or wants° she health, or busie is elsewhere?" is lacking
"Ah no," said they, "but forth she may not come:
For she of late is Iightned of her wombe,
And hath encreast the world with one sonne more,[7]
That her to see should be but troublesome."
"Indeede," quoth she, "that should her trouble sore,
But thankt be God, that her encrease so evermore."[8]

---

[4] The cup of wine and water signifies the sacrament of Communion; the serpent is a symbol of the crucified Christ (of whom the serpent lifted up by Moses, Numbers 21.9, is a recognized "type" or prefiguration).

[5] The New Testament. See 2 Peter 3.16: "in which [i.e., in the epistles of the apostle Paul] are some things hard to be understood."

[6] The iconographic symbol of hope.

[7] Charity, the fruitful virtue, is often depicted as a mother with many children.

[8] I.e., God be thanked, who continually increases her thus.

29

Then said the aged Caelia, "Deare dame,
And you good Sir, I wote° that of your toyle, know
And labours long, through which ye hither came,
Ye both forwearied° be: therefore a whyle utterly weary
I read° you rest, and to your bowres recoyle."[9] counsel
Then called she a Groome, that forth him led
Into a goodly lodge, and gan despoile° disrobe
Of puissant armes, and laid in easie bed;
His name was meeke Obedience rightfully ared.° understood

18

Now when their wearie limbes with kindly° rest, natural
And bodies were refresht with due repast,° repose
Faire Una gan Fidelia faire request,
To have her knight into her schoolehouse plaste,
That of her heavenly learning he might taste,
And heare the wisedome of her words divine.
She graunted, and that knight so much agraste,° favored
That she him taught celestiall discipline,° instruction
And opened his dull eyes, that light mote in them shine.

And that her sacred Booke, with bloud° ywrit, i.e., the blood of Christ
That none could read, except she did them teach,
She unto him disclosed every whit,
And heavenly documents° thereout did preach, doctrines
That weaker wit of man could never reach,
Of God, of grace, of justice, of free will,
That wonder was to heare her goodly speach:
For she was able, with her words to kill,
And raise againe to life the hart, that she did thrill.° pierce

20

And when she list° poure out her larger spright,° chose to / greater power
She would commaund the hastie Sunne to stay,
Or backward turne his course from heavens hight;
Sometimes great hostes of men she could dismay,
Dry-shod to passe, she parts the flouds in tway;
And eke huge mountaines from their native seat
She would commaund, themselves to beare away,
And throw in raging sea with roaring threat.
Almightie God her gave such powre, and puissance great.[1]

21

The faithfull knight now grew in litle space,° time
By hearing her, and by her sisters lore,
To such perfection of all heavenly grace,
That wretched world he gan for to abhore,[2]

[9] Retire to your rooms.

[1] Joshua made the sun stand still (Joshua 10.12); Hezekiah made it turn backward (2 Kings 20.10); with 300 men Gideon was victorious over the Midianite hosts (Judges 7.7); Moses led the Israelites through the parted waters of the Red Sea (Exodus 14.21—31); faith, said Christ, can move mountains (Matthew 21.21). All these are miracles of faith.

[2] I.e., he began to abhor the world.

And mortall life gan loath, as thing forelore,[0] doomed
Greeved with remembrance of his wicked wayes,
And prickt with anguish of his sinnes so sore,
That he desirde to end his wretched dayes:
So much the dart of sinfull guilt the soule dismayes.

22

But wise Speranza gave him comfort sweet,
And taught him how to take assured hold
Upon her silver anchor, as was meet;
Else had his sinnes so great, and manifold
Made him forget all that Fidelia told.
In this distressed doubtfull[0] agonie, fearful
When him his dearest Una did behold,
Disdeining life, desiring leave to die,
She found her selfe assayld with great perplexitie.[0] distress

And came to Caelia to declare her smart,[0] pain
Who well acquainted with that commune[0] plight, common
Which sinfull horror[0] workes in wounded hart, horror of sin
Her wisely comforted all that she might,
With goodly counsell and advisement right;
And streightway sent with carefull diligence,
To fetch a Leach,[0] the which had great insight doctor
In that disease of grieved[0] conscience, distressed
And well could cure the same; His name was Patience.

24

Who comming to that soule-diseased knight,
Could hardly[0] him intreat, to tell his griefe: with difficulty
Which knowne, and all that noyd[0] his heavie spright troubled
Well searcht,[0] eftsoones[0] he gan apply reliefe probed / immediately
Of salves and med'cines, which had passing priefe,[3]
And thereto added words of wondrous might:
By which to ease he him recured briefe,[0] restored quickly
And much asswaged the passion[0] of his plight, suffering
That he his paine endured, as seeming now more light.

But yet the cause and root of all his ill,
Inward corruption, and infected sin,[4]
Not purged nor heald, behind remained still,
And festring sore did rankle yet within,
Close[0] creeping twixt the marrow and the skin. secretly
Which to extirpe,[0] he laid him privily extirpate
Downe in a darkesome lowly place farre in,
Whereas[0] he meant his corrosives to apply, where
And with streight[0] diet tame his stubborne malady. strict

26

In ashes and sackcloth he did array
His daintie corse,[0] proud humors[5] to abate, handsome body

[3] Which had extraordinary power.

[4] Apparently, the effects of original sin.

[5] The "humors" (bodily fluids) that conduce to pride. In Renaissance physiology, the proportions

And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both earely and eke late:
And ever as superfluous flesh did rot
Amendment readie still at hand did wayt,
To pluck it out with pincers firie whot,° hot
That soone in him was left no one corrupted jot.

And bitter Penance with an yron whip,
Was wont him once to disple° every day: discipline
And sharpe Remorse his hart did pricke and nip,
That drops of bloud thence like a well did play;
And sad Repentance used to embay° bathe
His bodie in salt water smarting sore,
The filthy blots of sinne to wash away.[6]
So in short space they did to health restore
The man that would not live, but earst° lay at deathes dore formerly

28

In which his torment often was so great,
That like a Lyon he would cry and rore,
And rend his flesh, and his owne synewes eat.
His own deare Una hearing evermore
His ruefull shriekes and gronings, often tore
Her guiltlesse garments, and her golden heare,
For pitty of his paine and anguish sore;
Yet all with patience wisely she did beare;
For well she wist, his crime could else be never cleare.° cleansed

29

Whom thus recovered by wise Patience,
And trew Repentance they to Una brought:
Who joyous of his cured conscience,
Him dearely kist, and fairely° eke besought courteously
Himselfe to chearish,° and consuming thought cheer; cherish

Her necke and breasts were ever open bare,

And on her head she wore a tyre° of gold,   headdress

Scattred with bushy thornes, and ragged breares,[0] briers
Which still before him she removed away,
That nothing might his ready passage stay:
And ever when his feet encombred were,
Or gan to shrinke, or from the right to stray,
She held him fast, and firmely did upbeare,
As carefull Nourse her child from falling oft does reare.

Eftsoones unto an holy Hospitall,[0] hospice
That was fore[0] by the way, she did him bring, close
In which seven Bead-men[0] that had vowed all men of prayer
Their life to service of high heavens king
Did spend their dayes in doing godly thing:
Their gates to all were open evermore,
That by the wearie way were traveiling,
And one sate wayting ever them before,
To call in commers-by, that needy were and pore.[9]

37

The first of them that eldest was, and best,[0] chiefest
Of all the house had charge and governement,
As Guardian and Steward of the rest:
His office[0] was to give entertainement duty
And lodging, unto all that came, and went:
Not unto such, as could him feast againe,[0]
And double quite,[0] for that he on them spent, repay
But such, as want of harbour[0] did constraine:[0] shelter / afflict
Those for Gods sake his dewty was to entertaine.

38

The second was as Almner[1] of the place,
His office was, the hungry for to feed,
And thristy give to drinke, a worke of grace:
He feard not once him selfe to be in need,
Ne cared to hoord for those, whom he did breede:[0] i.e., his children
The grace of God he layd up still in store,
Which as a stocke[0] he left unto his seede;[0] resource / children
He had enough, what need him care for more?
And had he lesse, yet some he would give to the pore

39

The third had of their wardrobe custodie,
In which were not rich tyres,[0] nor garments gay, attire
The plumes of pride, and wings of vanitie,
But clothes meet to keepe keene could[0] away, cold
And naked nature seemely[0] to aray; decently
With which bare wretched wights he dayly clad,
The images of God in earthly clay;
And if that no spare clothes to give he had,
His owne coate he would cut, and it distribute glad.

---

[9] I.e., one beadsman sat in front of the gates, to call in needy wayfarers.

[1] An almoner distributed charity (alms) to the poor.

40

The fourth appointed by his office was,
Poore prisoners to relieve with gratious ayd,
And captives to redeeme with price of bras,° payment of money
From Turkes and Sarazins, which them had stayd;° held captive
And though they faultie were, yet well he wayd,
That God to us forgiveth every howre
Much more then that, why° they in bands° were layd, for which / bonds
And he that harrowd hell[2] with heavie stowre,° assault
The faultie° soules from thence brought to his heavenly bowre. sinful

41

The fift had charge sicke persons to attend,
And comfort those, in point of death which lay;
For them most needeth comfort in the end,
When sin, and hell, and death do most dismay
The feeble soule departing hence away.
All is but lost, that living we bestow,° store up
If not well ended at our dying day.
O man have mind of that last bitter throw;° throes of death
For as the tree does fall, so lyes it ever low.[3]

42

The sixt had charge of them now being dead,
In seemely sort their corses to engrave,° bodies to bury
And deck with dainty flowres their bridall bed,
That to their heavenly spouse both sweet and brave° fair
They might appeare, when he their soules shall save.
The wondrous workemanship of Gods owne mould,[4]
Whose face he made, all beasts to feare, and gave
All in his hand, even dead we honour should.
Ah dearest God me graunt, I dead be not defould.° defiled

43

The seventh now after death and buriall done,
Had charge the tender Orphans of the dead
And widowes ayd, least° they should be undone: lest
In face of judgement° he their right would plead, i.e., in court
Ne ought° the powre of mighty men did dread nor at all
In their defence, nor would for gold or fee° bribe
Be wonne their rightfull causes downe to tread:
And when they stood in most necessitee,
He did supply their want, and gave them ever free.[5]

[4] The human body is God's own image ("mould") and a "mould" of God's making (see Genesis 1.26–30, 2.7).

Was guests to welcome, towardes him did pas:
Where seeing Mercie, that his steps up bare,° supported,
And alwayes led, to her with reverence rare
He humbly louted° in meeke lowlinesse, bowed
And seemely welcome for her did prepare:
For of their order she was Patronesse,
Albe° Charissa were their chiefest founderesse. although

There she awhile him stayes, him selfe to rest,
That to the rest more able he might bee:
During which time, in every good behest°
And godly worke of Almes and charitee command
She him instructed with great industree;
Shortly therein so perfect he became,
That from the first unto the last degree,
His mortall life he learned had to frame
In holy righteousnesse, without rebuke or blame.

46

Thence forward by that painfull way they pas,
Forth to an hill, that was both steepe and hy;
On top whereof a sacred chappell was,
And eke a litle Hermitage thereby,
Wherein an aged holy man did lye,° live
That day and night said his devotion,
Ne other worldly busines did apply;[6]
His name was heavenly Contemplation;
Of God and goodnesse was his meditation.

Great grace that old man to him given had;
For God he often saw from heavens hight,
All° were his earthly eyen both blunt° and bad, although / dim
And through great age had lost their kindly° sight, natural
Yet wondrous quick and persant° was his spright,° piercing / spirit
As Eagles eye, that can behold the Sunne:
That hill they scale with all their powre and might,
That his frayle thighes nigh wearie and fordonne° exhausted
Gan faile, but by her helpe the top at last he wonne.

There they do finde that godly aged Sire,
With snowy lockes adowne his shoulders shed,

Each bone might through his body well be red,° seen
And every sinew seene through° his long fast: because of
For nought he cared his carcas long unfed;
His mind was full of spirituall repast,
And pyned° his flesh, to keepe his body low° and chast. starved / thin

Who when these two approching he aspide,
  At their first presence grew agrieved sore,[7]
  That forst him lay his heavenly thoughts aside;
  And had he not that Dame respected more,° greatly
  Whom highly he did reverence and adore,
  He would not once have moved for the knight.
  They him saluted standing far afore;° away
  Who well them greeting, humbly did requight,° respond
And asked, to what end they clomb° that tedious height had climbed

50

"What end," quoth she, "should cause us take such paine,
  But that same end, which every living wight
  Should make his marke,° high heaven to attaine? goal
  Is not from hence the way, that leadeth right
  To that most glorious house, that glistreth bright
  With burning starres, and everliving fire,
  Whereof the keyes are to thy hand behight° entrusted
  By wise Fidelia? she doth thee require,
To shew it to this knight, according° his desire." granting

51

"Thrise happy man," said then the father grave,
  "Whose staggering steps thy° steady hand doth lead, i.e., Mercy's
  And shewes the way, his sinfull soule to save.
  Who better can the way to heaven aread° direct
  Then thou thy selfe, that was both borne and bred
  In heavenly throne, where thousand Angels shine?
  Thou doest the prayers of the righteous sead° seed
  Present before the majestie divine,
And his avenging wrath to clemencie incline.

52

"Yet since thou bidst, thy pleasure shalbe donne.
  Then come thou man of earth,[8] and see the way,
  That never yet was seene of Faeries sonne,
  That never leads the traveller astray,
  But after labours long, and sad delay,
  Brings them to joyous rest and endlesse blis.
  But first thou must a season fast and pray,
  Till from her bands the spright assoiled° is, spirit released
And have her strength recured° from fraile infirmitis." recovered

That done, he leads him to the highest Mount;
  Such one, as that same mighty man of God,
  That bloud-red billowes like a walled front
  On either side disparted° with his rod, parted asunder
  Till that his army dry-foot through them yod,° went

I.e., he was at first sorely grieved at their arrival.

An allusion to humankind's formation from the dust of the earth (Genesis 2.7) and also to the knight's name (see below, stanza 66 and note I).

Dwelt fortie dayes upon; where writ in stone
With bloudy letters by the hand of God,
The bitter doome of death and balefull mone[9]
He did receive, whiles flashing fire about him shone.

54

Or like that sacred hill, whose head full hie,
Adornd with fruitfull Olives all arownd,
Is, as it were for endlesse memory
Of that deare Lord, who oft thereon was fownd,
For ever with a flowring girlond crownd:
Or like that pleasaunt Mount, that is for ay
Through famous Poets verse each where° renownd, everywhere
On which the thrise three learned Ladies play
Their heavenly notes, and make full many a lovely lay.°[1] song

55

From thence, far off he unto him did shew
A litle path, that was both steepe and long,
Which to a goodly Citie led his vew;
Whose wals and towres were builded high and strong
Of perle and precious stone, that earthly tong
Cannot describe, nor wit of man can tell;
Too high a ditty° for my simple song; subject
The Citie of the great king hight° it well, is called
Wherein eternall peace and happinesse doth dwell.

56

As he thereon stood gazing, he might° see could
The blessed Angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven, in gladsome companee,
And with great joy into that Citie wend,
As commonly° as friend does with his frend.[2] familiarly
Whereat he wondred much, and gan enquere,
What stately building durst so high extend
Her loftie towres unto the starry sphere,
And what unknowen nation there empeopled were.

57

"Faire knight," quoth he, "Hierusalem that is,
The new Hierusalem, that God has built
For those to dwell in, that are chosen his,
His chosen people purged from sinfull guilt,
With pretious bloud, which cruelly was spilt
On cursed tree, of that unspotted lam,[3]
That for the sinnes of all the world was kilt:

[9] I.e., the Ten Commandments ("bloudy letters") carried with them the judgment ("doome") of death and pain (causing sorrowful moans—"balefull mone").

[1] The mountain is successively compared to Mount Sinai, where Moses, after parting the "bloud-red billowes" of the Red Sea, received the tablets of the Ten Commandments; to the Mount of Olives, associated with Christ; and to Mount Parnassus, where the Nine Muses of art and poetry dwelt.

[2] Cf. Jacob's ladder, which "reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it" (Genesis 28.12).

[3] Christ (the lamb of God), whose death on the cross ("cursed tree") purged the guilt of sin from those "chosen his."

Now are they Saints all in that Citie sam,° together
More deare unto their God, then younglings to their dam."[4]

58

"Till now," said then the knight, "I weened well,
That great Cleopolis,[5] where I have beene,
In which that fairest Faerie Queene doth dwell,
The fairest Citie was, that might be seene;
And that bright towre all built of christall cleene,° clear
Panthea,[6] seemd the brightest thing, that was:
But now by proofe° all otherwise I weene;° experience / think
For this great Citie that[7] does far surpas,
And this bright Angels towre quite dims that towre of glas."

59

"Most trew," then said the holy aged man;
"Yet is Cleopolis for earthly frame,° structure
The fairest peece,° that eye beholden can: masterpiece
And well beseemes° all knights of noble name, becomes
That covet in th' immortall booke of fame
To be eternized, that same to haunt,° frequent
And doen their service to that soveraigne Dame,
That glorie does to them for guerdon° graunt: reward
For she is heavenly borne, and heaven may justly vaunt.[8]

60

"And thou faire ymp,° sprong out from English race, youth
How ever now accompted° Elfins sonne, accounted
Well worthy doest thy service for her grace,° favor
To aide a virgin desolate foredonne.° undone
But when thou famous victorie hast wonne,
And high emongst all knights hast hong thy shield,
Thenceforth the suit° of earthly conquest shonne, pursuit
And wash thy hands from guilt of bloudy field:
For bloud can nought but sin, and wars but sorrowes yield.

61

"Then seeke this path, that I to thee presage,° show prophetically
Which after all to heaven shall thee send;
Then peaceably thy painefull° pilgrimage laborious
To yonder same Hierusalem do bend,
Where is for thee ordaind a blessed end:
For thou emongst those Saints, whom thou doest see,
Shalt be a Saint, and thine owne nations frend
And Patrone: thou Saint George shalt called bee,
Saint George of mery England, the signe of victoree."[9]

[4] The New Jerusalem is described in Revelation 21—22; "the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it" (21.24).

[5] "City of Fame"; in the historical allegory, London or Westminster.

[6] Reminiscent of the temple of glass in Chaucer's House of Fame; perhaps intended to allude to Westminster Abbey as pantheon of the English great.

[7] I.e., The New Jerusalem far surpasses Cleopolis ("that").

[8] I.e., may justly boast ("vaunt") that heaven is her home.

[9] Spenser's conception of St. George, patron saint of England, draws on the Legenda Aurea (The Golden Legend—a medieval manual of ecclesiastical lore, translated into English by William Caxton in 1487) and on pictures, tapestries, pageants, and folklore.

62

"Unworthy wretch," quoth he, "of so great grace,
How dare I thinke such glory to attaine?"
"These that have it attaind, were in like cace," Quoth he, "as wretched, and lived in like paine."
"But deeds of armes must I at last be faine,°   content (to leave)
And Ladies love to leave so dearely bought?"
"What need of armes, where peace doth ay° remaine,"   ever
Said he, "and battailes none are to be fought?
As for loose° loves are° vaine, and vanish into nought."   wanton / i.e., they are

63

"O let me not," quoth he, "then turne againe
Backe to the world, whose joyes so fruitlesse are
But let me here for aye in peace remaine,
Or streight way on that last long voyage fare,
That nothing may my present hope empare."°   impair
"That may not be," said he, "ne maist thou yit
Forgo that royall maides bequeathed care,°   charge
Who did her cause into thy hand commit,
Till from her cursed foe thou have her freely quit.'   released

64

"Then shall I soone," quoth he, "so God me grace,
Abet° that virgins cause disconsolate,   maintain
And shortly backe returne unto this place
To walke this way in Pilgrims poore estate.
But now aread,° old father, why of late   declare
Didst thou behight° me borne of English blood,   call
Whom all a Faeries sonne doen nominate?"°   name
"That word shall I," said he, "avouchen° good,   prove Sith° to thee is unknowne the cradle of thy brood.   since

"For well I wote,° thou springst from ancient race   know
Of Saxon kings, that have with mightie hand
And many bloudie battailes fought in place°   there
High reard their royall throne in Britane land,
And vanquisht them,° unable to withstand: i.e., the ancient Britons
From thence a Faerie thee unweeting reft,°   secretly stole
There as thou slepst in tender swadling band,
And her base Elfin brood there for thee left.
Such men do Chaungelings call, so chaungd by Faeries theft.

66

"Thence she thee brought into this Faerie lond,
And in an heaped furrow did thee hyde,
Where thee a Ploughman all unweeting° fond,   unknowing
As he his toylesome teme° that way did guyde,   team of oxen
And brought thee up in ploughmans state to byde,
Whereof Georgos he thee gave to name;[1]
Till prickt° with courage, and thy forces pryde,   spmred

[1] I.e., as a name. Georgos is Greek for "farmer" (cf. Virgil's Georgics, on farming).

To Faery court thou cam'st to seeke for fame,
And prove thy puissaunt° armes, as seemes thee best powerful became."° as best suited you

67

"O holy Sire," quoth he, "how shall I quight° repay
The many favours I with thee have found,
That hast my name and nation red° aright, declared
And taught the way that does to heaven bound?"° go
This said, adowne he looked to the ground,
To have returnd, but dazed° were his eyne, dazzled
Through passing° brightnesse, which did quite confound surpassing
His feeble sence, and too exceeding shyne.
So darke are earthly things compard to things divine.

68

At last whenas himselfe he gan to find,°
To Una back he cast him to retire;
Who him awaited still with pensive° mind. anxious
Great thankes and goodly meed° to that good syre, gift
He thence departing gave for his paines hyre.° reward
So came to Una, who him joyd to see,
And after litle rest, gan him desire,
Of her adventure mindfull for to bee.
So leave they take of Caelia, and her daughters three

Canto 11

The knight with that old Dragon fights
two dayes incessantly:
The third him overthrowes, and gayns
most glorious victory.

High time now gan it wex° for Una faire, grow
To thinke of those her captive Parents deare,
And their forwasted kingdome to repairer[2]
Whereto whenas they now approached neare,
With hartie° words her knight she gan to cheare, bold
And in her modest manner thus bespake;
"Deare knight, as deare, as ever knight was deare,
That all these sorrowes suffer for my sake,
High heaven behold the tedious toyle, ye for me take

"Now are we come unto my native soyle,
And to the place, where all our perils dwell;
Here haunts that feend, and does his dayly spoyle,
Therefore henceforth be at your keeping well,° be well on your guard
And ever ready for your foeman fell.
The sparke of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent selfe to excell;

---

[2] I.e., to restore their kingdom, laid waste (by the dragon).

That shall ye evermore renowmed make,
Above all knights on earth, that batteill undertake."

And pointing forth, "lo yonder is," said she,
"The brasen towre in which my parents deare
For dread of that huge feend emprisond be,
Whom I from far see on the walles appeare,
Whose sight my feeble soule doth greatly cheare:
And on the top of all I do espye
The watchman wayting tydings glad to heare,
That° O my parents might I happily
Unto you bring, to ease you of your misery."

With that they heard a roaring hideous sound,
That all the ayre with terrour filled wide,
And seemd uneath° to shake the stedfast ground. almost Eftsoones° that dreadfull Dragon they espide, immediately
Where stretcht he lay upon the sunny side
Of a great hill, himselfe like a great hill.
But all so soone, as he from far descride
Those glistring armes, that heaven with light did fill,
He rousd himselfe full blith,° and hastned them untill.° joyfully / toward

Then bad° the knight his Lady yede° aloofe, bade/go
And to an hill her selfe withdraw aside,
From whence she might behold that battailles proof° outcome
And eke° be safe from daunger far descryde:° also / observed from afar
She him obayd, and turnd a little wyde.° aside
Now O thou sacred Muse, most learned Dame,
Faire ympe° of Phoebus, and his aged bride,[3] child
The Nourse of time, and everlasting fame,
That warlike hands ennoblest with immortall name;

O gently come into my feeble brest,
Come gently, but not with that mighty rage,
Wherewith the martiall troupes thou doest infest,° arouse
And harts of great Heroes doest enrage,
That nought their kindled courage may aswage,
Soone as thy dreadfull trompe° begins to sownd; trumpet
The God of warre with his fiers equipage
Thou doest awake, sleepe never he so sownd,° sound
And scared nations doest with horrour sterne astown.° appall

Faire Goddesse lay that furious fit° aside, strain
Till I of warres and bloudy Mars do sing[4]
And Briton fields with Sarazin° bloud bedyde,° Saracen / dyed
Twixt that great faery Queene and Paynim° king, pagan

---

[3] I.e., Mnemosyne (memory), mother of the Muses.

[4] Perhaps a reference to a projected but unwritten book of The Faerie Queene.

That with their horrour heaven and earth did ring,
A worke of labour long, and endlesse prayse:
But now a while let downe that haughtie string,
And to my tunes thy second tenor rayse,[5]
That I this man of God his godly armes may blaze.° proclaim

8

By this the dreadfull Beast drew nigh to hand,
Halfe flying, and halfe footing° in his hast, walking
That with his largenesse measured much land,
And made wide shadow under his huge wast;° girth
As mountaine doth the valley overcast.
Approching nigh, he reared high afore
His body monstrous, horrible, and vast,
Which to increase his wondrous greatnesse more,
Was swolne with wrath, and poyson, and with bloudy gore

And over, all with brasen scales was armd,
Like plated coate of Steele, so couched neare,° placed so closely
That nought mote perce,[6] ne might his corse° be harmd body
With dint of sword, nor push of pointed speare;
Which as an Eagle, seeing pray appeare,
His aery Plumes doth rouze,° full rudely dight,° shake / ruggedly arrayed
So shaked he, that horrour was to heare,
For as the clashing of an Armour bright,
Such noyse his rouzed scales did send unto the knight.

10

His flaggy° wings when forth he did display, drooping
Were like two sayles, in which the hollow wynd
Is gathered full, and worketh speedy way:
And eke the pennes, that did his pineons bynd,
Were like mayne-yards, with flying canvas lynd,[7]
With which whenas him list° the ayre to beat, he chose
And there by force unwonted° passage find, wtaccustomed
The cloudes before him fled for terrour great,
And all the heavens stood still amazed with his threat

11

His huge long tayle wound up in hundred foldes,
Does overspred his long bras-scaly backe,
Whose wreathed boughts° when ever he unfoldes, coils
And thicke entangled knots adown does slacke,
Bespotted as with shields° of red and blacke, scales
It sweepeth all the land behind him farre,
And of three furlongs does but litle Iacke;
And at the point two stings in-fixed arre,
Both deadly sharpe, that sharpest Steele exceeden farre.

---

[5] The "haughtie" (high-pitched) mode would be appropriate to a large-scale epic war; the "second tenor" (lower in pitch) to this present battle.

[6] Nothing might pierce.

[7] I.e., the ribs of his wings were like the massive spars (main yards) to which a ship's mainsail is affixed.

62

But stings and sharpest Steele did far exceed° i.e., were far exceeded by
The sharpnesse of his cruell rending clawes;
Dead was it sure, as sure as death in deed,° in its effect
What ever thing does touch his ravenous pawes,
Or what within his reach he ever drawes.
But his most hideous head my toung to tell
Does tremble: for his deepe devouring jawes
Wide gaped, like the griesly° mouth of hell, horrid
Through which into his darke abisse all ravin° fell. prey; booty

13

And that° more wondrous was, in either jaw what
Three ranckes of yron teeth enraunged were,
In which yet trickling bloud and gobbets raw° chunks of unswallowed food
Of late° devoured bodies did appeare, recently
That sight thereof bred cold congealed feare:
Which to increase, and all at once to kill,
A cloud of smoothering smoke and sulphur seare° burning
Out of his stinking gorge° forth steemed still, maw
That all the ayre about with smoke and stench did fill.

14

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
Did burne with wrath, and sparkled living fyre;
As two broad Beacons, set in open fields,
Send forth their flames farre off to every shyre,° shire
And warning give, that enemies conspyre,
With fire and sword the region to invade;
So flamed his eyne° with rage and rancorous yre:° eyes/ire, anger
But farre within, as in a hollow glade,
Those glaring Iampes were set, that made a dreadfull shade.

15

So dreadfully he towards him did pas,
Forelifting up aloft his speckled brest,
And often bounding on the brused gras,
As for great joyance of his newcome guest.
Eftsoones he gan advance his haughtie crest,
As chauffed° Bore his bristles doth upreare, angry
And shoke his scales to battell readie drest;° prepared
That made the Redcrosse knight nigh quake for feare,
As bidding bold defiance to his foeman neare.

16

The knight gan fairely couch° his steadie speare, level
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous° might: violent
The pointed Steele arriving rudely° theare, roughly
His harder hide would neither perce, nor bight,
But glauncing by forth passed forward right;
Yet sore amoved with so puissant push,
The wrathfull beast about him turned light,° quickly
And him so rudely passing by, did brush
With his long tayle, that horse and man to ground did rush

17

Both horse and man up lightly rose againe,
And fresh encounter towards him addrest:
But th' idle stroke yet backe recoyld in vaine,
And found no place his° deadly point to rest. its
Exceeding rage enflamed the furious beast,
To be avenged of so great despight;° outrage
For never felt his imperceable brest
So wondrous force, from hand of living wight;
Yet had he proved° the powre of many a puissant knight. tested

Then with his waving wings displayed wyde,
Himselfe up high he lifted from the ground,
And with strong flight did forcibly divide
The yielding aire, which nigh° too feeble found nearly
Her flitting° partes, and element unsound,° moving/weak
To beare so great a weight: he cutting way
With his broad sayles, about him soared round:
At last low stouping with unweldie sway, ponderous force
Snatcht up both horse and man, to beare them quite away.

19

Long he them bore above the subject plaine,° i.e., the ground below
So farre as Ewghen° bow a shaft may send, yexven, of yew
Till struggling strong did him at last constraine,
To let them downe before his flightes end:
As hagard° hauke presuming to contend untamed
With hardie fowle, above his hable might,° able power
His wearie pounces° all in vaine doth spend, claws
To trusse° the pray too heavie for his flight;
Which comming downe to ground, does free it selfe by fight

He so disseized of his gryping grosse,[8]
The knight his thrilant° speare againe assayd piercing
In his bras-plated body to embosse,° plunge
And three mens strength unto the stroke he layd;
Wherewith the stiffe beame quaked, as affrayd,
And glauncing from his scaly necke, did glyde
Close under his left wing, then broad displayd.
The percing Steele there wrought a wound full wyde,
That with the uncouth° smart the Monster lowdly cryde. unfamiliar

He cryde, as raging seas are wont° to rore, accustomed
When wintry storme his wrathfull wreck does threat,
The rolling billowes beat the ragged shore,
As° they the earth would shoulder from her seat, as if
And greedie gulfe° does gape, as he would eat i.e., the sea
His neighbour element° in his revenge: i.e., earth
Then gin the blustring brethren° boldly threat, the winds

---

[8] Freed from his formidable grip.

To move the world from off his stedfast henge,° axis
And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.

22

The steely head stucke fast still in his flesh,
Till with his cruell clawes he snatcht the wood,
And quite a sunder broke. Forth flowed fresh
A gushing river of blacke goarie° blood, clotted
That drowned all the land, whereon he stood;
The stream thereof would drive a water-mill.
Trebly augmented was his furious mood
With bitter sense of his deepe rooted ill,° injury
That flames of fire he threw forth from his large nosethrill.

23

His hideous tayle then hurled he about,
And therewith all enwrapt the nimble thyes° thighs
Of his froth-fomy steed, whose courage stout
Striving to loose the knot, that fast him tyes,
Himselfe in streighter° bandes too rash implyes,[9] tighter
That to the ground he is perforce° constraynd of necessity
To throw his rider: who can° quickly ryse did
From off the earth, with durty bloud distaynd,° defiled
For that reprochfull fall right fowly he disdaynd.

24

And fiercely tooke his trenchand° blade in hand, sharp
With which he stroke so furious and so fell,° fiercely
That nothing seemd the puissance could withstand:
Upon his crest the hardned yron fell,
But his more hardned crest was armd so well,
That deeper dint therein it would not make;[1]
Yet so extremely did the buffe° him quell,° blow/dismay
That from thenceforth he shund the like to take,
But when he saw them come, he did them still forsake.° avoid

25

The knight was wrath to see his stroke beguyld,° foiled
And smote againe with more outrageous might;
But backe againe the sparckling Steele recoyld,
And left not any marke, where it did light;
As if in Adamant rocke it had bene pight.° struck against
The beast impatient of his smarting wound,
And of so fierce and forcible despight,° powerful injury
Thought with his wings to stye° above the ground; mount
But his late wounded wing unserviceable found.

26

Then full of griefe and anguish vehement,
He lowdly brayd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake° of fire, that flashing in his beard, flash

---

[9] I.e., too quickly entangles.

[1] I.e., it could not make a deep gash there.

Him all amazd, and almost made affeard;
The scorching flame sore swinged° all his face, singed,
And through his armour all his bodie seard,
That he could not endure so cruell cace, plight
But thought his armes to leave, and helmet to unlace.

27

Not that great Champion of the antique world,
Whom famous Poetes verse so much doth vaunt,
And hath for twelve huge labours high extold,
So many furies and sharpe fits did haunt,
When him the poysoned garment did enchaunt
With Centaures bloud, and bloudie verses charmed,
As did this knight twelve thousand dolours° daunt, pains
Whom fyrie Steele now burnt, that earst° him armed, formerly
That erst him goodly armed, now most of all him harmed.[2]

28

Faint, wearie, sore, emboyled, grieved, brent° burned
With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, and inward fire
That never man such mischiefes° did torment; misfortunes
Death better were, death did he oft desire,
But death will never come, when needes require.
Whom so dismayd when that his foe beheld,
He cast to suffer° him no more respire,° allow / live
But gan his sturdie sterne° about to weld,° tail / lash
And him so strongly stroke, that to the ground him feld.

29

It fortuned (as faire it then befell)
Behind his backe unweeting,° where he stood, unnoticed
Of auncient time there was a springing well,
From which fast trickled forth a silver flood,
Full of great vertues,° and for med'cine good. powers
Whylome,° before that cursed Dragon got formerly
That happie land, and all with innocent blood
Defyld those sacred waves, it rightly hot° was called
The Well of Life,[3] ne yet his vertues had forgot.

30

For unto life the dead it could restore,
And guilt of sinfull crimes cleane wash away,
Those that with sicknesse were infected sore,
It could recure, and aged long decay
Renew, as one were borne that very day.
Both Silo this, and Jordan did excell,
And th' English Bath, and eke the german Spau,

[2] Redcrosse's fire baptism is compared with the burning shirt of Nessus, which killed Hercules, "that great Champion of the antique world" (line 235). His "twelve huge labours" are paralleled to the knight's "twelve thousand dolours."

[3] An allusion to Revelation 22.1—2: "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was the tree of life which bare twelve manner of fruits and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations."

Ne can Cephise, nor Hebrus match this well:
Into the same the knight backe overthrowen, fell.[4]

31

Now gan the golden Phoebus for to steepe
His fierie face in billowes of the west,
And his faint steedes watred in Ocean deepe,
Whiles from their journall° labours they did rest, daily
When that infernall Monster, having kest° cast
His wearie foe into that living well,
Can° high advaunce his broad discoloured brest, did
Above his wonted pitch,° with countenance fell,° height / sinister
And clapt his yron wings, as victor he did dwell.° remain

32

Which when his pensive° Ladie saw from farre, anxious
Great woe and sorrow did her soule assay,° assail
As weening° that the sad end of the warre, thinking
And gan to highest God entirely° pray, earnestly
That feared chaunce° from her to turne away; fate
With folded hands and knees full lowly bent
All night she watcht, ne once adowne would lay
Her daintie limbs in her sad dreriment,° dismal condition
But praying still did wake, and waking did lament.

33

The morrow next gan early to appeare,
That° Titan° rose to runne his daily race; when / the sun god
But early ere the morrow next gan reare
Out of the sea faire Titans deawy face,
Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
And looked all about, if she might spy
Her loved knight to move° his manly pace: i.e., moving
For she had great doubt of his safety,
Since late she saw him fall before his enemy.

34

At last she saw, where he upstarted brave
Out of the well, wherein he drenched lay;
As Eagle fresh out of the Ocean wave,
Where he hath left his plumes all hoary gray,
And deckt himselfe with feathers youthly gay,
Like Eyas hauke° up mounts unto the skies, unfledged hawk
His newly budded pineons to assay,
And marveiles at himselfe, still as he flies:
So new this new-borne knight to battell new did rise.

35

Whom when the damned feend so fresh did spy,
No wonder if he wondred at the sight,

---

[4] The Well of Life, with its powers of renewal, is successively compared with waters of the Bible, of England and Europe, and of classical antiquity. In the pool of Siloam ("Silo") a blind man was cured by Christ (John 9.7); water of the river Jordan cured Naaman of leprosy (2 Kings 5.14) and Christ was baptized therein (Matthew 3.16). "Bath" and "Spau" (Spa) were famed for their medicinal waters. "Cephise" and "Hebrus" in Greece were noted for purifying and healing powers.

And doubted, whether his late enemy
It were, or other new supplied knight.
He, now to prove° his late renewed might, try
High brandishing his bright deaw-burning blade,
Upon his crested scalpe so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made:
The deadly dint° his dulled senses all dismaid. blow

36

I wote° not, whether the revenging Steele know
Were hardned with that holy water dew,
Wherein he fell, or sharper edge did feele,
Or his baptized hands now greater° grew; stronger
Or other secret vertue° did ensew; power
Else never could the force of fleshly arme,
Ne molten mettall in his bloud embrew:° plunge
For till that stownd° could never wight him harme, moment
By subtilty, nor slight,° nor might, nor mighty charme. trickery

37

The cruell wound enraged him so sore,
That loud he yelled for exceeding paine;
As hundred ramping° Lyons seemed to rore, rearing
Whom ravenous hunger did thereto constraine:
Then gan he tosse aloft his stretched traine,° tail
And therewith scourge the buxome° aire so sore, yielding
That to his force to yeelden it was faine;° obliged
Ne ought his sturdie strokes might stand afore,[5]
That high trees overthrew, and rocks in peeces tore.

38

The same advauncing high above his head,
With sharpe intended° sting so rude° him smot, extended / roughly
That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead,
Ne living wight would have him life behot:[6]
The mortall sting his angry needle shot
Quite through his shield, and in his shoulder seasd,
Where fast it stucke, ne would there out be got:
The griefe° thereof him wondrous sore diseasd,° pain / afflicted
Ne might his ranckling paine with patience be appeasd.

39

But yet more mindfull of his honour deare,
Then of the grievous smart, which him did wring,° torment
From loathed soile he can° him lightly reare, did
And strove to loose the farre infixed sting:
Which when in vaine he tryde with struggeling,
Inflamed with wrath, his raging blade he heft,° heaved
And strooke so strongly, that the knotty string
Of his huge taile he quite a sunder cleft,
Five joynts thereof he hewd, and but the stump him left.

---

[5] I.e., neither could anything ("ought") stand before his violent ("sturdie") strokes.

[6] Promised. I.e., no one would have thought he could survive the blow.

Hart cannot thinke, what outrage,[0] and what cryes, violent clamor
With foule enfouldred[7] smoake and flashing fire,
The hell-bred beast threw forth unto the skyes,
That all was covered with darknesse dire:
Then fraught[0] with rancour, and engorged[0] ire, filled / swollen
He cast at once him to avenge for all,
And gathering up himselfe out of the mire,
With his uneven wings did fiercely fall
Upon his sunne-bright shield, and gript it fast withall.

41

Much was the man encombred with his hold,
In feare to lose his weapon in his paw,
Ne wist° yet, how his talents[0] to unfold; knew / talons
Nor harder was from Cerberus[8] greedie jaw
To plucke a bone, then[0] from his cruell claw than
To reave[0] by strength the griped gage° away: seize / prize
Thrise he assayd[0] it from his foot to draw, tried
And thrise in vaine to draw it did assay,
It booted nought to thinke, to robbe him of his pray.

42

Tho° when he saw no power might prevaile, then
His trustie sword he cald to his last aid,
Wherewith he fiercely did his foe assaile,
And double blowes about him stoutly laid,
That glauncing fire out of the yron plaid;
As sparckles from the Andvile[0] use to fly, anvil
When heavie hammers on the wedge are swaid;[0] struck
Therewith at last he forst him to unty° loosen
One of his grasping feete, him to defend thereby.

43

The other foot, fast fixed on his shield,
Whenas no strength, nor stroks mote[0] him constraine might
To loose, ne yet the warlike pledge to yield,
He smot thereat with all his might and maine,
That nought so wondrous puissance might sustaine;
Upon the joynt the lucky Steele did light,
And made such way, that hewd it quite in twaine;
The paw yet missed not his minisht[0] might, lessened
But hong still on the shield, as it at first was pight.[0] placed

44

For griefe thereof, and divelish despight,
From his infernall fournace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmed all the heavens light,
Enrold in duskish smoke and brimstone blew;
As burning Aetna from his boyling stew° cauldron
Doth belch out flames, and rockes in peeces broke,

---

[7] Black as a thundercloud.

[8] The dog that guards the mouth of Hades.

And ragged ribs of mountaines molten new
Enwrapt in coleblacke clouds and filthy smoke,
That all the land with stench, and heaven with horror choke.

45

The heate whereof, and harmefull pestilence
So sore him noyd,° that forst him to retire — troubled
A little backward for his best defence,
To save his bodie from the scorching fire,
Which he from hellish entrailes did expire.° — breathe out
It chaunst (eternall God that chaunce did guide)
As he recoyled backward, in the mire
His nigh forwearied° feeble feet did slide, — exhausted
And downe he fell, with dread of shame sore terrifide.

46

There grew a goodly tree him faire beside,
Loaden with fruit and apples rosie red,
As they in pure vermilion had beene dide,
Whereof great vertues over all were red:° — everywhere were told
For happie life to all, which thereon fed,
And life eke everlasting did befall:
Great God it planted in that blessed sted° — place
With his almightie hand, and did it call
The Tree of Life, the crime of our first fathers fall.[9]

47

In all the world like was not to be found,
Save in that soile, where all good things did grow,
And freely sprong out of the fruitfull ground,
As incorrupted Nature did them sow,
Till that dread Dragon all did overthrow.
Another like faire tree eke grew thereby,
Whereof who so did eat, eftsoones did know
Both good and ill: O mornefull memory:
That tree through one mans fault hath doen us all to dy.° — i.e., killed us

48

From that first tree forth flowd, as from a well,
A trickling streame of Balme, most soveraine° — powerful far cures
And daintie deare,° which on the ground still fell, — precious
And overflowed all the fertill plaine,
As it had deawed bene with timely° raine: — seasonable
Life and long health that gratious° ointment gave, — full of grace
And deadly woundes could heale, and reare° againe — raise
The senselesse corse appointed° for the grave. — made ready
Into that same he fell: which did from death him save.[1]

---

[9] Genesis 2.9 describes the Tree of Life and also the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, both of which God planted in the Garden of Eden. The "crime of our first fathers fall" is that Adam, in eating of the second and being banished from Eden, separated himself—and (according to Christian doctrine) his descendants—from the first. The Tree of Life appears again in the New Jerusalem (Revelation 22.2).

[1] The healing balm flowing from the Tree of Life is understood to be Christ's blood, shed to redeem humankind from eternal damnation.

49

For nigh thereto the ever damned beast
Durst not approch, for he was deadly made,° i.e., a child of death
And all that life preserved, did detest:
Yet he it oft adventured° to invade. attempted
By this the drouping day-light gan to fade,
And yeeld his roome° to sad succeeding night, its place
Who with her sable mantle gan to shade
The face of earth, and wayes of living wight,
And high her burning torch set up in heaven bright

5°

When gentle Una saw the second fall
Of her deare knight, who wearie of long fight,
And faint through losse of bloud, moved not at all,
But lay as in a dreame of deepe delight,
Besmeard with pretious Balme, whose vertuous might
Did heale his wounds, and scorching heat alay,[2]
Againe she stricken was with sore affright,
And for his safetie gan devoutly pray;
And watch the noyous° night, and wait for joyous day.

51

The joyous day gan early to appeare,
And faire Aurora from the deawy bed
Of aged Tithone gan her selfe to reare,[3]
With rosie cheekes, for shame as blushing red;
Her golden lockes for haste were loosely shed
About her eares, when Una her did marke
Clymbe to her charet, all with flowers spred,
From heaven high to chase the chearelesse darke;
With merry note her loud salutes the mounting larke.

Then freshly up arose the doughtie° knight, valiant
All healed of his hurts and woundes wide,
And did himselfe to battell readie dight;° prepare
Whose early foe awaiting him beside
To have devourd, so soone as day he spyde,
When now he saw himselfe so freshly reare,
As if late fight had nought him damnifyde,° injured
He woxe° dismayd, and gan his fate to feare; grew
Nathlesse° with wonted rage he him advaunced nevertheless

53

And in his first encounter, gaping wide,
He thought attonce him to have swallowed quight,
And rusht upon him with outragious pride;
Who him r'encountring fierce, as hauke in flight,
Perforce rebutted° backe. The weapon bright drove

---

[2] Cf. Revelation 2.7, II: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life" and "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."

[3] Aurora is goddess of the dawn, Tithonus her husband ("aged" because he was granted everlasting life without everlasting youth).

Taking advantage of his open jaw,
Ran through his mouth with so importune° might, violent
That deepe emperst his darksome hollow maw,
And back retyrd,[4] his life bloud forth with all did draw.

54

So downe he fell, and forth his life did breath,
That vanisht into smoke and cloudes swift;
So downe he fell, that th' earth him underneath
Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift;
So downe he fell, as an huge rockie clift,
Whose false° foundation waves have washt away, insecure
With dreadfull poyse° is from the mayneland rift,° falling weight / split
And rolling downe, great Neptune doth dismay;
So downe he fell, and like an heaped mountaine lay.

55

The knight himselfe even trembled at his fall,
So huge and horrible a masse it seemed;
And his deare Ladie, that beheld it all,
Durst not approch for dread, which she misdeemed,° misjudged
But yet at last, when as the direfull feend
She saw not stirre, off-shaking vaine affright,
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end:
Then God she praysd, and thankt her faithfull knight,
That had atchiev'd so great a conquest by his might.

Canto 12

Faire Una to the Redcrosse knight
betrouthed is with joy:
Though false Duessa it to barre her false sleights doe imploy.

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I meane my wearie course to bend;
Vere the maine shete, and beare up with the land,[5]
The which afore is fairely to be kend,° recognized
And seemeth safe from stormes, that may offend;
There this faire virgin wearie of her way
Must landed be, now at her journeyes end:
There eke° my feeble barke° a while may stay, also / ship
Till merry° wind and weather call her thence away. favorable

Scarsely had Phoebus in the glooming East° i.e., dawn
Yet harnessed his firie-footed teeme,
Ne reard above the earth his flaming creast,° crest
When the last deadly smoke aloft did steeme,

---

[4] I.e., on being drawn back.

[5] Release the mainsail line and sail toward the land. The nautical metaphor echoes many classical authors and Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (2.1-7).

That signe of last outbreathed life did seeme
Unto the watchman on the castle wall;
Who thereby dead that balefull° Beast did deeme, evil
And to his Lord and Ladie lowd gan call,
To tell, how he had seene the Dragons fatall fall.

Uprose with hastie joy, and feeble speed
That aged Sire, the Lord of all that land,
And looked forth, to weet,° if true indeede know
Those tydings were, as he did understand,
Which whenas true by tryall he out fond,
He bad° to open wyde his brazen gate, bade
Which long time had bene shut, and out of hond° straightway
Proclaymed joy and peace through all his state;
For dead now was their foe, which them forrayed late.[6]

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on hie,
That sent to heaven the ecchoed report
Of their new joy, and happie victorie
Gainst him, that had them long opprest with tort,° wrong
And fast imprisoned in sieged fort.
Then all the people, as in solemne feast,
To him assembled with one full consort,° all together
Rejoycing at the fall of that great beast,
From whose eternall bondage now they were releast.

Forth came that auncient Lord and aged Queene,
Arayd in antique robes downe to the ground,
And sad habiliments right well beseene;[7]
A noble crew about them waited round
Of sage and sober Peres,° all gravely gownd;
Whom farre before did march a goodly band
Of tall young men, all hable armes to sownd,[8]
But now they laurell braunches bore in hand;
Glad signe of victorie and peace in all their land.

Unto that doughtie Conquerour they came,
And him before themselves prostrating low,
Their Lord and Patrone° loud did him proclame, defender
And at his feet their laurell boughes did throw.
Soone after them all dauncing on a row
The comely virgins came, with girlands dight,° adorned
As fresh as flowres in medow greene do grow,
When morning deaw upon their leaves doth light:
And in their hands sweet Timbrels° all upheld on hight tambourines

---

[6] Had recently ravaged.

[7] I.e., their sober, appropriate ("right well beseene") attire.

[8] Able to fight with weapons.

And them before, the fry[0] of children young crowd
Their wanton[0] sports and childish mirth did play, playful
And to the Maydens sounding tymbrels sung
In well attuned notes, a joyous lay,° song
And made delightfull musicke all the way,
Untill they came, where that faire virgin stood;
As faire Diana[0] in fresh sommers day goddess of the hunt
Beholds her Nymphes, enraunged[0] in shadie wood, ranged
Some wrestle, some do run, some bathe in christall flood.

So she beheld those maydens meriment
With chearefull vew; who when to her they came,
Themselves to ground with gratious humblesse[0] bent, humility
And her adored by honorable name,[0] with titles of honor
Lifting to heaven her everlasting fame:
Then on her head they set a girland greene,
And crowned her twixt earnest and twixt game:[0] i e half in fun
Who in her selfe-resemblance well beseene [9]
Did seeme such, as she was, a goodly maiden Queene.

And after all, the raskall many[0] ran, rabble throng
Heaped together in rude rablement,[0] confusion
To see the face of that victorious man:
Whom all admired,[0] as from heaven sent, wondered at
And gazd upon with gaping wonderment.
But when they came, where that dead Dragon lay,
Stretcht on the ground in monstrous large extent,
The sight with idle[0] feare did them dismay, baseless
Ne durst approch him nigh, to touch, or once assay.[0] venture to

Some feard, and fled; some feard and well it faynd;[c] concealed
One that would wiser seeme, then all the rest,
Warnd him not touch, for yet perhaps remaynd
Some lingring life within his hollow brest,
Or in his wombe might lurke some hidden nest
Of many Dragonets,[0] his fruitfull seed; young dragons
Another said, that in his eyes did rest
Yet sparckling fire, and bad thereof take heed;
Another said, he saw him move his eyes indeed.

One mother, when as her foolehardie chyld
Did come too neare, and with his talants[0] play, talons
Halfe dead through feare, her litle babe revyld,[0] scolded
And to her gossips[0] gan in counsell[0] say; women friends / private
"How can I tell, but that his talants may Yet scratch my sonne, or rend his tender hand?"
So diversly themselves in vaine they fray;[0]

looking appropriately like herself.

Whiles some more bold, to measure him nigh stand,
To prove° how many acres he did spread of land. determine

12

Thus flocked all the folke him round about,
The whiles that hoarie° king, with all his traine, gray-haired
Being arrived, where that champion stout
After his foes defeasance° did remaine, defeat
Him goodly greetes, and faire does entertaine,
With princely gifts of yvorie and gold,
And thousand thankes him yeelds for all his paine
Then when his daughter deare he does behold,
Her dearely doth imbrace, and kisseth manifold.° many times

And after to his Pallace he them brings,
With shaumes,[1] and trompets, and with Clarions sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings,
And with their garments strowes the paved street:
Whence mounting up, they find purveyance° meet provisions
Of all, that royall Princes court became,° suited
And all the floore was underneath their feet
Bespred with costly scarlot of great name,° i.e., famous scarlet cloth
On which they lowly sit, and fitting purpose frame.[2]

14

What needs me tell their feast and goodly guize,° behavior
In which was nothing riotous nor vaine?
What needs of daintie dishes to devize,° talk
Of comely° services, or courtly trayne?°
My narrow leaves cannot in them containe becoming / assembly
The large discourse° of royall Princes state.
Yet was their manner then but bare and plaine: i.e., full description
For th' antique world excesse and pride did hate;
Such proud luxurious pompe is swollen up but late.° just recently

Then when with meates and drinkes of every kinde
Their fervent appetites they quenched had,
That auncient Lord gan fit occasion finde,
Of straunge adventures, and of perils sad,° grave
Which in his travell him befallen had,
For to demaund° of his renowmed guest: inquire
Who then with utt'rance grave, and count'nance sad,
From point to point, as is before exprest,
Discourst his voyage long, according° his request. granting

16

Great pleasure mixt with pittiful° regard, sympathetic
That godly King and Queene did passionate,° i.e., feel and express
Whiles they his pittiful° adventures heard, deserving pity
That oft they did lament his lucklesse state,
And often blame the too importune° fate, severe

[1] The shawm was the medieval and Renaissance predecessor of the oboe.

[2] Make seemly conversation,

That heapd on him so many wrathfull wreakes:° vengeful injuries
For never gentle knight, as he of late,
So tossed was in fortunes cruell freakes,° whims
And all the while salt teares bedeawd the hearers cheaks.

17

Then said that royall Pere in sober wise:
"Deare Sonne, great beene the evils, which ye bore
From first to last in your late enterprise,
That I note,° whether prayse, or pitty more: know not
For never living man, I weene,° so sore
In sea of deadly daungers was distrest;
But since now safe ye seised° have the shore, reached
And well arrived are (high God be blest),
Let us devize° of ease and everlasting rest." think

"Ah dearest Lord," said then that doughty knight
"Of ease or rest I may not yet devize;
For by the faith, which I to armes have plight/
I bounden am streight° after this emprize,° immediately / enterprise
As that your daughter can ye well advize,
Backe to returne to that great Faerie Queene,
And her to serve six yeares in warlike wize,
Gainst that proud Paynim king, that workes her teene:°
Therefore I ought° crave pardon, till I there have beene."[3] must

19

"Unhappie falles that hard necessitie,"
Quoth he, "the troubler of my happie peace,
And vowed foe of my felicitie;
Ne° I against the same can justly preace:° nor / press, contend
But since that band° ye cannot now release, obligation
Nor doen undo (for vowes may not be vaine),[4]
Soone as the terme of those six yeares shall cease,
Ye then shall hither backe returne againe,
The marriage to accomplish vowd betwixt you twain.

20

"Which for my part I covet to performe,
In sort as° through the world I did proclame, even as
That who so kild that monster most deforme,° hideous
And him in hardy battaile overcame,
Should have mine onely daughter to his Dame,° wife
And of my kingdome heire apparaunt bee:
Therefore since now to thee perteines° the same, belongs
By dew desert of noble chevalree,
Both daughter and eke° kingdome, lo I yield to thee. also

Then forth he called that his daughter faire,
The fairest Un' his onely daughter deare,

[4] I.e., you cannot undo what is done ("doen"), for vows may not be (made) vain.

His onely daughter, and his onely heyre;
Who forth proceeding with sad° sober cheare,° grave / countenance
As bright as doth the morning starre appeare
Out of the East, with flaming lockes bedight,° bedecked
To tell that dawning day is drawing neare,
And to the world does bring long wished light;
So faire and fresh that Lady shewd her selfe in sight.

So faire and fresh, as freshest flowre in May;
For she had layd her mournefull stole aside,
And widow-like sad wimple° throwne away, veil
Wherewith her heavenly beautie she did hide,
Whiles on her wearie journey she did ride;
And on her now a garment she did weare,
All lilly white, withoutten spot, or pride,° ornament
That seemed like silke and silver woven neare,° tightly
But neither silke nor silver therein did appeare.[5]

The blazing brightnesse of her beauties beame,
And glorious light of her sunshyny face[6]
To tell, were as to strive against the streame.
My ragged rimes are all too rude and bace,
Her heavenly lineaments for to enchace.° adorn
Ne wonder; for her owne deare loved knight,
All° were she dayly with himselfe in place, although
Did wonder much at her celestiall sight:
Oft had he seene her faire, but never so faire dight.

24

So fairely dight, when she in presence came,
She to her Sire made humble reverence,
And bowed low, that her right well became,
And added grace unto her excellence:
Who with great wisdome, and grave eloquence
Thus gan to say. But eare° he thus had said, ere
With flying speede, and seeming great pretence,° purpose
Came running in, much like a man dismaid,
A Messenger with letters, which his message said.

All in the open hall amazed stood,
At suddeinnesse of that unwarie° sight, unexpected
And wondred at his breathlesse hastie mood.
But he for nought would stay his passage right° direct
Till fast° before the king he did alight; close
Where falling flat, great humblesse he did make,
And kist the ground, whereon his foot was pight;° placed

Then to his hands that writ° he did betake,° document / deliver

"To thee, most mighty king of Eden faire,

The wofull daughter, and forsaken heire
Of that great Emperour of all the West;
And bids thee be advized for the best,
Ere thou thy daughter linck in holy band
Of wedlocke to that new unknowen guest:
For he already plighted his right hand
Unto another love, and to another land.

27

"To me sad mayd, or rather widow sad,
He was affiaunced long time before,
And sacred pledges he both gave, and had,
False erraunt knight, infamous, and forswore:
Witnesse the burning Altars, which° he swore, by which
And guiltie heavens of° his bold perjury, i.e., and heavens polluted by

Through weakenesse of my widowhed, or woe:
For truth is strong, her rightfull cause to plead,
And shall find friends, if need requireth soe,
So bids thee well to fare, Thy neither friend, nor foe, Fidessa."

29

When he these bitter byting words had red,
The tydings straunge did him abashed make,
That still he sate long time astonished
As in great muse,° ne word to creature spake. amazement
At last his solemne silence thus he brake,
With doubtfull eyes fast fixed on his guest:
"Redoubted° knight, that for mine onely sake[7] honored
Thy life and honour late adventurest,
Let nought be hid from me, that ought to be exprest.

"What meane these bloudy vowes, and idle threats,

31

To whom the Redcrosse knight this answere sent,
"My Lord, my King, be nought hereat dismayd,
Till well ye wote by grave intendiment,° serious investigation

With breach of love, and loyalty betrayd.

Then stepped forth the goodly royall Mayd,
And on the ground her selfe prostrating low,
With sober countenaunce thus to him sayd:
"O pardon me, my soveraigne Lord, to show
The secret treasons, which of late I know
To have bene wroght by that false sorceresse.

The king was greatly moved at her speach,

Then gan they sprinckle all the posts with wine,
And made great feast to solemnize that day;
They all perfumde with frankencense divine,
And precious odours fetcht from far away,
That all the house did sweat with great aray:
And all the while sweete Musicke did apply

[9] Banns, i.e., announcements of marriage.

[1] Marriages in ancient times were solemnized with sacramental fire and water.

Singing before th' eternall majesty,
In their trinall triplicities[2] on hye;
Yet wist° no creature, whence that heavenly sweet° knew / delight
Proceeded, yet each one felt secretly° inwardly
Himselfe thereby reft of his sences meet,° proper
And ravished with rare impression in his sprite.°[3] spirit

40

Great joy was made that day of young and old,
And solemne feast proclaimd throughout the land,
That their exceeding merth may not be told:
Suffice it heare by signes to understand
The usuall joyes at knitting of loves band.
Thrise happy man the knight himselfe did hold,
Possessed of his Ladies hart and hand,
And ever, when his eye did her behold,
His heart did seeme to melt in pleasures manifold.

41

Her joyous presence and sweet company
In full content he there did long enjoy,
Ne wicked envie, ne vile gealosy
His deare delights were able to annoy:
Yet swimming in that sea of blisfull joy,
He nought forgot, how he whilome° had sworne, formerly
In case he could that monstrous beast destroy,
Unto his Faerie Oueene backe to returne:
The which he shortly did, and Una left to mourne.

Now strike your sailes ye jolly Mariners,
For we be come unto a quiet rode,° harbor
Where we must land some of our passengers,
And light this wearie vessell of her lode.
Here she a while may make her safe abode,
Till she repaired have her tackles spent,° worn out
And wants supplide. And then againe abroad
On the long voyage whereto she is bent:
Well may she speede and fairely finish her intent

[2] The "trinall triplicities" are the nine angelic orders, divided into three groups of three, the whole hierarchy corresponding to the nine spheres of the universe. The music heard in this stanza is the music of the spheres, not audible on earth since the Fall.

[3] "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come" (Revelation 19.7). In Revelation, the marriage of Christ and the New Jerusalem signals the general redemption.

The Legend of Sir Guyon, or
Of Temperaunce

Summary In Book Two, Sir Guyon represents and becomes the virtue of Temperance, which requires moderation, self-control, and sometimes abstinence in regard to anger, sex, greed, ambition, and the whole spectrum of passions, desires, pleasures, and material goods. In his climactic adventure, he visits and destroys the Bower of Bliss of the witch Acrasia.

From Canto 12

[THE BOWER OF BLISS][1]

42

Thence passing forth, they[2] shortly do arrive,
Whereas the Bowre of Blisse was situate;
A place pickt out by choice of best alive,° the best living artisans
That natures worke by art can imitate:
In which what ever in this worldly state
Is sweet, and pleasing unto living sense,
Or that may dayntiest fantasie aggrate,° please, satisfy
Was poured forth with plentifull dispence,° liberality
And made there to abound with lavish affluence.

43

Goodly it was enclosed round about,
Aswell their entred guests to keepe within,
As those unruly beasts to hold without;[3]
Yet was the fence thereof but weake and thin;
Nought feard their force, that fortilage° to win,[4] fortress
But wisedomes powre, and temperaunces might,
By which the mightiest things efforced bin:° are compelled
And eke° the gate was wrought of substaunce light, also Rather for pleasure, then° for battery or fight. than

44

Yt framed° was of precious yvory, made
That seemd a worke of admirable wit;° marvelous skill

---

[1] The Bower of Bliss, perhaps the most famous of Spenser's symbolic places, has been variously interpreted. Some critics emphasize its aspects of sterility and artifice; others, its seductive and threatening eroticism and idolatry akin to that associated with the New World and Ireland.

[2] I.e., Guyon and a character called the Palmer, who is his guide throughout Book 2 (and who is usually thought to represent reason). Pilgrims to the Holy Land were called palmers in token of the palm leaves they often brought back.

[3] Just outside the Bower, Guyon and the Palmer had encountered "many beasts, that roard outrageously, / As if that hungers point, or Venus sting / Had them enraged" (stanza 39). The Palmer had used the magical power of his staff to turn their aggression into cringing fear.

[4] I.e., it was not at all feared that the physical force of the beasts could breach that fortress.

And therein all the famous history
Of Jason and Medaea was ywrit;
Her mighty charmes, her furious loving fit,
His goodly conquest of the golden fleece,
His falsed° faith, and love too lightly flit,° violated / altering
The wondred° Argo, which in venturous peece[5] admired
First through the Euxine seas bore all the flowr of Greece.[6]

45

Ye might° have seene the frothy billowes fry° could/foam
Under the ship, as thorough° them she went, through
That seemd the waves were into yvory,
Or yvory into the waves were sent;
And other where the snowy substaunce sprent° sprinkled
With vermeil,° like the boyes bloud therein shed,[7] vermilion
A piteous spectacle did represent,
And otherwhiles° with gold besprinkeled; elsewhere
Yt seemd th' enchaunted flame, which did Creiisa wed.[8]

46

All this, and more might in that goodly gate
Be red; that ever open stood to all,
Which thither came: but in the Porch there sate
A comely personage of stature tall,
And semblaunce° pleasing, more then naturall, appearance
That travellers to him seemd to entize;
His looser° garment to the ground did fall, too loose
And flew about his heeles in wanton wize,
Not fit for speedy pace, or manly exercize.

47

They in that place him Genius° did call: presiding spirit
Not that celestiall powre, to whom the care
Of life, and generation of all
That lives, pertaines in charge particulare,[9]
Who wondrous things concerning our welfare,
And strange phantomes doth let us oft forsee,
And oft of secret ill bids us beware:
That is our Selfe,[1] whom though we do not see,
Yet each doth in him selfe it well perceive to bee.

48

Therefore a God him sage Antiquity
Did wisely make,[2] and good Agdistes call:
But this same[3] was to that quite contrary,
The foe of life, that good envyes° to all, grudges

---

[5] I.e., adventurous vessel.

[6] Jason, in his ship the Argo, sought the Golden Fleece of the king of Colchis; the sorceress Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with him and used "her mighty charmes" to help him obtain it.

[7] The blood of Absyrtus, Medea's younger brother, whose body she cut into pieces and scattered to delay her father's pursuit.

[8] Jason later deserted Medea for Creiisa. In revenge, Medea gave her a dress that burst into flame when she put it on; the flame consumed and thus "wed" her.

[9] I.e., not Agdistes (see next stanza), the god of generation. The true Agdistes appears in the Garden of Adonis canto of Book 3 (canto 6, stanzas 31-33).

[1] I.e., the daemon or indwelling divine power that directs the course of our lives.

[2] I.e., the wise ancients were right to declare this power a god.

[3] I.e., the Genius of the Bower.

That secretly doth us procure[0] to fall,   cause
Through guilefull semblaunts,[0] which he makes us see.   illusions
He of this Gardin had the governall,[0]   management
And Pleasures porter was devizd[0] to bee,   appointed
Holding a staffe in hand for more formalitee.

49

With diverse flowres he daintily was deckt,
And strowed round about, and by his side
A mighty Mazer bowle[4] of wine was set,
As if it had to him bene sacrifide;[0]   consecrated
Wherewith all new-come guests he gratifide:
So did he eke Sir Guyon passing by:
But he his idle curtesie defide,
And overthrew his bowle disdainfully;
And broke his staffe, with which he charmed semblants sly.[5]

50

Thus being entred, they behold around
A large and spacious plaine, on every side
Strowed with pleasauns,[0] whose faire grassy ground   pleasure-grounds
Mantled with greene, and goodly beautifide
With all the ornaments of Floraes[0] pride,   goddess of flowers
Wherewith her mother Art, as halfe in scorne
Of niggard[0] Nature, like a pompous bride   stingy
Did decke her, and too lavishly adorne,
When forth from virgin bowre she comes in th' early morne.

Thereto the Heavens alwayes Joviall,[6]
Lookt on them lovely,[0] still[0] in stedfast state,   lovingly / always Ne[0] suffred storme nor frost on them to fall,   nor
Their tender buds or leaves to violate,
Nor scorching heat, nor cold intemperate
T' afflict the creatures, which therein did dwell,
But the milde aire with season moderate
Gently attempred, and disposd so well,
That still it breathed forth sweet spirit[0] and holesome smell.   breath

52

More sweet and holesome, then[0] the pleasaunt hill   than
Of Rhodope, on which the Nimphe, that bore
A gyaunt babe, her selfe for griefe did kill;
Or the Thessalian Tempe, where of yore
Faire Daphne Phoebus hart with love did gore;
Or Ida, where the Gods lov'd to repaire,[0]   resort
When ever they their heavenly bowres forlore;[0]   deserted
Or sweet Parnasse, the haunt of Muses faire;[7]
Or Eden selfe, if ought[0] with Eden mote compaire.   aught, anything

---

[4] A drinking cup of maple.

[5] Raised deceitful apparitions. The rod and bowl are traditional emblems of enchantment (cf. Duessa's cup, 1.8, stanza 14).

[6] Serene and beneficent, as influenced by the planet Jupiter.

[7] The nymph Rhodope, who had a "gyaunt babe," Athos, by Neptune, was turned into a mountain. Daphne, another nymph, charmed Apollo so that he pursued her until she prayed for aid and was turned into a laurel tree. Mount Ida was the scene of the rape of Ganymede by Jupiter, the judgment of Paris, and the gods' vantage point for viewing the Trojan War. Mount Parnassus is the home of the Muses.

Much wondred Guyon at the faire aspect
  Of that sweet place, yet suffred no delight
  To sincke into his sence, nor mind affect,
  But passed forth, and lookt still forward right,° straight ahead
  Bridling his will, and maistering his might:
  Till that he came unto another gate;
  No gate, but like one, being goodly dight° arrayed
  With boughes and braunches, which did broad dilate° spread out
Their clasping armes, in wanton wreathings intricate.

54

So fashioned a Porch with rare device,° design
  Archt over head with an embracing vine,
  Whose bounches hanging downe, seemed to entice
  All passers by, to tast their lushious wine,
  And did themselves into their hands incline,
  As freely offering to be gathered:
  Some deepe empurpled as the Hyacint,[8]
  Some as the Rubine,° laughing sweetly red, ruby
Some like faire Emeraudes, not yet well ripened.

55

And them amongst, some were of burnisht gold,
  So made by art, to beautifie the rest,
  Which did themselves emongst the leaves enfold,
  As lurking from the vew of covetous guest,
  That the weake bowes,° with so rich load opprest, boughs
  Did bowe adowne, as over-burdened.
  Under that Porch a comely dame did rest,
  Clad in faire weedes,° but fowle disordered, garments
And garments loose, that seemd unmeet for womanhed.° womanhood

56

In her left hand a Cup of gold she held,
  And with her right the riper° fruit did reach, overripe
  Whose sappy liquor, that with fulnesse sweld,
  Into her cup she scruzd,° with daintie breach° squeezed / crushing
  Of her fine fingers, without fowle empeach,° injury
  That so faire wine-presse made the wine more sweet:
  Thereof she usd to give to drinke to each,
  Whom passing by she happened to meet:
It was her guise,° all Straungers goodly so to greet. custom

57

So she to Guyon offred it to tast;
  Who taking it out of her tender hond,
  The cup to ground did violently cast,
  That all in peeces it was broken fond,° found
  And with the liquor stained all the lond:° land
  Whereat Excesse exceedingly was wroth,
  Yet no'te° the same amend, ne yet withstond, knew not how to

---

[8] The hyacinth or jacinth, a sapphire-colored stone.

But suffered° him to passe, all° were she loth; allowed / although
Who nought regarding her displeasure forward goth.

58

There the most daintie Paradise on ground,
It selfe doth offer to his sober eye,
In which all pleasures plenteously abound,
And none does others happinesse envye:
The painted° flowres, the trees upshooting hye, brightly colored
The dales for shade, the hilles for breathing space,
The trembling groves, the ChristalP running by; dear stream
And that, which all faire workes doth most aggrace,° add grace to
The art, which all that wrought, appeared in no place.

59

One would have thought (so cunningly, the rude,
And scorned parts were mingled with the fine)
That nature had for wantonesse ensude° playfulness imitated
Art, and that Art at nature did repine;° complain
So striving each th' other to undermine,
Each did the others worke more beautifie;
So diff'ring both in willes, agreed in fine:° in the end
So all agreed through sweete diversitie,
This Gardin to adorne with all varietie.

60

And in the midst of all, a fountaine stood,
Of richest substaunce, that on earth might bee,
So pure and shiny, that the silver flood
Through every channell running one might see;
Most goodly it with curious imageree
Was over-wrought, and shapes of naked boyes,
Of which some seemd with lively jollitee,
To fly about, playing their wanton toyes,° sports
Whilest others did them selves embay° in liquid joyes. bathe

61

And over all, of purest gold was spred,
A trayle of yvie in his native hew:
For the rich mettall was so coloured,
That wight, who did not well avis'd° it vew, carefully
Would surely deeme it to be yvie trew:
Low his lascivious armes adown did creepe,
That themselves dipping in the silver dew,
Their fleecy flowres they tenderly did steepe,
Which° drops of Christall seemd for wantones to weepe. on which

62

Infinit streames continually did well
Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
The which into an ample laver° fell,
And shortly grew to so great quantitie,
That like a little lake it seemd to bee;

Whose depth exceeded not three cubits[9] hight,
That through the waves one might the bottom see,
All pav'd beneath with Jaspar shining bright,
That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright.

63

And all the margent° round about was set, border
With shady Laurell trees, thence to defend° ward off
The sunny beames, which on the billowes bet,° beat
And those which therein bathed, mote offend.° harm
As Guyon hapned by the same to wend,
Two naked Damzelles he therein espyde,
Which therein bathing, seemed to contend,
And wrestle wantonly, ne car'd to hyde,
Their dainty parts from vew of any, which them eyde.

64

Sometimes the one would lift the other quight
Above the waters, and then downe againe
Her plong,° as over maistered by might,
Where both awhile would covered remaine,
And each the other from to rise° restraine; rising
The whiles their snowy limbes, as through a vele,
So through the Christall waves appeared plaine:
Then suddeinly both would themselves unhele,° uncover
And th' amarous sweet spoiles° to greedy eyes revele. booty, plunder

65

As that faire Starre, the messenger of morne,[1]
His deawy face out of the sea doth reare:
Or as the Cyprian goddess,[2] newly borne
Of th' Oceans fruitfull froth,° did first appeare: foam
Such seemed they, and so their yellow heare
Christalline humour° dropped downe apace. clear water
Whom such when Guyon saw, he drew him neare,
And somewhat gan relent his earnest pace;
His stubborne brest gan secret pleasaunce to embrace.

66

The wanton Maidens him espying, stood
Gazing a while at his unwonted guise;° unaccustomed behavior
Then th' one her selfe low ducked in the flood,
Abasht, that her a straunger did avise:°
But th' other rather higher did arise,
And her two lilly paps aloft displayd,
And all, that might his melting hart entise
To her delights, she unto him bewrayed:° revealed
The rest hid underneath, him more desirous made.

---

[9] A cubit is about twenty inches (thus the depth is less than five feet).

[1] Unless "his" in the next line is to be taken as neuter, it implies that the reference is not to Venus but to Phosphorus (or Heophorus), the minor male divinity sometimes identified with the morning star.

[2] Venus, one of whose principal shrines was on the island of Cyprus.

67

With that, the other likewise up arose,
And her faire lockes, which formerly were bownd
Up in one knot, she low adowne did lose:° loosen
Which flowing long and thick, her cloth'd arownd,
And th' yvorie in golden mantle gownd:
So that faire spectacle from him was reft,° taken
Yet that, which reft it, no lesse faire was fownd:
So hid in lockes and waves from lookers theft,
Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.

68

Withall she laughed, and she blusht withall,
That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
And laughter to her blushing, as did fall:
Now when they spide the knight to slacke his pace,
Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
The secret signes of kindled lust appeare,
Their wanton meriments they did encreace
And to him beckned, to approch more neare,
And shewd him many sights, that courage cold could reare.[3]

69

On which when gazing him the Palmer saw,
He much rebukt those wandring eyes of his,
And counseld well, him forward thence did draw.
Now are they come nigh to the Bowre of blis
Of her fond° favorites so named amis: enamored; foolish
When thus the Palmer; "Now Sir, well avise;° take care
For here the end of all our travell° is: travel; travail
Here wonnes° Acrasia, whom we must surprise, dwells
Else she will slip away, and all our drift despise."° plan set at nought

70

Eftsoones° they heard a most melodious sound, immediately
Of all that mote delight a daintie eare,
Such as attonce might not on living ground,
Save in this Paradise, be heard elswhere:
Right hard it was, for wight,° which did it heare, person
To read,° what manner musicke that mote bee: discern
For all that pleasing is to living eare,
Was there consorted in one harmonee,
Birdes, voyces, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.

71

The joyous birdes shrouded in chearefull shade,
Their notes unto the voyce attempred° sweet; attuned
Th' Angelicall soft trembling voyces made
To th' instruments divine respondence meet:° fitting
The silver sounding instruments did meet° join
With the base murmure of the waters fall:

---

[3] That could arouse sexual desire ("courage") when cold.

The waters fall with difference discreet,° distinct variation
Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call:
The gentle warbling wind low answered to all.

72

There, whence that Musick seemed heard to bee,
Was the faire Witch her selfe[4] now solacing,° taking pleasure
With a new Lover, whom through sorceree
And witchcraft, she from farre did thither bring:
There she had him now layd a slombering,
In secret shade, after long wanton joyes:
Whilst round about them pleasauntly did sing
Many faire Ladies, and lascivious boyes,
That ever mixt their song with light licentious toyes.° amorous play

73

And all that while, right over him she hong,
With her false° eyes fast fixed in his sight, deceitful
As seeking medicine, whence she was stong,° stung
Or greedily depasturing° delight: feeding on
And oft inclining downe with lasses light,
For feare of waking him, his lips bedewd,
And through his humid eyes did sucke his spright,° spirit
Quite molten into lust and pleasure lewd;
Wherewith she sighed soft, as if his case she rewd.° pitied

74

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay:[5]
"Ah see, who so faire thing doest faine° to see, delight
In springing flowre the image of thy day;
Ah see the Virgin Rose, how sweetly shee
Doth first peepe forth with bashfull modestee,
That fairer seemes, the lesse ye see her may;
Lo see soone after, how more bold and free
Her bared bosome she doth broad display;
Loe see soone after, how she fades, and falles away.

75

"So passeth, in the passing of a day,
Of mortall life the leafe, the bud, the flowre,
Ne more doth flourish after first decay,
That earst° was sought to decke both bed and bowre, formerly
Of many a Ladie, and many a Paramowre:° lover
Gather therefore the Rose, whilest yet is prime,° (its) springtime
For soone comes age, that will her pride deflowre:
Gather the Rose of love, whilest yet is time,
Whilest loving thou mayst loved be with equal crime."

[4] Acrasia—whose name means both "intemperance" and "incontinence"—bears many resemblances to the classical Circe (in Odyssey' 10 as well as the more witchlike and seductive figure in Ovid's Metamorphoses 14) and also to the enchantresses of Italian romance who derive from Circe: Acratia in Trissino's L'ltalia liherata and Armida in Tasso's Gerusalemme liherata. Much of the description in this scene is imitated from Tasso's account of the garden of Armida.

[5] The song ("lay") of stanzas 74 and 75 imitates that in Gerusalemme liherata 16.14-15; this is a classic statement of the carpe florem (or carpe diem) theme—pick the flower of youth before it fades.

76

He ceast, and then gan all the quire of birdes
Their diverse notes t' attune unto his lay,
As in approvance of his pleasing words.
The constant paire[6] heard all, that he did say,
Yet swarved not, but kept their forward way,
Through many covert groves, and thickets close,
In which they creeping did at last display° discover
That wanton Ladie, with her lover lose,° loose, wanton
Whose sleepie head she in her lap did soft dispose

77

Upon a bed of Roses she was layd,
As faint through heat, or dight to° pleasant sin, ready for
And was arayd, or rather disarayd,
All in a vele of silke and silver thin,
That hid no whit her alablaster skin,
But rather shewd more white, if more might bee:
More subtile web Arachne° cannot spin, the spider
Nor the fine nets, which oft we woven see
Of scorched deaw, do not in th' aire more lightly flee.°

78

Her snowy brest was bare to readie spoyle
Of hungry eies, which n'ote° therewith be fild, could not
And yet through languor of her late sweet toyle,
Few drops, more cleare then Nectar, forth distild,
That like pure Orient perles[7] adowne it trild,° trickled
And her faire eyes sweet smyling in delight,
Moystened their fierie beames, with which she thrild° pierced
Fraile harts, yet quenched° not; like starry light quenched; killed
Which sparckling on the silent waves, does seeme more bright.

79

The young man sleeping by her, seemd to bee
Some goodly swayne of honorable place,° rank
That certes° it great pittie was to see certainly
Him his nobilitie so foule deface;° disgrace
A sweet regard,° and amiable grace, demeanor
Mixed with manly sternnesse did appeare
Yet sleeping, in his well proportioned face,
And on his tender lips the downy heare
Did now but freshly spring, and silken blossomes beare

80

His warlike armes, the idle instruments
Of sleeping praise,° were hong upon a tree, worthiness
And his brave° shield, full of old moniments,° splendid / marks of honor
Was fowly ra'st,° that none the signes might see; erased
Ne for them, ne for honour cared hee,
Ne ought,° that did to his advauncement tend, aught, anything
But in lewd loves, and wastfull luxuree,° licentiousness

---

[6] I.e., Guyon and the Palmer.

[7] Lustrous pearls of the East.

His dayes, his goods, his bodie he did spend:
O horrible enchantment, that him so did blend.° blind

81

The noble Elfe,[8] and carefull Palmer drew
So nigh them, minding nought, but° lustfull game, heedful only of
That suddein forth they on them rusht, and threw
A subtile net, which onely for the same
The skilfull Palmer formally° did frame.[9] expressly
So held them under fast, the whiles the rest
Fled all away from feare of fowler shame.
The faire Enchauntresse, so unwares opprest,° surprised
Tryde all her arts, and all her sleights, thence out to wrest.

82

And eke° her lover strove: but all in vaine; also
For that same net so cunningly was wound,
That neither guile, nor force might it distraine.° tear
They tooke them both, and both them strongly bound
In captive bandes,° which there they readie found: bonds
But her in chaines of adamant[1] he tyde;
For nothing else might keepe her safe and sound;
But Verdant° (so he hight°) he soone untyde, Green / was called
And counsell sage in steed° thereof to him applyde. instead

83

But all those pleasant bowres and Pallace brave,° splendid
Guyon broke downe, with rigour pittilesse;
Ne ought their goodly workmanship might save
Them from the tempest of his wrathfulnesse,
But that their blisse he turn'd to balefulnesse:° distress
Their groves he feld, their gardins did deface,
Their arbers spoyle, their Cabinets° suppresse, bowers
Their banket° houses burne, their buildings race,° banquet / raze
And of the fairest late, now made the fowlest place.

84

Then led they her away, and eke that knight
They with them led, both sorrowfull and sad:
The way they came, the same retourn'd they right,
Till they arrived, where they lately had
Charm'd those wild-beasts, that rag'd with furie mad.[2]
Which now awaking, fierce at them gan fly,
As in their mistresse reskew, whom they lad;° led
But them the Palmer soone did pacify.
Then Guyon askt, what meant those beastes, which there did ly.

85

Said he, "These seeming beasts are men indeed,
Whom this Enchauntresse hath transformed thus,
Whylome° her lovers, which her lusts did feed, formerly

---

[8] Knight of Faerie Land, here, Guyon.

[9] The episode recalls the capture of Venus and her lover Mars in a net cunningly set around his marriage bed by Venus's husband, Vulcan, the blacksmith god (Odyssey 8.272-84).

[1] Steel or some other extremely hard substance.

[2] See above, stanza 43, note 3.

Now turned into figures hideous,
According to their mindes like monstruous."[3]
"Sad end," quoth he, "of life intemperate,
And mournefull meed° of joyes delicious: reward
But Palmer, if it mote thee so aggrate,° please Let them returned be unto their former state."

86

Streight way he with his vertuous° staffe them strooke, powerful
And streight of beasts they comely men became;
Yet being men they did unmanly looke,
And stared ghastly, some for inward shame,
And some for wrath, to see their captive Dame:
But one above the rest in speciall,
That had an hog beene late, hight° Grille[4] by name, called
Repined° greatly, and did him miscall,° complained / revile
That had from hoggish forme him brought to naturall.

87

Said Guyon, "See the mind of beastly man,
That hath so soone forgot the excellence
Of his creation, when he life began,
That now he chooseth, with vile difference,° preference
To be a beast, and lacke intelligence."
To whom the Palmer thus, "The donghill kind
Delights in filth and foule incontinence:
Let Grill be Grill, and have his hoggish mind,
But let us hence depart, whilest wether serves and wind."

From The Third Booke of The Faerie Queene

Contayning
The Legend of BritomaHis,[1]
or
Of Chastitie

Summary The third book of The Faerie Queene is a multifaceted exploration of the virtue of chastity, which is, for Spenser, closely bound up with the power of love. The principal character is the lady knight Britomart, on a quest to find her destined beloved, the knight Artegall. Her adventures are braided together with those of many others, including the twins Belphoebe and Amoret, whose miraculous conception and birth is related at the opening of canto 6. The infant Belphoebe is adopted by the goddess Diana; Amoret is taken up by the goddess Venus and brought to the Garden of Adonis, Spenser's most remarkable allegorical vision of erotic union and procreation.

---

[3] Even as their own minds were similarly monstrous. Circe changed Odysseus's companions into animals, but Odysseus had a charm to release them.

[4] According to one of Plutarch's dialogues, a man named Gryllus ("fierce," "cruel"), having been changed into a hog by Circe, refused to be restored to human form by Odysseus.

[1] The heroine's name comes from the pseudo-Virgilian poem Ciris (lines 295-305), where Britomartis is a goddess associated with Diana, the chaste goddess of the moon. For Spenser, her name suggests the (false) etymology Brito ("Britoness") + Mart ("Mars," god of war).

From Canto 6

The hirth of faire Belphoehe and
Of Amoret is told.
The Gardins of Adonis fraught
With pleasures manifold.

[THE GARDEN OF ADONIS]

Well may I weene,° faire Ladies, all this while — suppose
Ye wonder, how this noble Damozell° — i.e., Belphoehe
So great perfections did in her compile,° — gather together
Sith° that in salvage° forests she did dwell, — since / wild
So farre from court and royall Citadell,
The great schoolmistresse of all curtesy:
Seemeth that such wild woods should far expell
All civill° usage and gentility, — polite
And gentle sprite deforme with rude rusticity.

But to this faire Belphoebe in her berth
The heavens so favourable were and free,° — generous
Looking with myld aspect upon the earth,
In th' Horoscope of her nativitee,
That all the gifts of grace and chastitee
On her they poured forth of plenteous home;[2]
Jove laught on Venus from his soveraigne see,° — throne
And Phoebus with faire beames did her adorne,
And all the Graces rockt her cradle being borne.

Her berth was of the wombe of Morning dew,[3]
And her conception of the joyous Prime,° — springtime
And all her whole creation did her shew
Pure and unspotted from all loathly crime,
That is ingenerate in fleshly slime.[4]
So was this virgin borne, so was she bred,° — nourished
So was she trayned up from time to time,° — at all times
In all chast vertue, and true bounti-hed°
Till to her dew perfection she was ripened.

Her mother was the faire Chrysogonee,
The daughter of Amphisa,[5] who by race
A Faerie was, yborne of high degree,
She bore Belphoebe, she bore in like cace

---

[2] Horn of plenty, cornucopia. The planets were in favorable relationship ("myld aspect") at her birth; the combination of Jupiter ("Jove") and Venus was thought to be especially fortunate.

[3] An echo of Psalm 110.3 (Book of Common Prayer): "The dew of thy birth is of the womb of the morning," taken to refer to the conception and birth of Christ.

[4] Like Christ or the Virgin, she is said to be free of original sin, which is innate ("ingenerate") in human flesh.

[5] "Of double nature" (Greek). "Chrysogonee": "golden-born" (Greek), alluding to Danae, who conceived when Jove visited her as a golden shower.

Faire Amoretta in the second place:
These two were twinnes, and twixt them two did share
The heritage of all celestiall grace.
That all the rest it seem'd they robbed bare
Of bountie,° and of beautie, and all vertues rare. goodness

It were a goodly storie, to declare,
By what straunge accident° faire Chrysogone happening
Conceived these infants, and how them she bare,
In this wild forrest wandring all alone,
After she had nine moneths fulfild and gone:
For not as other wemens commune brood,
They were enwombed in the sacred throne
Of her chaste bodie, nor with commune food,
As other wemens babes, they sucked vitall blood.

But wondrously they were begot, and bred
Through influence of th' heavens fruitfull ray,[6]
As it in antique bookes is mentioned.
It was upon a Sommers shynie day,
When Titan[7] faire his beames did display,
In a fresh fountaine, farre from all mens vew,
She bathed her brest, the boyling heat t' allay;
She bathed with roses red, and violets blew,
And all the sweetest flowres, that in the forrest grew.

Till faint through irkesome° wearinesse, adowne burdensome
Upon the grassie ground her selfe she layd
To sleepe, the whiles a gentle slombring swowne° deep sleep
Upon her fell all naked bare displayd;
The sunne-beames bright upon her body playd,
Being through former bathing mollifide,° softened
And pierst into her wombe, where they embayd° steeped
With so sweet sence° and secret power unspide, sensation
That in her pregnant flesh they shortly fructifide.° bore fruit

8
Miraculous may seeme to him, that reades
So straunge ensample of conception;
But reason teacheth that the fruitfull seades
Of all things living, through impression
Of the sunbeames in moyst complexion,
Doe life conceive and quickned are by kynd:° nature
So after Nilus° inundation, the Nile's
Infinite shapes of creatures men do fynd, Informed in° the mud, on which the Sunne hath shynd.[8] formed within

---

[6] I.e., an emanation from the heavens—continuing the analogue to the Virgin's miraculous conception of Christ.

[7] The sun; the first Greek sun god, Helios, was descended from the Titans.

[8] The theory that life was spontaneously generated by the sun's influence on the moist earth is drawn from Ovid and Lucretius.

Great father he of generation
Is rightly cald, th' author of life and light;
And his faire sister for creation
Ministreth matter fit, which tempred right
With heate and humour,°eedes the living wight.[9] bodily fluid
So sprong these twinnes in wombe of Chrysogone,
Yet wist° she nought thereof, but sore affright,° knew / afraid
Wondred to see her belly so upblone,
Which still increast, till she her terme had full outgone

10

Whereof conceiving shame and foule disgrace,
Albe° her guiltlesse conscience her cleard, albeit
She fled into the wildernesse a space,° for a time
Till that unweeldy burden she had reard,° brought forth
And shund dishonor, which as death she feard
Where wearie of long travell,[1] downe to rest
Her selfe she set, and comfortably cheard;[2]
There a sad° cloud of sleepe her overkest,° heavy / overcast
And seized every sense with sorrow sore opprest.

11

It fortuned,° faire Venus having lost chanced
Her little sonne, the winged god of love,
Who for some light° displeasure, which him crost,° trivial / thwarted
Was from her fled, as flit as ayerie Dove,[3]
And left her blisfull bowre of joy above,
(So from her often he had fled away,
When she for ought° him sharpely did reprove, aught, anything
And wandred in the world in strange aray,
Disguiz'd in thousand shapes, that none might him bewray.°) discover

12

Him for to seeke, she left her heavenly hous,
The house of goodly formes and faire aspects,[4]
Whence all the world derives the glorious
Features of beautie, and all shapes select,° choice
With which high God his workmanship hath deckt;° adorned
And searched every way, through which his wings
Had borne him, or his tract° she mote° detect: track / might
She promist kisses sweet, and sweeter things
Unto the man, that of him tydings to her brings.

13

First she him sought in Court, where most he used
Whylome° to haunt,° but there she found him not; formerly / resort
But many there she found, which sore accused
His falsehood, and with foule infamous blot

[9] The moon (the sun's "sister") is thought to furnish ("ministreth") matter for the creation of life through its control of mortal bodies, especially women's.

[1] Also "travail ": labor—i.e., that of childbirth.

[2] I.e., weary of her long travels she sat down to rest and was cheered by that comfort.

[3] Venus's bird. Venus's search for the lost Cupid is based on a Greek poem by Moschus (2nd century B.C.E.), often imitated in the Renaissance.

[4] Astrological aspects of the planet Venus.

His cruell deedes and wicked wyles did spot:° vilify
Ladies and Lords she every where mote heare
Complayning, how with his empoysned shot
Their wofull harts he wounded had whyleare,° a while before
And so had left them languishing twixt hope and feare.

14

She then the Citties sought from gate to gate,
And every one did aske, did he him see;
And every one her answerd, that too late
He had him seene, and felt the crueltie
Of his sharpe darts and whot artillerie;° hot weapons
And every one threw forth reproches rife
Of his mischievous deedes, and said, That hee
Was the disturber of all civill life,
The enimy of peace, and author of all strife.

Then in the countrey she abroad him sought,
And in the rurall cottages inquired,
Where also many plaints to her were brought,
How he their heedlesse harts with love had fyred,
And his false venim through their veines inspyred;° breathed
And eke° the gentle shepheard swaynes,° which sat also/lovers
Keeping their fleecie flockes, as they were hyred,
She sweetly heard complaine, both how and what
Her sonne had to them doen; yet she did smile thereat.

16

But when in none of all these she him got,
She gan avize,° where else he mote him hyde: consider
At last she her bethought, that she had not Yet sought the salvage° woods and forrests wyde, wild
In which full many lovely Nymphes abyde,
Mongst whom might be, that he did closely lye,
Or that the love of some of them him tyde:° bound
For thy° she thither cast° her course t' apply, therefore / resolved
To search the secret haunts of Dianes company.

!7

Shortly unto the wastefull° woods she came, desolate
Whereas she found the Goddesse with her crew,
After late chace of their embrewed° game, bloodstained
Sitting beside a fountaine in a rew,° roiv
Some of them washing with the liquid dew
From off their dainty limbes the dustie sweat,
And soyle which did deforme their lively hew;
Others lay shaded from the scorching heat;
The rest upon her person gave attendance great.[5]

18

She having hong upon a bough on high
Her bow and painted quiver, had unlaste° unlaced

---

[5] This episode alludes to the myth of Actaeon, who angered Diana bv surprising her in her bath; she transformed him into a stag and he was torn apart by his own hounds.

Her silver buskins° from her nimble thigh, boots
And her lancke loynes° ungirt, and brests unbraste, slender-waist
After her heat the breathing cold to taste;
Her golden lockes, that late in tresses bright
Embreaded were for hindring of her haste,[6]
Now loose about her shoulders hong undight,° unbound
And were with sweet Ambrosia° all besprinckled light. perfume

Soone as she Venus saw behind her backe,
She was ashamed to be so loose surprized,
And woxe° halfe wroth against her damzels slacke, waxed, grew
That had not her thereof before avized,[7]
But suffred her so carelesly disguized° undressed
Be overtaken. Soone her garments loose
Upgath'ring, in her bosome she comprized,° drew together
Well as she might, and to the Goddesse rose,
Whiles all her Nymphes did like a girlond her enclose.

Goodly° she gan faire Cytherea[8] greet, courteously
And shortly asked her, what cause her brought Into that wildernesse for her unmeet,° unsuitable
From her sweete bowres, and beds with pleasures fraught:
That suddein change she strange adventure° thought. chance
To whom halfe weeping, she thus answered,
That she her dearest sonne Cupido sought,
Who in his frowardnesse° from her was fled; stubbornness
That she repented sore, to have him angered.

21

Thereat Diana gan to smile, in scorne
Of her vaine plaint, and to her scoffing sayd;
"Great pittie sure, that ye be so forlorne° bereft
Of your gay sonne, that gives ye so good ayd
To your disports: ill mote ye bene apayd."[9]
But she was more engrieved, and replide;
"Faire sister, ill beseemes it to upbrayd
A dolefull heart with so disdainfull pride;
The like that mine, may be your paine another tide.° time

22

"As you in woods and wanton wildernesse
Your glory set, to chace the salvage beasts,
So my delight is all in joyfulnesse,
In beds, in bowres, in banckets,° and in feasts: banquets
And ill becomes you with your loftie creasts,° helmets

---

[6] I.e., her golden locks were braided ("embreaded"), lest they should hinder her swiftness.

[7] I.e., she was half-angered at her nymphs, who were remiss in not warning her (of Venus's presence).

[8] Venus, so named in allusion to her emergence from the sea on the island of Cythera.

[9] I.e., your son aids you in your bad sports; may you be repaid in kind by this ill trick he plays on you.

To scorne the joy, that Jove is glad to seeke;
We both are bound to follow heavens beheasts,
And tend our charges° with obeisance meeke: duties
Spare, gentle sister, with reproch my paine to eeke.° augment

23

"And tell me, if that ye my sonne have heard,
To lurk emongst your Nymphes in secret wize;
Or keepe their cabins:° much I am affeard, caves
Least° he like one of them him selfe disguize, lest
And turne his arrowes to their exercize:[1]
So may he long himselfe full easie hide:
For he is faire and fresh in face and guize,
As any Nymph (let not it be envyde.°)"
So saying every Nymph full narrowly she eyde.

24

But Phoebe° therewith sore was angered, another name for Diana
And sharply said; "Goe Dame, goe seeke your boy,
Where you him lately left, in Mars his bed;[2]
He comes not here, we scorne his foolish joy,
Ne lend we leisure to his idle toy:° game
But if I catch him in this company,
By Stygian lake I vow, whose sad annoy° grievous affliction
The Gods doe dread,[3] he dearely shall abye:° suffer lie clip his wanton wings, that he no more shall fly.'

25

Whom when as Venus saw so sore displeased,
She inly sory was, and gan relent,° soften
What she had said: so her she soone appeased,
With sugred words and gentle blandishment,[4]
Which as a fountaine from her sweet lips went,
And welled goodly forth, that in short space
She was well pleasd, and forth her damzels sent,
Through all the woods, to search from place to place,
If any tract° of him or tydings they mote trace. track

26

To search the God of love, her Nymphes she sent Throughout the wandring forrest every where:
And after them her selfe eke° with her went also
To seeke the fugitive, both farre and nere.
So long they sought, till they arrived were
In that same shadie covert, whereas lay
Faire Crysogone in slombry traunce whilere:° a while before
Who in her sleepe (a wondrous thing to say)
Unwares had borne two babes, as faire as springing° day.

---

[1] I.e., he may shoot his arrows disguised as one of Diana's hunting nymphs (also, he may shoot at them, causing them to fall in love).

[2] Referring to Venus's love affair with Mars.

[3] An oath sworn on the river Styx even the gods feared to break.

Unwares she them conceived, upwares she bore:
She bore withouten paine, that she conceived
Withouten pleasure: ne her need° implore nor did she need to
Lucinaes[5] aide: which when they both perceived,
They were through wonder nigh of sense bereaved,
And gazing each on other, nought bespake:
At last t-hey both agreed, her seeming grieved° oppressed (-with sleep)
Out of her heavy swowne not to awake,
But from her loving side the tender babes to take.

28

Up they them tooke, each one a babe uptooke,
And with them carried, to be fostered;
Dame Phoebe to a Nymph her babe betooke,° gave in charge
To be upbrought in perfect Maydenhed,° virginity
And of her selfe her name Belphoebe red:° called
But Venus hers thence farre away convayd,
To be upbrought in goodly womanhed,
And in her litle loves stead, which was strayd,
Her Amoretta[6] cald, to comfort her dismayd.

29

She brought her to her joyous Paradize,
Where most she wonnes," when she on earth does dwel. dwells
So faire a place, as Nature can devize:
Whether in Paphos, or Cytheron hill,
Or it in Gnidus be, I wote not well;[7]
But well I wote° by tryall,° that this same know / experience
All other pleasant places doth excell,
And called is by her lost lovers name,
The Gardin of Adonis,[8] farre renowmd by fame.

3°

In that same Gardin all the goodly flowres,
Wherewith dame Nature doth her beautifie,
And decks the girlonds° of her paramoures,° garlands / lovers
Are fetcht: there is the first seminarie° seedbed
Of all things, that are borne to live and die,
According to their kindes. Long worke it were,
Here to account° the endlesse progenie recount
Of all the weedes,° that bud and blossome there; plants
But so much as doth need, must needs be counted° here. recounted

31

It sited° was in fruitfull soyle of old, placed
And girt in with two walles on either side;
The one of yron, the other of bright gold,
That none might thorough breake, nor over-stride:
And double gates it had, which opened wide,

---

[5] "Lucina" is another name for Juno (or sometimes Diana) as goddess of childbirth.

[6] Because she takes the place of Cupid (Amor), she is named Amoretta, "a little love."

[7] These are all shrines of Venus.

[8] The beautiful young hunter Adonis, passionately loved by Venus, was, in the standard version of the myth, killed by a boar.

By which both in and out men moten° pas; might
Th' one faire and fresh, the other old and dride:
Old Genius[9] the porter of them was,
Old Genius, the which a double nature has.

32

He letteth in, he letteth out to wend,° go
All that to come into the world desire;
A thousand thousand naked babes attend
About him day and night, which doe require,
That he with fleshly weedes would them attire:[1]
Such as him list,° such as eternall fate as he chooses
Ordained hath, he clothes with sinfull mire,° earth
And sendeth forth to live in mortall state,
Till they againe returne backe by the hinder gate.

33

After that they againe returned beene,
They in that Gardin planted be againe;
And grow afresh, as° they had never seene as if
Fleshly corruption, nor mortall paine.
Some thousand yeares so doen they there remaine;
And then of him are clad with other hew,° form
Or sent into the chaungefull world againe,
Till thither they returne, where first they grew:
So like a wheele around they runne from old to new.[2]

34

Ne° needs there Gardiner to set, or sow, neither
To plant or prune: for of their owne accord
All things, as they created were, doe grow,
And yet remember well the mightie word,
Which first was spoken by th' Almightie lord,
That bad them to increase and multiply:[3]
Ne° doe they need with water of the ford,° "/ stream
Or of the clouds to moysten their roots dry;
For in themselves eternall moisture they imply.° contain

35

Infinite shapes of creatures there are bred,
And uncouth° formes, which none yet ever knew, strange
And every sort is in a sundry° bed separate
Set by it selfe, and ranckt in comely rew:° row
Some fit for reasonable soules t' indew,[4]
Some made for beasts, some made for birds to weare,
And all the fruitfull spawne of fishes hew° shape

---

[9] God of generation and so of the natural processes, birth and death. The Garden of Adonis is a myth of Spenser's devising.

[1] I.e., the souls in their preexistent state ("naked babes") request to be clothed with flesh.

[2] The original source for Spenser's myth of cyclic generation and reincarnation is Plato's Republic 10 (the myth of Er).

[3] "And God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Genesis 1.28).

[4] I.e., some of these shapes are fit for humans to assume. An echo of 1 Corinthians 15.39: "All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes and another of birds."

In endlesse rancks along enraunged were,
That seem'd the Ocean could not containe them there.

36

Daily they grow, and daily forth are sent
Into the world, it to replenish more;
Yet is the stocke not lessened, nor spent,
But still remaines in everlasting store,° abundance
As it at first created was of yore.
For in the wide wombe of the world there lyes,
In hatefull darkenesse and in deepe horrore,
An huge eternall Chaos, which supplyes
The substances of natures fruitfull progenyes.

37

All things from thence doe their first being fetch,
And borrow matter, whereof they are made,
Which when as forme and feature it does ketch,°
Becomes a bodie, and doth then invade° enter
The state of life, out of the griesly° shade. ghastly
That substance° is eterne, and bideth so, matter
Ne when the life decayes, and forme does fade,
Doth it consume,° and into nothing go, is it destroyed
But chaunged is, and often altred to and fro.

38

The substance is not chaunged, nor altered,
But th' only forme° and outward fashion; except only the form
For every substance is conditioned
To change her hew,° and sundry formes to don, appearance
Meet° for her temper and complexion: suited
For formes are variable and decay,
By course of kind,° and by occasion;
And that faire flowre of beautie fades away,
As doth the lilly fresh before the sunny ray.

39

Great enimy to it, and to all the rest,
That in the Gardin of Adonis springs,
Is wicked Time, who with his scyth addrest,° armed
Does mow the flowring herbes and goodly things,
And all their glory to the ground downe flings,
Where they doe wither, and are fowly mard:° marred
He flyes about, and with his flaggy° wings drooping
Beates downe both leaves and buds without regard,
Ne ever pittie may relent° his malice hard. soften

40

Yet pittie often did the gods relent,
To see so faire things mard, and spoyled quight:° quite
And their great mother Venus did lament
The losse of her deare brood, her deare delight;
Her hart was pierst with pittie at the sight,
When walking through the Gardin, them she spyde,
Yet no'te° she find redresse for such despight.° could not / wrong

For all that lives, is subject to that law:
All things decay in time, and to their end do draw.

41

But were it not, that Time their troubler is,
All that in this delightfull Gardin growes,
Should happie be, and have immortall blis:
For here all plentie, and all pleasure flowes,
And sweet love gentle fits° emongst them throwes, i.e., fits of passion
Without fell° rancor, or fond° gealosie; fierce / foolish
Franckly each paramour his leman knowes,[5]
Each bird his mate, ne any does envie
Their goodly meriment, and gay felicitie.

42

There is continuall spring, and harvest there[6]
Continuall, both meeting at one time:
For both the boughes doe laughing blossomes beare,
And with fresh colours decke the wanton Prime,° spring
And eke attonce the heavy trees they clime,
Which seeme to labour under their fruits lode:
The whiles the joyous birdes make their pastime
Emongst the shadie leaves, their sweet abode,
And their true loves without suspition° tell abrode. fear

43

Right in the middest of that Paradise,
There stood a stately Mount, on whose round top
A gloomy° grove of mirtle trees[7] did rise, dark, shady
Whose shadie boughes sharpe Steele did never lop,
Nor wicked beasts their tender buds did crop,
But like a girlond compassed the hight,
And from their fruitfull sides sweet gum did drop,
That all the ground with precious deaw bedight,
Threw forth most dainty odours, and most sweet delight.

44

And in the thickest covert of that shade,
There was a pleasant arbour, not by art,
But of the trees owne inclination° made, inclining
Which knitting their rancke° braunches part to part, dense
With wanton yvie twyne entrayld athwart,[8]
And Eglantine, and Caprifole° emong, honeysuckle
Fashiond above within their inmost part,
That nether Phoebus beams could through them throng,° press
Nor Aeolus° sharp blast could worke them any wrong. god of winds

45

And all about grew every sort° of flowre, species
To which sad lovers were transformd of yore;

---

[5] Openly each lover has intercourse with ("knowes") his mistress.

[6] The coincidence of spring and autumn is characteristic of unfallen nature in Eden; other features of this description are drawn from a common literary topic, the locus amoenus (pleasant place),

[7] Myrtle ("mirtle") trees were sacred to Venus. "Mount": with allusion to the mons veneris.

[8] I.e., with luxuriant ivy entwined among them,

Fresh Hyacinthus, Phoebus paramoure,
And dearest love,[9]
Foolish Narcisse, that likes the watry shore,
Sad Amaranthus, made a flowre but late,° only recently
Sad Amaranthus, in whose purple gore
Me seemes I see Amintas wretched fate,
To whom sweet Poets verse hath given endlesse date.[1]

46

There wont° faire Venus often to enjoy was accustomed
Her deare Adonis joyous company,
And reape sweet pleasure of the wanton boy;
There yet, some say, in secret he does ly,
Lapped in flowres and pretious spycery,° spices
By her hid from the world, and from the skill° knowledge
Of Stygian Gods,[2] which doe her love envy;
But she her selfe, when ever that she will,
Possesseth° him, and of his sweetnesse takes her fill. i.e., sexually

47

And sooth° it seemes they say: for he may° not truth / can
For ever die, and ever buried bee
In balefull night, where all things are forgot;
All° be he subject to mortalitie, although
Yet is eterne in mutabilitie,
And by succession made perpetuall,
Transformed oft, and chaunged diverslie:
For him the Father of all formes they call;[3]
Therefore needs mote° he live, that living gives to all. must

48

There now he liveth in eternall blis,
Joying° his goddesse, and of her enjoyd: enjoying
Ne feareth he henceforth that foe of his,
Which with his cruell tuske him deadly cloyd:° gored
For that wilde Bore, the which him once annoyd,° injured
She firmely hath emprisoned for ay,
That her sweet love his malice mote° avoyd, might
In a strong rocky Cave, which is they say,
Hewen underneath that Mount, that none him losen° may. set free

49

There now he lives in everlasting joy,
With many of the Gods in company,
Which thither haunt,° and with the winged boy frequent
Sporting himselfe in safe felicity:
Who when he[4] hath with spoiles° and cruelty plundering

---

[9] This quatrain is damaged—in rhyme pattern as well as in the truncated fourth line.

[1] The purple Amaranthus is a symbol of immortality; the Greek name means "unfading." By one poetic account, Amintas died for the love of Phillis and was transformed into the Amaranthus. Hyacinth and Narcissus were also transformed into flowers and thereby eternized.

[2] Gods of the underworld (e.g., Pluto, Hecate, the Furies, Charon) who have a claim on Adonis in that in the usual formulation of the myth he was killed by the boar.

[3] Adonis imposes successive forms on enduring substance and thereby brings living creatures into being.

[4] Cupid, now restored to Venus.

Ransackt the world, and in the wofull harts
Of many wretches set his triumphes hye,
Thither resorts, and laying his sad darts°
Aside, with faire Adonis playes his wanton parts.

50

And his true love faire Psyche with him playes,[5]
Faire Psyche to him lately reconcyld,
After long troubles and unmeet upbrayes,° uphraidings, scoldings
With which his mother Venus her revyld,° reviled
And eke himselfe her cruelly exyld:
But now in stedfast love and happy state
She with him lives, and hath him borne a chyld,
Pleasure, that doth both gods and men aggrate,° gratify
Pleasure, the daughter of Cupid and Psyche late.° recently born

Hither great Venus brought this infant faire,
The younger daughter of Chrysogonee,
And unto Psyche with great trust and care
Committed her, yfostered to bee,
And trained up in true feminitee:° womanliness
Who no lesse carefully her tendered,° cared for
Then her owne daughter Pleasure, to whom shee
Made her companion, and her lessoned
In all the lore of love, and goodly womanhead.

52

In which when she to perfect ripenesse grew,
Of grace and beautie noble Paragone,
She brought her forth into the worldes vew,
To be th' ensample of true love alone,
And Lodestarre° of all chaste affectione, guiding star
To all faire Ladies, that doe live on ground.
To Faery court she came, where many one
Admyrd her goodly haveour,° and found demeanor
His feeble hart wide launched° with loves cruell wound. pierced

53

But she to none of them her love did cast,
Save to the noble knight Sir Scudamore,[6]
To whom her loving hart she linked fast
In faithfull love, t' abide for evermore,
And for his dearest sake endured sore,
Sore trouble of an hainous enimy;
Who her would forced have to have forlore° forsaken
Her former love, and stedfast loyalty,
As ye may elsewhere read that ruefull history.

---

[5] "Playes" suggests, as well, sexual play. Cupid abandoned Psyche when she disobeyed his command not to look on his face; she became his bride, and immortal, after enduring many severe trials imposed by Venus. The myth was often read as an allegory of the soul's trials in this life before it gains heaven.

[6] See canto 11, stanza 7 and note.

Cantos 7—10 Summary Cantos 7 and 8 focus especially on the adventures of the beautiful maiden Florimell, who, always in flight from threatening males, narrowly escapes a series of disasters. Cantos 9 and 10 tell the story of the aged and fanatically jealous miser Malbecco, his lusty young wife, Hellenore, her elopement with the knight Paridell, Malbecco's fruitless pursuit of them, and his eventual transformation into the allegorical figure of Jealousy.

Canto 11

Britomart chaceth Ollyphant, findes Scudamour distrest:
Assayes° the house of Busyrane, assails
where Loves spoyles are exprest. displayed

O Hatefull hellish Snake,° what furie furst i.e., jealousy
Brought thee from balefull house of Proserpine,[7]
Where in her bosome she thee long had nurst,
And fostred up with bitter milke of tine,° anguish
Fowle Gealosie, that turnest love divine
To joylesse dread, and mak'st the loving hart
With hatefull thoughts to languish and to pine,
And feed it selfe with selfe-consuming smart?
Of all the passions in the mind thou vilest art.

O let him far be banished away,
And in his stead let Love for ever dwell,
Sweet Love, that doth his golden wings embay° steep
In blessed Nectar,° and pure Pleasures well, the drink of the gods
Untroubled of vile feare, or bitter fell.° gall, rancor
And ye faire Ladies, that your kingdomes make
In th' harts of men, them governe wisely well,
And of faire Britomart ensample take,
That was as trew in love, as Turtle to her make.[8]

Who with Sir Satyrane, as earst ye red,[9]
Forth ryding from Malbeccoes hostlesse° hous, inhospitable
Far off aspyde a young man, the which fled
From an huge Geaunt, that with hideous
And hatefull outrage long him chaced thus;
It was that Ollyphant, the brother deare
Of that Argante vile and vitious,
From whom the Squire of Dames was reft whylere;° formerly
This all as bad as she, and worse, if worse ought° were.[1] anything

---

[7] Queen of Hades and consort of Pluto. The snake is an attribute of Envy, to which Jealousy is related; also the hair of the vengeful deities, the Furies, is made up of snakes.

[8] The turtledove was a common symbol of matrimonial love and fidelity.

[9] As you saw before (in 3.10, stanza 1). Satyrane had first appeared in 1.6, stanzas 20—48.

For as the sister did in feminine
And filthy lust exceede all woman kind,
So he surpassed his sex masculine,
In beastly use that I did ever find;
Whom when as Britomart beheld behind
The fearefull boy so greedily pursew,
She was emmoved in her noble mind,
T' employ her puissaunce° to his reskew, power
And pricked° fiercely forward, where she him did vew. spurred

Ne was Sir Satyrane her far behinde,
But with like fiercenesse did ensew° the chace: follow
Whom when the Gyaunt saw, he soone resinde° r
His former suit, and from them fled apace;
They after both, and boldly bad him bace,° challenged him
And each did strive the other to out-goe,
But he them both outran a wondrous space,
For he was long, and swift as any Roe,° female deer
And now made better speed, t' escape his feared foe.

It was not Satyrane, whom he did feare,
But Britomart the flowre of chastity;
For he the powre of chast hands might not beare,
But alwayes did their dread encounter fly:
And now so fast his feet he did apply,° direct
That he has gotten to a forrest neare,
Where he is shrowded in security.
The wood they enter, and search every where,
They searched diversely,° so both divided were. in different directions

Faire Britomart so long him followed,
That she at last came to a fountaine sheare,° dear
By which there lay a knight all wallowed° lying prostrate
Upon the grassy ground, and by him neare
His haberjeon,° his helmet, and his speare; coat of mail
A little off, his shield was rudely throwne,
On which the winged boy in colours cleare
Depeincted° was, full easie to be knowne, depicted
And he thereby, where ever it in field was showne.[2]

His face upon the ground did groveling° ly, prone
As if he had bene slombring in the shade,
That the brave Mayd would not for courtesy,
Out of his quiet slomber him abrade,° arouse
Nor seeme too suddeinly him to invade:° intrude on Still° as she stood, she heard with grievous throb ever

---

[2] The knight's shield implies that he is the Sir Scudamore (Italian scudo + amore: "shield of love") mentioned in the prefatory quatrain.

Him grone, as if his hart were peeces made,
And with most painefull pangs to sigh and sob,
That pitty did the Virgins hart of patience rob.

At last forth breaking into bitter plaintes
He said, "O soveraigne Lord that sit'st on hye,
And raignst in blis emongst thy blessed Saintes,
How suffrest thou such shamefull cruelty,
So long unwreaked° of thine enimy? unrevenged
Or hast thou, Lord, of good mens cause no heed?
Or doth thy justice sleepe, and silent ly?
What booteth° then the good and righteous deed, what is the use of
If goodnesse find no grace, nor righteousnesse no meed?° reward

10

"If good find grace, and righteousnesse reward,
Why then is Amoret in caytive° band, captive
Sith° that more bounteous° creature never fared since / virtuous
On foot, upon the face of living land?
Or if that heavenly justice may withstand
The wrongfull outrage of unrighteous men,
Why then is Busirane[3] with wicked hand
Suffred,° these seven monethes day in secret den permitted
My Lady and my love so cruelly to pen?

11

"My Lady and my love is cruelly pend
In dolefull darkenesse from the vew of day,
Whilest deadly torments do her chast brest rend,
And the sharpe Steele doth rive° her hart in tway,° cut / two
All for° she Scudamore will not denay.° because / deny
Yet thou vile man, vile Scudamore art sound,
Ne° canst her ayde, ne° canst her foe dismay;° neither / nor / defeat
Unworthy wretch to tread upon the ground,
For whom so faire a Lady feeles so sore a wound."

12

There an huge heape of singulfes° did oppresse sobs
His strugling soule, and swelling throbs empeach° hinder
His foltring toung with pangs of drerinesse,° anguish
Choking the remnant of his plaintife speach,
As if his dayes were come to their last reach.
Which when she heard, and saw the ghastly fit,
Threatning into his life to make a breach,
Both with great ruth° and terrour she was smit, pity
Fearing least° from her cage the wearie soule would flit. lest

13

Tho° stooping downe she him amoved° light; then/touched
Who therewith somewhat starting, up gan looke,
And seeing him behind a straunger knight,
Whereas no living creature he mistooke,° thought to be

---

[3] His name associates him with Busiris, an Egyptian king famous for his cruelty and identified with the Pharaoh of Exodus; hence, he is a symbol of tyranny.

With great indignaunce he that sight forsooke,
And downe againe himselfe disdainefully
Abjecting, th' earth with his faire forhead strooke:
Which the bold Virgin seeing, gan apply
Fit medcine to his griefe, and spake thus courtesly.

14

"Ah gentle knight, whose deepe conceived griefe
Well seemes t' exceede the powre of patience,
Yet if that heavenly grace some good reliefe
You send, submit you to high providence,
And ever in your noble hart prepense,° consider before
That all the sorrow in the world is lesse,
Then vertues might, and values° confidence, valor's
For who nill° bide the burden of distresse, will not
Must not here thinke to live: for life is wretchednesse.

"Therefore, faire Sir, do comfort to you take,
And freely read,° what wicked felon so tell
Hath outraged you, and thrald° your gentle make.° enslaved / beloved
Perhaps this hand may helpe to ease your woe,
And wreake° your sorrow on your cruell foe, revenge
At least it faire endevour will apply."
Those feeling wordes so neare the quicke° did goe, heart
That up his head he reared easily,° readily
And leaning on his elbow, these few wordes let fly.

16

"What boots it plaine, that cannot be redrest,[4]
And sow vaine sorrow in a fruitlesse eare,
Sith powre of hand, nor skill of learned brest
Ne worldly price cannot redeeme my deare,
Out of her thraidome° and continuall feare? slavery
For he the tyraunt, which her hath in ward° in his power
By strong enchauntments and blacke Magicke leare,° lore
Hath in a dungeon deepe her close embard,
And many dreadfull feends hath pointed° to her gard. appointed

17

"There he tormenteth her most terribly,
And day and night afflicts with mortall paine,
Because to yield him love she doth deny,
Once to me yold,° not to be yold againe:[5] yielded
But yet by torture he would her constraine
Love to conceive in her disdainfull brest;
Till so she do, she must in doole° remaine, vain
Ne may by living meanes be thence relest:
What boots it then to plaine, that cannot be redrest?"

18

With this sad hersall° of his heavy stresse,° tale / affliction
The warlike Damzell was empassiond sore,

---

[4] What is the use of complaining for what cannot be helped?

[5] Scudamore's courtship and winning of Amoret as his love is recounted in 4.10.

And said, "Sir knight, your cause is nothing lesse,
Then[0] is your sorrow, certes if not more;[6] than
For nothing so much pitty doth implore,
As gentle Ladies helplesse misery.
But yet, if please ye listen to my lore,[0] teaching
I will with proofe of last extremity,[7]
Deliver her fro thence, or with her for you dy."

19

"Ah gentlest[0] knight alive," said Scudamore, noblest
"What huge heroicke magnanimity[8]
Dwels in thy bounteous brest? what couldst thou more,
If she were thine, and thou as now am I?
O spare thy happy dayes, and them apply
To better boot,[0] but let me dye, that ought;
More is more losse: one is enough to dy."
"Life is not lost," said she, "for which is bought Endlesse renowm, that more then death is to be sought."

Thus she at length perswaded him to rise,
And with her wend,° to see what new successe go
Mote° him befall upon new enterprise; might
His armes, which he had vowed to disprofesse,[0] renounce
She gathered up and did about him dresse,
And his forwandred[0] steed unto him got: wandered away
So forth they both yfere[0] make their progresse, together
And march not past the mountenaunce of a shot,
Till they arrived, whereas their purpose they did plot.[9]

21

There they dismounting, drew their weapons bold
And stoutly[0] came unto the Castle gate; bravely
Whereas no gate they found, them to withhold,
Nor ward[0] to wait at morne and evening late,
But in the Porch, that did them sore amate,[0] dismay
A flaming fire, ymixt with smouldry smoke,
And stinking Sulphure, that with griesly[0] hate horrid
And dreadfull horrour did all entraunce choke,
Enforced them their forward footing to revoke.[0] draw back

Greatly thereat was Britomart dismayd,
Ne in that stownd wist,[1] how her selfe to beare;
For daunger vaine it were, to have assayd[0] attempted
That cruell element, which all things feare,
Ne none can suffer to approchen neare:
And turning backe to Scudamour, thus sayd;
"What monstrous enmity provoke[0] we heare, challenge

---

[6] I.e., certainly ("certes") your cause is worthy of your great sorrow, or even more.
[7] I.e., at the extreme peril of my life.
[8] Nobility of mind, which produces the highest virtues and the greatest deeds.
[9] I.e., they went no farther than the distance of a bow shot before they arrived at the place they purposed to go.
[1] I.e., nor in that trouble ("stownd") did she know ("wist") what to do.

Foolhardy as th' Earthes children, the which made
Battell against the Gods?[2] so we a God invade.

23

"Daunger without discretion to attempt,
Inglorious and beastlike is: therefore Sir knight
Aread° what course of you is safest dempt,° declare / deemed
And how we with our foe may come to fight."
"This is," quoth he, "the dolorous despight,° evil
Which earst° to you I playnd:° for neither may earlier / complained of
This fire be quencht by any wit or might,
Ne yet by any meanes remov'd away,
So mighty be th' enchauntments, which the same do stay. maintain

24

"What is there else, but cease these fruitlesse paines,
And leave me to my former languishing?
Faire Amoret must dwell in wicked chaines,
And Scudamore here dye with sorrowing."
"Perdy° not so," said she, "for shamefull thing truly
It were t' abandon noble chevisaunce,° chivalric enterprise
For shew of perill, without venturing:
Rather let try extremities of chaunce,
Then enterprised prayse for dread to disavaunce."[3]

25

Therewith resolv'd to prove her utmost might,
Her ample shield she threw before her face,
And her swords point directing forward right,
Assayld° the flame, the which eftsoones° gave place, assailed / immediately
And did it selfe divide with equall space,° equally on both sides
That through she passed; as a thunder bolt
Perceth the yielding ayre, and doth displace
The soring clouds into sad showres ymolt;° melted
So to her yold the flames, and did their force revolt." turn back

26

Whom whenas Scudamour saw past the fire,
Safe and untoucht, he likewise gan assay,° attempt
With greedy will, and envious desire,
And bad° the stubborne flames to yield him way: bade
But cruell Mulciber° would not obay god of fire
His threatfull pride, but did the more augment
His mighty rage, and with imperious sway
Him forst (maulgre)° his fiercenesse to relent/ nevertheless / give way
And backe retire, all scorcht and pitifully brent.

27

With huge impatience he inly swelt,° burned
More for great sorrow, that he could not pas,
Then for the burning torment, which he felt,
That with fell woodnesse he effierced was,[4]

---

[2] I.e., we are like the Titans who dared to do battle against the Olympian gods.

[3] I.e., it is better to chance extreme danger than retreat from praiseworthy enterprises because of fear.

[4] I.e., he was maddened with fierce fury.

And wilfully him throwing on the gras,
Did beat and bounse° his head and brest full sore; thump
The whiles the Championesse now entred has
The utmost rowme,° and past the formest° dore outermost room/foremost
The utmost rowme, abounding with all precious store.

28

For round about, the wals yclothed were
With goodly arras° of great majesty, tapestries
Woven with gold and silke so close and nere,° tight
That the rich metall lurked privily,° secretly
As faining° to be hid from envious eye; enjoying
Yet here, and there, and every where unwares° unexpectedly
It shewd it selfe, and shone unwillingly;
Like a discolourd° Snake, whose hidden snares multicolored
Through the greene gras his long bright burnisht backe declares.

29

And in those Tapets° weren fashioned tapestries
Many faire pourtraicts, and many a faire feate,
And all of love, and all of lusty-hed,
As seemed by their semblaunt did entreat;[5]
And eke° all Cupids warres they did repeate,° also/recount
And cruell battels, which he whilome° fought formerly
Gainst all the Gods, to make his empire great;
Besides the huge massacres, which he wrought
On mighty kings and kesars,° into thraldome brought. caesars

30

Therein was writ,° how often thundring Jove woven
Had felt the point of his hart-percing dart,
And leaving heavens kingdome, here did rove
In straunge disguize, to slake his scalding smart;
Now like a Ram, faire Helle to pervart,
Now like a Rull, Europa to withdraw:[6]
Ah, how the fearefull Ladies tender hart
Did lively° seeme to tremble, when she saw lifelike
The huge seas under her t' obay her servaunts° law. lover's

31

Soone after that into a golden showre
Him selfe he chaunged faire Danae to vew,
And through the roofe of her strong brasen towre
Did raine into her lap an hony dew,[7]
The whiles her foolish garde, that little knew
Of such deceipt, kept th' yron dore fast bard,
And watcht, that none should enter nor issew;° go out

---

[5] I.e., the pictures ("pourtraicts") seemed, by their appearance ("semblaunt"), to treat entirely of deeds of love and merriment ("lusty-hed").

[6] A golden ram (not specifically identified in legend as Jove) came to carry away ("pervert") Helle from the fury of her stepmother Ino; Jove assumed the shape of a bull to seduce Europa and carried her over the seas.

[7] In another part of the tapestry ("soone after") Jove is shown as a shower of gold, impregnating Danae.

Vaine was the watch, and bootlesse° all the ward, useless
Whenas the God to golden hew° him selfe shape
transfard. transformed

32

Then was he turnd into a snowy Swan,
To win faire Leda to his lovely° trade:[8] loving
O wondrous skill, and sweet wit° of the man, ingenuity
That her in daffadillies sleeping made,
From scorching heat her daintie limbes to shade:
Whiles the proud Bird ruffing° his fethers wyde,
And brushing° his faire brest, did her invade; preening
She slept, yet twixt her eyelids closely° spyde, secretly
How towards her he rusht, and smiled at his pryde.° sexual desire

33

Then shewd it, how the Thebane Semelee
Deceived of gealous Juno, did require
To see him in his soveraigne majestee,
Armd with his thunderbolts and lightning fire,
Whence dearely she with death bought her desire.[9]
But faire Alcmena better match did make,
Joying his love in likenesse more entire;
Three nights in one, they say, that for her sake
He then did put, her pleasures lenger° to partake.[1] longer

34

Twise was he seene in soaring Eagles shape,
And with wide wings to beat the buxome° ayre, yielding
Once, when he with Asterie did scape,
Againe, when as the Trojane boy so faire
He snatcht from Ida hill, and with him bare:[2]
Wondrous delight it was, there to behould,
How the rude Shepheards after him did stare,
Trembling through feare, least° down he fallen should, lest
And often to him calling, to take surer hould.

35

In Satyres shape Antiopa he snatcht:
And like a fire, when he Aegin' assayd:
A shepheard, when Mnemosyne he catcht:
And like a Serpent to the Thracian mayd.[3]
Whiles thus on earth great Jove these pageaunts playd,
The winged boy did thrust into° his throne, usurped
And scoffing, thus unto his mother sayd,
"Lo now the heavens obey to me alone,
And take me for their Jove, while Jove to earth is gone."

---

[8] Jove became a swan to seduce Leda.

[9] Juno tricked Semele into having jove visit her in all his power; she was burned to death by lightning and thunderbolts.

[1] Jove visited Alcmena in the likeness of her husband Amphitryon and made that one night the length of three.

[2] Asterie changed herself into a quail to avoid Jove's advances, but he captured her as an eagle; in that form he also snatched Ganymede, who became cupbearer to the gods.

[3] Jove came as a satyr to Antiope; in fire to Aegina; as a shepherd to Mnemosyne, goddess of memory (who bore the Nine Muses); and as a serpent to Proserpina, "the Thracian maid."

6^{2}

And thou, faire Phoebus, in thy colours bright
Wast there enwoven, and the sad distresse,
In which that boy thee plonged, for despight,
That thou bewrayedst° his mothers wantonnesse, revealed
When she with Mars was meynt° in joyfulnesse: mingled, joined
For thy° he thrild° thee with a leaden dart, therefore / pierced
To love faire Daphne, which thee loved lesse:[4]
Lesse she thee loved, then was thy just desart,
Yet was thy love her death, and her death was thy smart.° pain

37

So lovedst thou the lusty° Hyacinct, handsome
So lovedst thou the faire Coronis deare:
Yet both are of° thy haplesse hand extinct,
Yet both in flowres do live, and love thee beare,
The one a Paunce, the other a sweet breare:[5]
For griefe whereof, ye mote have lively° seene lifelike
The God himselfe rending his golden heare,
And breaking quite his gyrlond° ever greene, garland
With other signes of sorrow and impatient teene.° grief

38

Both for those two, and for his owne deare sonne,
The sonne of Climene he did repent,
Who bold to guide the charet of the Sunne,
Himselfe in thousand peeces fondly rent,[6]
And all the world with flashing fier brent;
So like, that all the walles did seeme to flame.
Yet cruell Cupid, not herewith content,
Forst him eftsoones° to follow other game, soon after
And love a Shepheards daughter for his dearest Dame.

39

He loved Isse for his dearest Dame,
And for her sake her cattell fed a while,
And for her sake a cowheard vile° became, lowly
The servant of Admetus cowheard vile,
Whiles that from heaven he suffered exile.[7]
Long were to tell each other lovely fit,° amorous passion
Now like a Lyon, hunting after spoile,
Now like a Stag, now like a faulcon flit:° fleet
All which in that faire arras was most lively writ.

[4] Two stories are combined: Apollo's punishment for revealing Venus's adultery with Mars was "the sad distresse" of doting on Leucothoe; later he chased Daphne, who escaped by metamorphosis into a laurel tree. Cupid's lead-tipped arrows produce unhappiness in love.

[5] Apollo accidentally killed his lover Hyacinth at a game of quoits, and transformed him into a flower ("paunce," pansy); he killed Coronis out of jealousy, but her transformation to a sweetbriar seems to be Spenser's invention.

[6] Foolishly tore apart. Phaethon, son of Apollo and Climene, extracted permission to drive the chariot of the Sun through the heavens; unable to control the horses, he killed himself and almost burned up the world.

[7] Two stories are combined: Apollo disguising himself as a shepherd to gain Isse, and serving Admetus, king of Pheres in Thessaly, as a cowherd.

4°

Next unto him was Neptune[8] pictured,
In his divine resemblance wondrous lyke:
His face was rugged, and his hoarie° hed — gray
Dropped with brackish° deaw; his three-forkt Pyke — salty
He stearnly shooke, and therewith fierce did stryke
The raging billowes, that on every syde
They trembling stood, and made a long broad dyke,° — trench
That his swift charet might have passage wyde,
Which foure great Hippodames did draw in temewise tyde.° — harnessed

41

His sea-horses did seeme to snort amayne,° — violently
And from their nosethrilles° blow the brynie streame, — nostrils
That made the sparckling waves to smoke agayne,
And flame with gold, but the white fomy creame,
Did shine with silver, and shoot forth his beame.
The God himselfe did pensive seeme and sad,
And hong adowne his head, as° he did dreame: — as if
For privy° love his brest empierced had, — secret
Ne ought but deare Bisaltis[9] ay° could make him glad. — ever

42

He loved eke° Iphimedia deare, — also
And Aeolus faire daughter Arne hight,° — called
For whom he turnd him selfe into a Steare,° — steer
And fed on fodder, to beguile° her sight. — decieve
Also to win Deucalions daughter bright,
He turnd him selfe into a Dolphin fayre;[1]
And like a winged horse he tooke his flight,
To snaky-locke Medusa to repayre,° — reson
On whom he got faire Pegasus, that flitteth in the ayre.[2]

43

Next Saturne was, (but who would ever weene,° — think
That sullein Saturne ever weend° to love? — was minded
Yet love is sullein,° and Saturnlike seene, — melancholy
As he did for Erigone it prove,)
That to a Centaure did him selfe transmove.
So prooved it eke that gracious° God of wine, — graceful
When for to compasse° Philliras hard love, — gain
He turnd himselfe into a fruitfull vine,
And into her faire bosome made his grapes decline.[3]

---

[8] Neptune, god of the sea, is here portrayed with his trident ("three-forkt Pyke") and riding in a chariot ("charet") drawn by a team of four sea horses ("Hippodames").

[9] In Greek myth it was Bisaltes's daughter Theophane who made Neptune happy: he made love to her in the form of a ram.

[1] Neptune came to Iphimedia as a flowing river, to Arne as a steer, and to Deucalion's daughter Melantho as a dolphin.

[2] Neptune ravished Medusa in Minerva's temple, for which cause her hair was turned to snakes; she gave birth to the winged horse, Pegasus.

[3] Hang down. Saturn, associated with melancholy, is not usually portrayed as a lover. Spenser here transposes two myths: Saturn loved Philyra ("Philliras") not Erigone, from which union came the Centaur; Bacchus ("God of wine") tricked Erigone with a false bunch of grapes.

6[2]

Long were to tell the amorous assayes,° assaults
And gentle pangues, with which he° maked meeke i.e., Cupid
The mighty Mars, to learne his wanton playes:
How oft for Venus, and how often eek° also
For many other Nymphes he sore did shreek,
With womanish teares, and with unwarlike smarts,° pains
Privily° moystening his horrid° cheek. secretly / bristly
There was he painted full of burning darts,° arrows
And many wide woundes launched° through his inner parts. torn

45

Ne did he spare (so cruell was the Elfe)
His owne deare mother, (ah why should he so?)
Ne did he spare sometime to pricke himselfe,
That he might tast the sweet consuming woe,
Which he had wrought to many others moe.° more
But to declare the mournfull Tragedyes,
And spoiles,° wherewith he all the ground did strow, plunder
More eath° to number, with how many eyes easy
High heaven beholds sad lovers nightly theeveryes.[4]

46

Kings Queenes, Lords Ladies, Knights and Damzels gent° gentle
Were heaped together with the vulgar sort,
And mingled with the raskall rablement,° rabble, masses
Without respect of person or of port,° position
To shew Dan° Cupids powre and great effort:° master / strength
And round about a border was entrayld,° woven
Of broken bowes and arrowes shivered° short, splintered
And a long bloudy river through them rayld,° flowed
So lively and so like, that living sence it fayld.[5]

47

And at the upper end of that faire rowme,
There was an Altar built of pretious stone,
Of passing° valew, and of great renowme, surpassing
On which there stood an Image all alone,
Of massy° gold, which with his owne light shone; solid
And wings it had with sundry colours dight,° adorned
More sundry colours, then the proud Pavone° peacock
Beares in his boasted fan, or Iris° bright, goddess of the rainbow
When her discolourd[6] bow she spreds through heaven bright.

48

Blindfold he was, and in his cruell fist
A mortall° bow and arrowes keene did hold, deadly
With which he shot at randon, when him list,° when it pleased him
Some headed with sad lead, some with pure gold;[7]

---

[4] I.e., it would be easier to number the stars ("eyes") that watch lovers' nightly exploits (thieveries) than the tragedies caused by love.

[5] I.e., so animated and so lifelike that it deceived ("fayld") the senses of those looking on.

[6] Multicolored.

[7] Cupid, by tradition blindfolded, shoots at random ("randon"). His leaden arrows cause unhappiness in love; his golden arrows, happiness.

(Ah man beware, how thou those darts behold)
A wounded Dragon[8] under him did ly,
Whose hideous tayle his left foot did enfold,
And with a shaft was shot through either eye,
That no man forth might draw, ne no man remedye.

49

And underneath his feet was written thus,
Unto the Victor of the Gods this bee:
And all the people in that ample hous
Did to that image bow their humble knee,
And oft committed fowle Idolatree.
That wondrous sight faire Britomart amazed,
Ne seeing could her wonder satisfie,
But ever more and more upon it gazed,
The whiles the passing° brightnes her fraile sences dazed. surpassing

50

Tho° as she backward° cast her busie eye, then / i.e., behind the statue
To search each secret of that goodly sted,° place
Over the dore thus written she did spye
Be bold: she oft and oft it over-red,
Yet could not find what sence it figured:
But what so were therein or° writ or ment, either
She was no whit thereby discouraged
From prosecuting of her first intent,
But forward with bold steps into the next roome went.

51

Much fairer, then° the former, was that roome, than
And richlier by many partes arayd:[9]
For not with arras made in painefull° loome, painstaking
But with pure gold it all was overlayd,
Wrought with wilde Antickes,[1] which their follies playd,
In the rich metall, as° they living were: as if
A thousand monstrous formes therein were made,
Such as false love doth oft upon him weare,
For love in thousand monstrous formes doth oft appeare.

52

And all about, the glistring walles were hong
With warlike spoiles, and with victorious prayes,° prizes
Of mighty Conquerours and Captaines strong,
Which were whilome° captived in their dayes formerly
To cruell love, and wrought their owne decayes:
Their swerds and speres were broke, and hauberques[2] rent;
And their proud girlonds of tryumphant bayes[3]
Troden in dust with fury insolent,
To shew the victors might and mercilesse intent.

---

[8] The dragon is traditionally a guard, symbolic of vigilance.

[9] I.e., much ("by many parts") more richly decorated ("arayd").

[1] Grotesque statues.

[2] Coats of mail. "Swerds": swords.

[3] Wreaths of laurel ("bays") were traditionally awarded to great military conquerors.

53

The warlike Mayde beholding earnestly
The goodly ordinance° of this rich place, ordnance, military supplies
Did greatly wonder, ne could satisfie
Her greedy eyes with gazing a long space,
But more she mervaild that no footings trace,° trace of footprints
Nor wight appear'd, but wastefull° emptinesse, uninhabited
And solemne silence over all that place:
Straunge thing it seem'd, that none was to possesse
So rich purveyance,° ne them keepe with carefulnesse. furnishings

54

And as she lookt about, she did behold,
How over that same dore was likewise writ,
Be bold, be bold, and every where Be bold,
That much she muz'd, yet could not construe it
By any ridling skill, or commune wit.° common sense
At last she spyde at that roomes upper end,
Another yron dore, on which was writ,
Be not too bold; whereto though she did bend
Her earnest mind, yet wist not what it might intend.° mean

55

Thus she there waited untill eventyde,
Yet living creature none she saw appeare:
And now sad° shadowes gan the world to hyde, somber
From mortall vew, and wrap in darkenesse dreare;
Yet nould° she d' off her weary armes, for feare would not
Of secret daunger, ne let sleepe oppresse
Her heavy eyes with natures burdein deare,
But drew her selfe aside in sickernesse,° safety
And her welpointed weapons did about her dresse.[4]

Canto 12

The maske[5] of Cupid, and th' enchaunted
Chamber are displayd,
Whence Britomart redeemes faire
Amoret, through charmes decayd. ° wasted away

i

Tho° when as chearelesse Night ycovered had then
Faire heaven with an universall cloud,
That every wight dismayd with darknesse sad,° sober
In silence and in sleepe themselves did shroud,
She heard a shrilling Trompet sound aloud,
Signe of nigh° battell, or got° victory; approaching / achieved
Nought therewith daunted was her courage proud,
But rather stird to cruell° enmity, fierce
Expecting° ever, when some foe she might descry.° waiting / perceive

[4] Her well-appointed (and/or sharp) weapons she drew ("did dresse") about her.

[5] This episode resembles a court masque with allegorical personages and emblematic clothing and props. It is also a "Triumph" of Cupid, who is preceded and followed by the allegorical qualities that attend on his reign and who displays Amoret as the spoils of his victory, the victim of the attitudes toward love which he promotes.

With that, an hideous storme of winde arose,
   With dreadfull thunder and lightning atwixt,
   And an earth-quake, as if it streight° would lose° immediately / loosen
   The worlds foundations from his centre fixt;
   A direfull stench of smoke and sulphure mixt
   Ensewd, whose noyance° fild the fearefull sted,° annoyance / place
   From the fourth houre of night untill the sixt;[6]
   Yet the bold Britonesse was nought ydred,
Though much emmoved, but stedfast still persevered.

All suddenly a stormy whirlwind blew
   Throughout the house, that clapped° every dore, slammed
   With which that yron wicket° open flew, door
   As° it with mightie levers had bene tore: as if
   And forth issewd, as on the ready flore
   Of some Theatre, a grave personage,
   That in his hand a branch of laurell bore,
   With comely haveour° and count'nance sage,
Yclad in costly garments, fit for tragicke Stage.

Proceeding to the midst, he still did stand,
   As if in mind he somewhat had to say,
   And to the vulgar° beckning with his hand, groundlings
   In signe of silence, as to heare a play,
   By lively actions he gan bewray° reveal
   Some argument of matter passioned;
   Which doen, he backe retyred soft away,
   And passing by, his name discovered,° revealed
Ease, on his robe in golden letters cyphered.[7]

The noble Mayd, still standing all this vewd,
   And merveild at his strange intendiment;° purpose
   With that a joyous fellowship issewd
   Of Minstrals, making goodly meriment,
   With wanton Bardes, and Rymers impudent,
   All which together sung full chearefully
   A lay° of loves delight, with sweet concent:° song / harmony
   After whom marcht a jolly company,
In manner of a maske, enranged orderly.[8]

The whiles a most delitious harmony,
   In full straunge notes was sweetly heard to sound,
   That the rare sweetnesse of the melody
   The feeble senses wholly did confound,

[6] Night begins at 6 P.M., SO these effects take place from 10 P.M. to midnight, when the masque begins.

[7] I.e., by pantomime he indicates that the subject ("argument") of the masque concerns passion. The part of presenter is taken by Ease, suggesting that it predisposes to lechery. Similarly, Idleness leads the procession of the Seven Deadly Sins (1.4, stanzas 18-20).

[8] As here, most masques had twelve masquers, forming six couples. The love song at the processional is performed by musicians ("Minstrals") and poets of varying quality ("Bardes" and "Rymers").

And the fraile soule in deepe delight nigh dround:
And when it ceast, shrill trompets loud did bray,
That their report° did farre away rebound, echo
And when they ceast, it gan againe to play,
The whiles the maskers marched forth in trim aray.

The first was Fancy,[9] like a lovely boy,
Of rare aspect, and beautie without peare;° peer, equal
Matchable either to that ympe of Troy,[1]
Whom Jove did love, and chose his cup to beare,
Or that same daintie lad, which was so deare
To great Alcides,[2] that when as he dyde,
He wailed womanlike with many a teare,
And every wood, and every valley wyde
He fild with Hylas name; the Nymphes eke° Hylas cryde also

8

His garment neither was of silke nor say,° fine wool
But painted plumes, in goodly order dight,
Like as the sunburnt Indians° do aray Native Americans
Their tawney bodies, in their proudest plight:° attire
As those same plumes, so seemd he vaine and light,
That by his gate might easily appeare;
For still° he far'd as dauncing in delight, ever
And in his hand a windy° fan did beare, causing wind
That in the idle aire he mov'd still here and there.

And him beside marcht amorous Desyre,
Who seemd of riper yeares, then th' other Swaine,° lover
Yet was that other swayne this elders syre,
And gave him being, commune to them twaine:
His garment was disguised very vaine,[3]
And his embrodered Bonet sat awry;
Twixt both his hands few sparkes he close did straine,° clasp
Which still he blew, and kindled busily,
That soone they life conceiv'd, and forth in flames did fly.

10

Next after him went Doubt, who was yclad
In a discolour'd° cote, of straunge disguyse, multicolored
That at his backe a brode Capuccio had,
And sleeves dependant Albanese-wyse:[4]
He lookt askew with his mistrustfull eyes,
And nicely° trode, as° thornes lay in his way, cautiously / as if
Or that the flore to shrinke he did avyse,

[9] The mind's power to produce images that are often misleading or false.

[1] Ganymede, as in 3.1 1.301—06.

[2] Hercules, whose beloved Hylas was drowned.

[3] I.e., Desire seems older than Fancy, but Fancy is in fact his father; he was dressed fantastically ("disguised very vaine").

[4] Hanging down in Albanian (i.e., Scottish: Albany is a dukedom in Scotland) fashion—as in academic gowns. His hood ("Capucchio") resembles that of a Capuchin monk.

And on a broken reed he still did stay
His feeble steps, which shrunke, when hard theron he lay.[5]

11

With him went Daunger, clothed in ragged weed,° garment
Made of Beares skin, that him more dreadfull made,
Yet his owne face was dreadfull, ne did need
Straunge horrour, to deforme his griesly shade;
A net in th' one hand, and a rustie blade[6]
In th' other was, this Mischiefe, that Mishap;
With th' one his foes he threatned to invade,° attack
With th' other he his friends ment to enwrap:
For whom he could not kill, he practizd° to entrap. plotted

12

Next him was Feare, all arm'd from top to toe,
Yet thought himselfe not safe enough thereby,
But feard each shadow moving to and fro,
And his owne armes when glittering he did spy,
Or clashing heard, he fast away did fly,
As ashes pale of hew, and wingyheeld;[7]
And evermore on Daunger fixt his eye,
Gainst whom he alwaies bent° a brasen shield, turned
Which his right hand unarmed fearefully did wield.

13

With him went Hope in rancke, a handsome Mayd,
Of chearefull looke and lovely to behold;
In silken samite° she was light arayd, a rich silk
And her faire lockes were woven up in gold;
She alway smyld, and in her hand did hold
An holy water Sprinckle,[8] dipt in deowe,° water (dew)
With which she sprinckled favours manifold,
On whom she list,° and did great liking sheowe, pleased
Great liking unto many, but true love to feowe.° few

14

And after them Dissemblance, and Suspect[9]
Marcht in one rancke, yet an unequall paire:
For she was gentle, and of milde aspect,
Courteous to all, and seeming debonaire,° gracious
Goodly adorned, and exceeding faire:
Yet was that all but painted, and purloynd,° stolen
And her bright browes were deckt with borrowed haire:
Her deedes were forged, and her words false coynd,
And alwaies in her hand two clewes° of silke she twynd. halls

---

[5] I.e., he trod with great precision and care ("nicely") as if thorns lay in his path or as if he perceived ("did avyse") the floor to give way ("shrinke"). His cane was a broken reed, which collapsed ("shrunke") when he leaned on it.

[6] Danger's face was terrifying, needing nothing external ("strange") to further deform his horrid ("griesly") appearance. His net and bloodstained ("rustie") knife indicate the kinds of perils he signifies.

[7] I.e., he was pale as ashes and fled as if his heels had wings.

[8] Aspergillum, a brush to sprinkle holy water.

[9] Dissimulation and Suspicion.

15

But he was foule, ill favoured, and grim,
Under his eyebrowes looking still askaunce;° sideways
And ever as Dissemblance laught on him,
He lowrd° on her with daungerous° eyeglaunce; scowled / threatening
Shewing his nature in his countenance;
His rolling eyes did never rest in place,
But walkt° each where, for feare of hid mischaunce, moved
Holding a lattice° still before his face, screen
Through which he still did peepe, as forward he did pace.

16

Next him went Griefe, and Fury matcht yfere;° together
Griefe all in sable sorrowfully clad,
Downe hanging his dull head, with heavy chere,° countenance
Yet inly being more, then° seeming sad: than
A paire of Pincers in his hand he had,
With which he pinched people to the hart,
That from thenceforth a wretched life they lad,° led
In wilfull languor° and consuming smart,° pining / pain
Dying each day with inward wounds of dolours dart.° griefs arrow

17

But Fury was full ill appareiled
In rags, that naked nigh° she did appeare, nearly
With ghastly lookes and dreadfull drerihed;° wretchedness
For from her backe her garments she did teare,
And from her head oft rent her snarled heare:
In her right hand a firebrand she did tosse° hrandish
About her head, still roming here and there;
As a dismayed° Deare in chace embost,° panic-stricken / hard-pressed
Forgetfull of his safety, hath his right way lost.

18

After them went Displeasure and Pleasance,
He looking lompish° and full sullein sad,° dejected / morose
And hanging downe his heavy countenance;
She chearefull fresh and full of joyance glad,
As if no sorrow she ne felt ne drad;° feared
That evill matched paire they seemd to bee:
An angry Waspe th' one in a viall had,
Th' other in hers an hony-lady Bee;[1]
Thus marched these sixe couples forth in faire degree.° order

19

After all these there marcht a most faire Dame,
Led of two grysie° villeins, th' one Despight, grim
The other cleped° Cruelty by name:[2] called
She dolefull Lady, like a dreary Spright,° spirit
Cald by strong charmes out of eternall night,
Had deathes owne image figurd in her face,
Full of sad signes, fearefull to living sight;

[1] Honey bee or honey-laden bee.

[2] Typical attributes of the lady in the world of courtly love and love sonnets: her "cruelty" causes her to reject her lover with scorn ("despight").

Yet in that horror shewd a seemely grace,
And with her feeble feet did move a comely pace.

20

Her brest all naked, as net° ivory, — pure
Without adorne° of gold or silver bright, — adornment
Wherewith the Craftesman wonts it beautify,[3]
Of her dew honour was despoyled quight,
And a wide wound therein (O ruefull sight)
Entrenched deepe with knife accursed keene,
Yet freshly bleeding forth her fainting spright,
(The worke of cruell hand) was to be seene,
That dyde in sanguine° red her skin all snowy cleene — bloody

21

At that wide orifice her trembling hart
Was drawne forth, and in silver basin layd,
Quite through transfixed with a deadly dart,
And in her bloud yet steeming fresh embayd:° — steeped
And those two villeins, which her steps upstayd,
When her weake feete could scarcely her sustaine,
And fading vitall powers gan to fade,
Her forward still with torture did constraine,
And evermore encreased her consuming paine.

22

Next after her the winged God himselfe° — Cupid
Came riding on a Lion ravenous,
Taught to obay the menage° of that Elfe, — horsemanship
That man and beast with powre imperious
Subdeweth to his kingdome tyrannous:
His blindfold eyes he bad° a while unbind, — bade
That his proud spoyle of that same dolorous
Faire Dame he might behold in perfect kind;° — clearly
Which seene, he much rejoyced in his cruell mind

Of which full proud, himselfe up rearing hye,
He looked round about with sterne disdaine;
And did survay his goodly company:
And marshalling the evill ordered traine,
With that the darts which his right hand did straine,° — clasp
Full dreadfully he shooke that all did quake,
And clapt on hie his coulourd winges twaine,
That all his many° it affraide did make: — company
Tho blinding° him againe, his way he forth did take. — then blindfolding

24

Behinde him was Reproch, Repentance, Shame;
Reproch the first, Shame next, Repent behind:
Repentance feeble, sorrowfull, and lame:
Reproch despightfull, carelesse, and unkind;[4]
Shame most ill favourd, bestiall, and blind:

---

[3] I.e., without the jewels that usually beautify her breast.

[4] I.e., full of scorn, careless of where his attacks fall, unnatural.

Shame lowrd,° Repentance sigh'd, Reproch did scould; scowled
Reproch sharpe stings, Repentance whips entwind,
Shame burning brond-yrons° in her hand did hold: branding irons
All three to each unlike, yet all made in one mould.

And after them a rude confused rout
Of persons flockt, whose names is hard to read:° interpret
Emongst them was sterne Strife, and Anger stout,° fierce
Unquiet Care, and fond° Unthriftihead, foolish
Lewd° Losse of Time, and Sorrow seeming dead, base
Inconstant Chaunge, and false Disloyaltie,
Consuming Riotise,° and guilty Dread debauchery
Of heavenly vengeance, faint Infirmitie,
Vile Povertie, and lastly Death with infamie.

26

There were full many moe° like maladies, more
Whose names and natures I note readen well;° I cannot well interpret
So many moe, as there be phantasies
In wavering wemens wit, that none can tell,° count
Or paines in love, or punishments in hell;
All which disguized marcht in masking wise,
About the chamber with that Damozell,
And then returned, having marched thrise,
Into the inner roome, from whence they first did rise.

So soone as they were in, the dore streight way
Fast locked, driven with that stormy blast,
Which first it opened; and bore all away.
Then the brave Maid, which all this while was plast° placed
In secret shade, and saw both first and last,
Issewed° forth, and went unto the dore, came
To enter in, but found it locked fast:
It vaine she thought with rigorous uprore° violent force
For to efforce, when charmes had closed it afore.

28

Where force might not availe, there sleights and art
She cast° to use, both fit for hard emprize;° resolved / enterprise
For thy° from that same roome not to depart therefore
Till morrow next, she did her selfe avize,° counsel
When that same Maske againe should forth arize
The morrow next appeard with joyous cheare,
Calling men to their daily exercize,
Then she, as morrow fresh, her selfe did reare
Out of her secret stand,° that day for to out weare. standing place

29

All that day she outwore in wandering,
And gazing on that Chambers ornament,
Till that againe the second evening
Her covered with her sable vestiment,
Wherewith the worlds faire beautie she hath blent:° obscured

Then when the second watch[5] was almost past,
That brasen dore flew open, and in went
Bold Britomart, as she had late forecast,° planned
Neither of idle shewes, nor of false charmes aghast.° terrified

30

So soone as she was entred, round about
She cast her eies, to see what was become
Of all those persons, which she saw without:
But lo, they streight° were vanisht all and some, immediately
Ne living wight she saw in all that roome,
Save that same woefull Ladie, both whose hands
Were bounden fast, that did her ill become,
And her small wast girt round with yron bands,
Unto a brasen pillour, by the which she stands.

31

And her before the vile Enchaunter sate,
Figuring straunge characters of his art,
With living bloud he those characters wrate,° wrote
Dreadfully dropping from her dying hart,
Seeming transfixed with a cruell dart,
And all perforce° to make her him to love. by force
Ah who can love the worker of her smart?
A thousand charmes he formerly did prove;° try
Yet thousand charmes could not her stedfast heart remove

32

Soone as that virgin knight he saw in place,
His wicked bookes in hast he overthrew,
Not caring his long labours to deface,[6]
And fiercely ronning to that Lady trew,
A murdrous knife out of his pocket drew,
The which he thought, for villeinous despight,° cruelty
In her tormented bodie to embrew:° plunge
But the stout° Damzell to him leaping light, fierce
His cursed hand withheld, and maistered his might.

33

From her, to whom his fury first he ment,° directed
The wicked weapon rashly° he did wrest,° suddenly / turned
And turning to her selfe his fell intent,
Unwares° it stroke into her snowie chest, without warning
That little drops empurpled her faire brest.
Exceeding wroth therewith the virgin grew,
Albe° the wound were nothing deepe imprest, although
And fiercely forth her mortall blade she drew,
To give him the reward for such vile outrage dew.

34

So mightily she smote him, that to ground
He fell halfe dead; next stroke him should have slaine,
Had not the Lady, which by him stood bound,

---

[5] From 9 P.M. to midnight.

[6] I.e., he did not care if he ruined the spells he had labored over.

Dernely° unto her called to abstaine, dismally
From doing him to dy. For else her paine
Should be remedilesse, sith° none but hee, since
Which wrought it, could the same recure° againe. heal
Therewith she stayd her hand, loth stayd to bee;
For life she him envyde,° and long'd revenge to see. begrudged

35

And to him said, "Thou wicked man, whose meed° reward
For so huge mischiefe, and vile villany
Is death, or if that ought° do death exceed, aught, anything
Be sure, that nought may save thee from to dy,
But if that thou this Dame doe presently
Restore unto her health, and former state;[7]
This doe and live, else die undoubtedly."
He glad of life, that lookt for death but late,° just recently
Did yield himselfe right willing to prolong his date.° term of life

36

And rising up, gan streight to overlooke° look over
Those cursed leaves, his charmes backe to reverse;
Full dreadfull things out of that balefull booke
He red, and measured many a sad verse,[8]
That horror gan the virgins hart to perse,° pierce
And her faire locks up stared° stiffe on end, stood
Hearing him those same bloudy lines reherse;° say over again
And all the while he red, she did extend
Her sword high over him if ought he did offend.

37

Anon she gan perceive the house to quake,
And all the dores to rattel round about;
Yet all that did not her dismaied make,
Nor slacke her threatfull hand for daungers dout,[9]
But still with stedfast eye and courage stout
Abode,° to weet° what end would come of all. waited / learn
At last that mightie chaine, which round about
Her tender waste was wound, adowne gan fall,
And that great brasen pillour broke in peeces small.

38

The cruell Steele, which thrild° her dying hart, pierced
Fell softly forth, as of his owne accord,
And the wyde wound, which lately did dispart° divide
Her bleeding brest, and riven bowels gor'd,
Was closed up, as it had not bene bor'd,
And every part to safety full sound,
As she were never hurt, was soone° restor'd: immediately
Tho° when she felt her selfe to be unbound, then
And perfect hole, prostrate she fell unto the ground.

---

[7] I.e., you deserve death or, if possible, something worse than death, and nothing will save you from death ("to dy") unless ("But if") you immediately ("presently") restore this lady.

[8] I.e., he pronounced in proper meter many distressing verses (incantations).

[9] I.e., nor relax her threatening hand for fear of danger.

39

Before Faire Britomart, she fell prostrate,
Saying, "Ah noble knight, what worthy meed° reward
Can wretched Lady, quit from wofull state,
Yield you in liew of° this your gratious deed? in return for
Your vertue selfe her owne reward shall breed,
Even immortall praise, and glory wyde,
Which I your vassall, by your prowesse freed,
Shall through the world make to be notifyde,
And goodly well advance, that goodly well was tryde."[1]

40

But Britomart uprearing her from ground,
Said, "Gentle Dame, reward enough I weene° think
For many labours more, then° I have found, than
This, that in safety now I have you seene,
And meane° of your deliverance have beene: means
Henceforth faire Lady comfort to you take,
And put away remembrance of late teene;° pain
In stead thereof know, that your loving Make,° mate
Hath no lesse griefe endured for your gentle sake."

41

She much was cheard to heare him mentiond,
Whom of all living wights she loved best.
Then laid the noble Championesse strong hond
Upon th' enchaunter, which had her distrest
So sore, and with foule outrages opprest:
With that great chaine, wherewith not long ygo
He bound that pitteous Lady prisoner, now relest,° released.
Himselfe she bound, more worthy to be so,
And captive with her led to wretchednesse and wo.

42

Returning backe, those goodly roomes, which erst° before
She saw so rich and royally arayd,
Now vanisht utterly, and cleane subverst° overturned
She found, and all their glory quite decayd,° destroyed
That sight of such a chaunge her much dismayd
Thence forth descending to that perlous° Porch, perilous
Those dreadfull flames she also found delayd,° allayed
And quenched quite, like a consumed torch,
That erst all entrers wont so cruelly to scorch.

43

More easie issew now, then entrance late
She found: for now that fained° dreadfull flame, imagined
Which chokt the porch of that enchaunted gate,
And passage bard to all, that thither came,
Was vanisht quite, as it were not the same,
And gave her leave at pleasure forth to passe.

---

[1] I.e., as your vassal I will make known ("notifyed") throughout the world and extol ("advaunce") your virtue, which was so fully tested ("tryde").

Th' Enchaunter selfe, which all that fraud did frame,
To have efforst° the love of that faire lasse, enforced
Seeing his worke now wasted deepe engrieved was.

44

But when the victoresse arrived there,
Where late she left the pensife° Scudamore, sad; anxious
With her owne trusty Squire,[2] both full of feare,
Neither of them she found where she them lore:° left
Thereat her noble hart was stonisht sore;
But most faire Amoret, whose gentle spright
Now gan to feede on hope, which she before
Conceived had, to see her owne deare knight,
Being thereof beguyld was fild with new affright.

45

But he sad° man, when he had long in drede sorrowful
Awayted there for Britomarts returne,
Yet saw her not nor signe of her good speed,° success
His expectation to despaire did turne,
Misdeeming[3] sure that her those flames did burne;
And therefore gan advize° with her old Squire, consult
Who her deare nourslings losse no lesse did mourne,
Thence to depart for further aide t' enquire:
Where let them wend at will, whilest here I doe respire.[4]

1590, 1596

Amoretti and Epithalamion

In the early 1590s the widowed Spenser wooed and won Elizabeth Boyle, whom he married in Ireland in 1594. The next year he published a small volume that included the sonnet sequence Amoretti ("little loves" or "little cupids") and the Epithalamion. Several of the sonnets explicitly address an "Elizabeth," and the volume's subtitle, "Written not long since," suggests that these poems, taken together, are a portrait of Spenser's recent courtship and marriage. It was unusual to write sonnets about a happy and successful love; traditionally, the sonneteer's love was for someone painfully inaccessible. Spenser rehearses some of the conventional motifs of frustration and longing, but his cycle of polished, eloquent poems leads toward joyous possession. Thus, for example, in sonnet 67 ("Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace"), he transforms a Petrarchan lament into a vision of unexpected fulfillment.

Spenser's great celebration of this fulfillment is the Epithalamion. A learned poet, he was acutely conscious that he was writing within a tradition: an epithalamion is a wedding song whose Greek name conveys that it was sung on the threshold of the bridal chamber. The genre, which goes back at least as far as Sappho (ca. 612 B.C.E.), was widely practiced by the Roman poets, particularly Catullus, and imitated in the Renaissance. Its elements typically include an invocation of the Muses, followed by a celebratory description of the procession of the bride, the religious rites, the singing and dancing at the wedding party, the preparations for the wedding night, and the sexual consummation of the marriage.

[3] Mistakenly thinking.

[4] Take a breath, rest from my labors. In the 1590 edition, Book 3, and the poem, ended with the happy reunion of Scudamour and Amoret in a passionate embrace:

Lightly he clipt her twixt his armes twaine,
And streightly did embrace her body bright,
Her body, late the prison of sad paine,
Now the sweet lodge of love and deare delight:
But she faire Lady overcommen quight
Of huge affection, did in pleasure melt,
And in sweete ravishment pourd out her spright:
No word they spake, nor earthly thing they felt,
But like two senceles stocks in long embracement dwelt.

But in the 1596 edition Spenser made a bridge to his three added books by replacing the earlier ending with stanzas 43—45, as given here.

In long, flowing stanzas, Spenser follows these conventions closely, adapting them with exquisite delicacy to his small-town Irish setting and native folklore. But his first stanza announces a major innovation: "So I unto myselfe alone will sing." Traditionally, the poet of an epithalamion was an admiring observer, a kind of master of ceremonies; by combining the roles of poet and bridegroom, Spenser transforms a genial social performance into a passionate lyric utterance. Equally remarkable innovations are the complex stanza form, for which no direct model has been discovered, and the still more complex overall structure. That structure is a triumph of symbolic patterning; the more scholars have studied it, the more elaborate the order they seem to have uncovered. This subtle and rich poetic structure conjures up not only a single day of celebration but also, beyond this particular event, an orderly, harmonious universe, with a hidden pattern of coherence and regularity. If the Epithalamion goes to remarkable lengths to affirm this pattern, it is perhaps because it also registers so insistently all that threatens the enduring happiness of wedded love and indeed of human life itself. The greatest threat is the force over which the poem exercises its greatest power: time.

From Amoretti

Sonnet 1

Happy ye leaves[1] when as those lilly hands,
Which hold my life in their dead doing° might, killing
Shall handle you and hold in loves soft bands,° bonds
Lyke captives trembling at the victors sight.
And happy lines, on which with starry light,
Those lamping° eyes will deigne sometimes to look flashing
And reade the sorrowes of my dying spright,° spirit
Written with teares in harts close° bleeding book. secret
And happy rymes bath'd in the sacred brooke
Of Helicon[2] whence she derived is,
When ye behold that Angels blessed looke,
My soules long lacked foode, my heavens blis.
Leaves, lines, and rymes, seeke her to please alone,
Whom if ye please, I care for other none.

Sonnet 34[3]

Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde,
By conduct of some star doth make her way,
Whenas a storme hath dimd her trusty guyde,
Out of her course doth wander far astray:
So I whose star, that wont° with her bright ray was accustomed

[2] The "sacred brooke" is Hippocrene, which flows from Mount Helicon, the mountain sacred to the Muses.

[3] An adaptation of Petrarch's Rima 189 (translated by Sir Thomas Wyatt, p. 597, where a modern prose translation can also be found).

Me to direct, with cloudes is overcast,
Doe wander now in darknesse and dismay,
Through hidden perils round about me plast.° placed
Yet hope I well, that when this storme is past
My Helice[4] the lodestar° of my lyfe guiding star
Will shine again, and looke on me at last,
With lovely light to cleare my cloudy grief.
Till then I wander carefull° comfortlesse, full of cares
In secret sorow and sad pensivenesse.

Sonnet 37

What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses,
She doth attyre under a net of gold:
And with sly° skill so cunningly them dresses, clever
That which is gold or heare,° may scarse be told? hair
Is it that mens frayle eyes, which gaze too bold,
She may entangle in that golden snare:
And being caught may craftily enfold
Theyr weaker harts, which are not wel aware?
Take heed therefore, myne eyes, how ye doe stare
Henceforth too rashly on that guilefull net,
In which if ever ye entrapped are,
Out of her bands ye by no means shall get.
Fondnesse° it were for any being free, foolishness
To covet fetters, though they golden bee.

Sonnet 54

Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay,
My love like the Spectator ydly sits
Beholding me that all the pageants° play, dramatic scenes
Disguysing diversly my troubled wits.
Sometimes I joy when glad occasion fits,
And mask in myrth lyke to a Comedy:
Soone after when my joy to sorrow flits,
I waile and make my woes a Tragedy.
Yet she beholding me with constant° eye, unmoved
Delights not in my merth nor rues my smart:° pities my hurt
But when I laugh she mocks, and when I cry
She laughes and hardens evermore her hart.
What then can move her? if nor merth nor mone,° moan
She is no woman, but a sencelesse stone.

Sonnet 64[5]

Comming to kisse her lyps (such grace I found)
Me seemd I smelt a gardin of sweet flowres
That dainty odours from them threw around,

For damzels fit to decke their lovers bowres.
Her lips did smell lyke unto Gillyflowers,° carnations
Her ruddy cheeks lyke unto Roses red;
Her snowy browes lyke budded Bellamoures,[6]
Her lovely eyes like Pincks but newly spred,
Her goodly bosome lyke a Strawberry bed,
Her neck lyke to a bounch of Cullambynes;
Her brest lyke lillyes, ere theyr leaves be shed,
Her nipples lyke yong blossomd Jessemynes.° jasmines
Such fragrant flowres doe give most odorous smell,
But her sweet odour did them all excell.

Sonnet 65

The doubt which ye misdeeme,° fayre love, is vaine, misconceive
That fondly° feare to loose your liberty, foolishly
When loosing one, two liberties ye gayne,
And make him bond° that bondage earst° dyd fly. hound./formerly
Sweet be the bands, the which true love doth tye,
Without constraynt or dread of any ill:
The gentle birde feels no captivity
Within her cage, but singes and feeds her fill.
There pride dare not approch, nor discord spill° destroy
The league twixt them, that loyal love hath bound;
But simple truth and mutuall good will
Seekes with Sweet peace to salve each others wound.
There fayth° doth fearlesse dwell in brasen towre, fidelity
And spotlesse pleasure builds her sacred bowre.

Sonnet 67[1]

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace,
Seeing the game from him escapt away,
Sits downe to rest him in some shady place,
With panting hounds beguiled° of their pray: deluded
So after long pursuit and vaine assay,° attempt
When I all weary had the chace forsooke,
The gentle deare returnd the selfe-same way,
Thinking to quench her thirst at the next° brooke nearby
There she beholding me with mylder looke,
Sought not to fly, but fearelesse still did bide:
Till I in hand her yet halfe trembling tooke,
And with her owne goodwill hir fyrmely tyde.
Strange thing me seemd to see a beast so wyld,
So goodly wonne with her owne will beguyld.

Sonnet 68

Most glorious Lord of lyfe, that on this day,° i.e., Easter
Didst make thy triumph over death and sin:

---

[6] Unidentified flower, evidently white.

[7] An imitation of Petrarch's Rima 190, but with a very different ending. Cf. Sir Thomas Wyatt's adaptation ("Whoso list to hunt") of the same sonnet, and the prose translation of the Petrarchan original appended to it: p. 595.

And having harrowd hell,[8] didst bring away
Captivity thence captive us to win:
This joyous day, deare Lord, with joy begin,
And grant that we for whom thou diddest dye
Being with thy deare blood clene washt from sin,
May live for ever in felicity.
And that thy love we weighing worthily,
May likewise love thee for the same againe:
And for thy sake that all lyke deare didst buy,[9]
With love may one another entertayne.° sustain
So let us love, deare love, lyke as we ought,
Love is the lesson which the Lord us taught.[1]

Sonnet 74

Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade,° practice
With which that happy name° was first desynd: i.e., Elizabeth
The which three times thrise happy hath me made,
With guifts of body, fortune and of mind.
The first my being to me gave by kind,° nature
From mothers womb deriv'd by dew descent,
The second is my sovereigne Queene most kind,
That honour and large richesse to me lent.° bestowed
The third my love, my lives last ornament,
By whom my spirit out of dust was raysed:
To speake her prayse and glory excellent,
Of all alive most worthy to be praysed.
Ye three Elizabeths for ever live,
That three such graces did unto me give.

Sonnet 75[2]

One day I wrote her name upon the strand,° shore
But came the waves and washed it away:
Agayne I wrote it with a second hand,
But came the tyde, and made my paynes his pray.° prey
"Vayne man," sayd she, "that doest in vaine assay,° attempt
A mortall thing so to immortalize,
For I my selve shall lyke to this decay,
And eek° my name bee wyped out lykewize." also
"Not so," quod° I, "let baser things devize° quoth / contrive
To dy in dust, but you shall live by fame:
My verse your vertues rare shall eternize,
And in the heavens wryte your glorious name.
Where whenas death shall all the world subdew,
Our love shall live, and later life renew."

---

[8] In the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, Christ descended into hell and led out into Paradise the righteous who had lived before his time. "Captivity thence captive" (line 4) is a biblical phrase, as in Judges 5.12 and Ephesians 4.8.

[9] I.e., Christ bought all people at the same great cost.

[1] Cf. John 15.12: "This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you."

Sonnet 79

Men call you fayre, and you doe credit° it, believe
For that your selfe ye dayly such doe see:
But the trew fayre,° that is the gentle wit,° beauty / intelligence
And vertuous mind, is much more praysd of me.
For all the rest, how ever fayre it be,
Shall turne to nought and loose that glorious hew:° form
But onely that is permanent and free
From frayle corruption, that doth flesh ensew.° outlast
That is true beautie: that doth argue° you prove
To be divine and borne of heavenly seed:
Deriv'd from that fayre Spirit,° from whom al true i.e., God
And perfect beauty did at first proceed.
He onely fayre, and what he fayre hath made:
All other fayre, lyke flowres, untymely fade.

Epithalamion

Ye learned sisters which have oftentimes
Beene to me ayding, others to adorne:[1]
Whom ye thought worthy of your gracefull rymes,
That even the greatest did not greatly scorne
To heare theyr names sung in your simple layes,° songs
But joyed in theyr prayse.
And when ye list° your owne mishaps to mourne, chose
Which death, or love, or fortunes wreck did rayse,
Your string could soone to sadder tenor° turne, mood
And teach the woods and waters to lament
Your dolefull dreriment.° sorrow
Now lay those sorrowfull complaints aside,
And having all your heads with girland crownd,
Helpe me mine owne loves prayses to resound,
Ne° let the same of° any be envide: nor / by
So Orpheus did for his owne bride,[2]
So I unto my selfe alone will sing,
The woods shall to me answer and my Eccho ring.

Early before the worlds light giving lampe,
His golden beame upon the hils doth spred,
Having disperst the nights unchearefull dampe,
Doe ye awake, and with fresh lustyhed°
Go to the bowre° of my beloved love, bedchamber
My truest turtle dove,

---

[1] To write poems in praise of others. The "learned sisters" are the Muses.

[2] Orpheus, archetype of the poet in classical antiquity, was famous for his love for his wife, Eurydice.

Bid her awake; for Hymen[3] is awake,
And long since ready forth his maske to move,
With his bright Tead[4] that flames with many a flake,°   spark
And many a bachelor to waite on him,
In theyr fresh garments trim.
Bid her awake therefore and soone her dight,°   dress
For lo the wished day is come at last,
That shall for al the paynes and sorrowes past,
Pay to her usury° of long delight: interest
And whylest she doth her dight,
Doe ye to her of joy and solace° sing,   pleasure
That all the woods may answer and your Eccho ring.

Bring with you all the Nymphes that you can heare°   can hear you
Both of the rivers and the forrests greene:
And of the sea that neighbours to her neare,
Al with gay girlands goodly wel beseene.°   beautified
And let them also with them bring in hand,
Another gay girland
For my fayre love of lillyes and of roses,
Bound truelove wize° with a blew silke riband.   i.e., in a love knot
And let them make great store of bridale poses,°   posies
And let them eeke° bring store° of other flowers   also / abundance
To deck the bridale bowers.
And let the ground whereas° her foot shall tread,   where
For feare the stones her tender foot should wrong
Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
And diapred lyke the discolored mead.[5]
Which done, doe at her chamber dore awayt,
For she will waken strayt,°   straightway
The whiles doe ye this song unto her sing,
The woods shall to you answer and your Eccho ring.

Ye Nymphes of Mulla[6] which with careful heed,
The silver scaly trouts doe tend full well,
And greedy pikes which use° therein to feed,   are accustomed
(Those trouts and pikes all others doo excell)
And ye likewise, which keepe the rushy lake,
Where none doo fishes take,
Bynd up the locks the which hang scatterd light,
And in his waters which your mirror make,
Behold your faces as the christall bright,
That when you come whereas° my love doth lie,   where
No blemish she may spie.
And eke ye lightfoot mayds which keepe the deere,
That on the hoary mountayne use to towre,[7]
And the wylde wolves which seeke them to devoure,
With your Steele darts° doo chace from comming neer,   spears

[3] The god of marriage, who leads a "maske" or procession at weddings.
[4] A ceremonial torch, associated with marriages since classical times.
[5] Ornamented like the many-colored meadow.
[6] A river near Spenser's home in Ireland.
[7] A falconry term meaning to occupy heights. "The deere": all wild animals, kept by the woodland nymphs.

Be also present heere,
To helpe to decke her and to help to sing,
That all the woods may answer and your Eccho ring.

Wake now my love, awake; for it is time,
The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones bed,[8]
All ready to her silver coche° to clyme, coach
And Phoebus° gins to shew his glorious hed. the sun god
Hark how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies
And carroll of loves praise.
The merry Larke hir mattins° sings aloft, morning prayers
The thrush replyes, the Mavis descant playes,
The Ouzell shrills, the Ruddock warbles soft,[9]
So goodly all agree with sweet consent,
To this dayes merriment.
Ah my deere love why doe ye sleepe thus long,
When meeter° were that ye should now awake, more fitting
T' awayt the comming of your joyous make,° mate
And hearken to the birds lovelearned song,
The deawy leaves among.
For they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr Eccho ring.

My love is now awake out of her dreame,
And her fayre eyes like stars that dimmed were
With darksome cloud, now shew° theyr goodly beams show
More bright then° Hesperus° his head doth rere. than / evening star
Come now ye damzels, daughters of delight,
Helpe quickly her to dight,° attire
But first come ye fayre houres which were begot
In Joves sweet paradice, of Day and Night,
Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
And al that ever in this world is fayre
Doe make and still° repayre. continuously
And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene,[1]
The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride:
And as ye her array, still throw betweene° at intervals
Some graces to be seene,
And as ye use° to Venus, to her sing, are accustomed
The whiles the woods shal answer and your Eccho ring.

Now is my love all ready forth to come,
Let all the virgins therefore well awayt,
And ye fresh boyes that tend upon her groome
Prepare your selves; for he is comming strayt.° straightway
Set all your things in seemely good aray° order

[8] See Song of Solomon 2.10—13: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come." In classical myth, Tithonus is the aged husband of Aurora, the dawn.

[9] The "Mavis" is the song thrush; the "Ouzell," the blackbird (which sings in England); and the "Ruddock," the European robin. The birds' concert is a convention of medieval love poetry. "Descant": a melody or counterpoint written above a musical theme—a soprano obbligato.

[1] The Graces attending on Venus ("Cyprian Queene"), representing brightness, joy, and bloom.

Fit for so joyfull day,
The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see.
Faire Sun, shew forth thy favourable ray,
And let thy lifull° heat not fervent° be life-giving / hot
For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
Her beauty to disgrace.
O fayrest Phoebus, father of the Muse,[2]
If ever I did honour thee aright,
Or sing the thing, that mote° thy mind delight, might
Doe not thy servants simple boone° refuse, request
But let this day let this one day be myne,
Let all the rest be thine.
Then I thy soverayne prayses loud wil sing,
That all the woods shal answer and theyr Eccho ring.

Harke how the Minstrels gin° to shrill aloud begin
Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
The pipe, the tabor,° and the trembling Croud,[3] small drum
That well agree withouten breach or jar.° discord
But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
When they their tymbrels° smyte, tambourines
And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
That all the sences they doe ravish quite,
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,
Crying aloud with strong confused noyce,
As if it were one voyce.
Hymen id Hymen, Hymen[4] they do shout,
That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill,
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance doe thereto applaud
And loud advaunce her laud,° praise
And evermore they Hymen Hymen sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr Eccho ring.

Loe where she comes along with portly° pace stately
Lyke Phoebe from her chamber of the East,
Arysing forth to run her mighty race,[5]
Clad all in white, that seemes° a virgin best. beseems, suits
So well it her beseems that ye would weene° think
Some angell she had beene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
Sprinckled with perle, and perling° flowres a tweene, winding
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre,
And being crowned with a girland greene,
Seeme lyke some mayden Queene.
Her modest eyes abashed to behold
So many gazers, as on her do stare,

[2] Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun, was also god of music and poetry, but he was not normally regarded as the father of the Nine Muses (Zeus was).

[3] Primitive fiddle. Spenser here designates Irish, not classical, instruments and music for the classical masque or ballet.

[4] The name of the god of marriage, used as a conventional exclamation at weddings.

[5] Phoebe is the moon, a virgin like the bride; the reference to her anticipates the night.

Upon the lowly ground affixed are.
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
Nathlesse doe ye still loud her prayses sing.
That all the woods may answer and your Eccho ring.

Tell me ye merchants daughters did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before,
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store,
Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead yvory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,° made red
Her lips lyke cherryes charming men to byte,
Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded,° uncurdled
Her paps lyke lyllies budded,
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre,
And all her body like a pallace fayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre.[6]
Why stand ye still ye virgins in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,
Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer and your Eccho ring.

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively spright,° living spirit, soul
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red° saw
Medusaes mazeful hed.[7]
There dwels sweet love and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth° and comely womanhood, fidelity
Regard of honour and mild modesty,
There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth lawes alone.
The which the base° affections doe obay, lower
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may
Thereto approch to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial threasures,
And unrevealed pleasures,
Then would ye wonder and her prayses sing,
That all the woods should answer and your Eccho ring.

Open the temple gates unto my love,
Open them wide that she may enter in,[8]

---

[6] The head, where the higher faculties are. The catalog of qualities is a convention in love poetry (cf. Song of Solomon 4—8).

[7] Medusa, one of the Gorgons, had serpents instead of hair (hence a "mazeful hed"): the effect on beholders was to turn them to stone.

[8] Cf. Psalm 24.7: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in."

And all the postes adorne as doth behove,[9]
And all the pillours deck with girlands trim,
For to recyve this Saynt with honour dew,
That commeth in to you.
With trembling steps and humble reverence,
She commeth in, before th' almighties vew,
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
When so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces:
Bring her up to th' high altar, that she may
The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endless matrimony make,
And let the roring Organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes,
The whiles with hollow throates
The Choristers the joyous Antheme sing,
That all the woods may answere and theyr Eccho ring.

Behold whiles she before the altar stands
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes
And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow with goodly vermill° stayne, vermilion
Like crimsin dyde in grayne,° fast color
That even th' Angels which continually,
About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
Forget their service and about her fly,
Ofte peeping in her face that seemes more fayre,
The more they on it stare.
But her sad° eyes still° fastened on the ground, serious / ever
Are governed with goodly modesty,
That suffers° not one looke to glaunce awry, permits
Which may let in a little thought unsownd.
Why blush ye love to give to me your hand,
The pledge of all our band?° bond, tie
Sing ye sweet Angels, Alleluya sing,
That all the woods may answere and your Eccho ring.

Now al is done; bring home the bride againe,
Bring home the triumph of our victory,
Bring home with you the glory of her gaine,[1]
With joyance bring her and with jollity.
Never had man more joyfull day then this,
Whom heaven would heape with blis.
Make feast therefore now all this live long day,
This day for ever to me holy is,
Poure out the wine without restraint or stay,
Poure not by cups, but by the belly° full, wine-skin
Poure out to all that wull,° want it
And sprinkle all the postes and wals with wine,

---

[9] As is proper. The doorposts were trimmed for weddings in classical times, and the custom was often referred to in classical and later love poetry,

[1] I.e., the glory of gaining her.

That they may sweat, and drunken be withall.
Crowne ye God Bacchus° with a coronall,° god of wine / garland
And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine,
And let the Graces daunce unto the rest;
For they can doo it best:
The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
To which the woods shall answer and theyr Eccho ring.

Ring ye the bels, ye young men of the towne,
And leave your wonted° labors for this day: usual
This day is holy; doe ye write it downe,
That ye for ever it remember may.
This day the sunne is in his chiefest hight,
With Barnaby the bright,[2]
From whence declining daily by degrees,
He somewhat loseth of his heat and light,
When once the Crab[3] behind his back he sees.
But for this time it ill ordained was,
To chose the longest day in all the yeare,
And shortest night, when longest fitter weare:
Yet never day so long, but late° would passe. at last
Ring ye the bels, to make it weare away,
And bonefiers° make all day, bonfires
And daunce about them, and about them sing:
That all the woods may answer, and your Eccho ring.

Ah when will this long weary day have end,
And lende me leave to come unto my love?
How slowly do the houres theyr numbers spend?
How slowly does sad Time his feathers move?
Hast° thee O fayrest Planet to thy home haste
Within the Westerne fome:
Thy tyred steedes long since have need of rest.[4]
Long though it be, at last I see it gloome,
And the bright evening star with golden creast° crest
Appeare out of the East.
Fayre childe of beauty, glorious lampe of love
That all the host of heaven in rankes doost lead,
And guydest lovers through the nightes dread,
How chearefully thou lookest from above,
And seemst to laugh atweene thy twinkling light
As joying in the sight
Of these glad many which for joy doe sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr Eccho ring.

Now ceasse ye damsels your delights forepast;
Enough is it, that all the day was youres:
Now day is doen, and night is nighing fast:
Now bring the Bryde into the brydall boures.

---

[2] St. Barnabas's Day, at the time of the summer solstice.

[3] The constellation Cancer between Gemini and Leo. The sun, passing through the zodiac, leaves the Crab behind toward the end of July.

[4] The sun's chariot completes its daily course in the western sea.

Now night is come, now soone her disaray,° undress
And in her bed her lay;
Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken courteins over her display,° spread
And odourd° sheetes, and Arras° coverlets. perfumed / tapestry
Behold how goodly my faire love does ly
In proud humility;
Like unto Maia,[5] when as Jove her tooke,
In Tempe,[6] lying on the flowry gras,
Twixt sleepe and wake, after she weary was,
With bathing in the Acidalian brooke.[7]
Now it is night, ye damsels may be gon,
And leave my love alone,
And leave likewise your former lay to sing:
The woods no more shall answere, nor your Eccho ring.

Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,
That long daies labour doest at last defray,° pay for
And all my cares, which cruell love collected,
Hast sumd in one, and cancelled for aye:° forever
Spread thy broad wing over my love and me,
That no man may us see,
And in thy sable mantle us enwrap,
From feare of perrill and foule horror free.
Let no false treason seeke us to entrap,
Nor any dread disquiet once annoy
The safety of our joy:
But let the night be calme and quietsome,
Without tempestuous storms or sad afray:° fear
Lyke as when Jove with fayre Alcmena[8] lay,
When he begot the great Tirynthian groome:
Or lyke as when he with thy selfe[9] did lie,
And begot Majesty.
And let the mayds and yongmen cease to sing:
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr Eccho ring.

Let no lamenting cryes, nor dolefull teares,
Be heard all night within nor yet without:
Ne let false whispers, breeding hidden feares,
Breake gentle sleepe with misconceived dout.° fear
Let no deluding dreames, nor dreadful sights
Make sudden sad affrights;
Ne let housefyres, nor lightnings helpelesse harmes,
Ne let the Pouke,[1] nor other evill sprights,
Ne let mischivous witches with theyr charmes,
Ne let hob Goblins, names whose sence we see not,
Fray° us with things that be not. terrify

[5] The eldest and most beautiful of the seven daughters of Atlas. (They were stellified as the Pleiades.) Jove fathered Mercury on her.

[6] The Vale of Tempe in Thessaly (not, however, traditionally the site of Jove's encounter with Maia)-

[7] The Acidalian brook is associated with Venus.

[8] The mother of Hercules ("the great Tirynthian groome"). Jove made that first night last as long as three.

[9] Night. This is Spenser's own myth,

[1] Puck, Robin Goodfellow—here more powerful and evil than Shakespeare made him in A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Let not the shriech Oule, nor the Storke be heard:
Nor the night Raven that still° deadly yels,[2] continuously
Nor damned ghosts cald up with mighty spels,
Nor griesly° vultures make us once affeard: horrid
Ne let th' unpleasant Quyre of Frogs still croking
Make us to wish theyr choking.
Let none of these theyr drery accents sing;
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr Eccho ring.

But let stil Silence trew night watches keepe,
That sacred peace may in assurance rayne,
And tymely Sleep, when it is tyme to sleepe,
May poure his limbs forth on your pleasant playne,
The whiles an hundred little winged loves,° cupids (or amoretti)
Like divers fethered doves,
Shall fly and flutter round about your bed,
And in the secret darke, that none reproves,
Their prety stealthes shal worke, and snares shal spread
To filch away sweet snatches of delight,
Conceald through covert night.
Ye sonnes of Venus, play your sports at will,
For greedy pleasure, carelesse of your toyes,° amorous dallying
Thinks more upon her paradise of joyes,
Then° what ye do, albe it° good or ill. than / albeit, although
All night therefore attend your merry play,
For it will soone be day:
Now none doth hinder you, that say or sing,
Ne will the woods now answer, nor your Eccho ring.

Who is the same, which at my window peepes?
Or whose is that faire face, that shines so bright,
Is it not Cinthia,[3] she that never sleepes,
But walkes about high heaven al the night?
O fayrest goddesse, do thou not envy
My love with me to spy:
For thou likewise didst love, though now unthought,° not thought of
And for a fleece of woll,° which privily, wool
The Latmian shephard[4] once unto thee brought,
His pleasures with thee wrought,
Therefore to us be favorable now;
And sith° of wemens labours thou hast charge,[5] since
And generation goodly dost enlarge,
Encline thy will t' effect our wishfull vow,
And the chast wombe informe° with timely seed, give life to
That may our comfort breed:
Till which we cease our hopefull hap° to sing, fortune we hope for
Ne let the woods us answer, nor our Eccho ring.

[2] The owl and the night raven were birds of ill omen; the stork, in Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls, is called an avenger of adultery.

[3] Cynthia (or Diana) is goddess of the moon.

[4] Endymion, beloved of the moon. The "fleece of woll," however, comes from another story—that of Pan's enticement of the moon.

[5] Diana is, as Lucina, patroness of births. The "labours" are, of course, those of childbirth.

And thou great Juno, which with awful° might awesome
The lawes of wedlock still dost patronize,
And the religion° of the faith first plight° sanctity / pledged
With sacred rites hast taught to solemnize:
And eeke° for comfort often called art also
Of women in their smart,° (labor) pains
Eternally bind thou this lovely band,° bond
And all thy blessings unto us impart.
And thou glad Genius,[6] in whose gentle hand,
The bridale bowre and geniall bed remaine,
Without blemish or staine,
And the sweet pleasures of theyr loves delight
With secret ayde doest succour° and supply, help
Till they bring forth the fruitfull progeny,
Send us the timely fruit of this same night.
And thou fayre Hebe,[7] and thou Hymen free,
Grant that it may so be.
Til which we cease your further prayse to sing,
Ne any woods shall answer, nor your Eccho ring.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
In which a thousand torches flaming bright
Doe burne, that to us wretched earthly clods,
In dreadful darknesse lend desired light;

And cease till then our tymely joyes to sing,

[6] God of generation and birth. In the next line, "geniall"—having both the usual sense and the sense of "generative"—puns on his name.

[7] Goddess of youth and freedom.

[8] The envoy (brief final stanza addressed to the poem itself) is traditionally apologetic in tone: the poem is offered as a substitute for presents ("ornaments") that did not arrive in time for the wedding. But this elaborate poem is itself a "goodly ornament," for it stands as a timeless monument of art to the passing day that it celebrates.

SIR WALTER RALEGH

1552-1618

The brilliant and versatile Sir Walter Ralegh was a soldier, courtier, philosopher, explorer and colonist, student of science, historian, and poet. Born to West Country gentry of modest means, Balegh amassed great wealth thanks to his position at court, leading him to be denounced by some as an upstart and hated by others as a rapacious monopolist. He fought ruthlessly in Ireland and Cadiz, directed the colonization of Virginia, introduced the potato to Ireland and tobacco to Europe, brought Spenser from Ireland to the English court, conducted scientific experiments, led expeditions to Guiana in an unsuccessful effort to find gold, and wrote several reports urging England to challenge Spanish dominance in the New World. He was known for his violent temper, his dramatic sense of life, his extravagant dress, his skepticism in religious matters, his bitter hatred of Spain, and his great favor with Queen Elizabeth, interrupted in 1592 when he seduced, and then married, one of her ladies-in-waiting. His long poem to the queen, The Ocean to Cynthia, remains in manuscript fragments, one of more than five hundred lines. His best-known shorter poems include the reply to Marlowe's "Passionate Shepherd" and "The Lie," an attack on social classes and institutions which itself provoked many replies. His active resistance to printing his poems—in one case he forced a printer to recall a volume and paste a slip of paper over his initials—makes it very difficult to put the copies that circulated in manuscript in any reliable chronological order.

King James suspected Ralegh of opposing his succession and threw him into the Tower of London in 1603 on trumped-up charges of treason; there he remained for the rest of his life save for an ill-fated last voyage to Guiana in 1617, which again failed to discover gold. In prison he wrote his long, unfinished History of the World, which begins with the Creation, emphasizes the providential punishment of evil princes, and projects a treatment of English history—although not of recent events because, he declared, he who follows truth too closely at the heels might get kicked in the teeth. The work was to have been dedicated to Henry, prince of Wales, Ralegh's most powerful friend and supporter, who declared, "Only my father would keep such a bird in a cage." But Henry died in 1612, and Balegh broke off his narrative at 168 B.C.E. Six years later James, bowing to Spanish pressure, had Ralegh executed on the old treason charge.*

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd[1]

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel° becometh dumb; the nightingale
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields;° renders an account

In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

'Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last and love still breed,
Had joys no date° nor age no need, ending
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

What is our life?

What is our life? a play of passion;
Our mirth the music of division;[1]
Our mothers' wombs the tiring-houses[2] be
Where we are dressed for this short comedy.
Heaven the judicious sharp spectator is,
That sits and marks still who doth act amiss;
Our graves that hide us from the searching sun
Are like drawn curtains when the play is done.
Thus march we, playing, to our latest rest,
Only we die in earnest—that's no jest.

[Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son][1]

Three things there be that prosper up apace
And flourish, whilst they grow asunder far,

And when they meet, they one another mar;
And they be these: the wood, the weed,° the wag. i.e., hemp

Farewell, false love

Farewell, false love, the oracle° of lies, i.e., authoritative source
A mortal foe and enemy to rest;
An envious boy, from whom all cares arise,
A bastard vile, a beast with rage possessed;
A way of error, a temple full of treason,
In all effects contrary unto reason.

A poisoned serpent covered all with flowers,
Mother of sighs and murtherer° of repose, murderer

As moisture lends to every grief that grows;
A school of guile, a net of deep deceit,
A gilded hook that holds a poisoned bait.

A fortress foiled° which reason did defend, overthrown
A siren song, a fever of the mind,
A maze wherein affection finds no end,
A raging cloud that runs before the wind,
A substance like the shadow of the sun,
A goal of grief for which the wisest run.

A quenchless fire, a nurse of trembling fear,
A path that leads to peril and mishap;
A true retreat of sorrow and despair,
An idle boy that sleeps in pleasure's lap,
A deep distrust of that which certain seems,
A hope of that which reason doubtful deems.

Sith° then thy trains° my younger years betrayed, since / tricks
And for my faith° ingratitude I find, faithfulness
And sith repentance hath my wrongs bewrayed° revealed
Whose course was ever contrary to kind°— nature
False love, desire, and beauty frail, adieu!
Dead is the root whence all these fancies grew.

Nature, that washed her hands in milk

Nature, that washed her hands in milk,
  And had forgot to dry them,
Instead of earth took snow and silk,
  At Love's request to try them,
If she a mistress could compose
To please Love's fancy out of those.

Her eyes he would should be of light,
  A violet breath, and lips of jelly;
Her hair not black, nor overbright,
  And of the softest down her belly;
As for her inside he'd have it
Only of wantonness° and wit. — playfulness

At Love's entreaty such a one
  Nature made, but with her beauty
She hath framed a heart of stone;
  So as Love, by ill destiny,
Must die for her whom Nature gave him,
Because her darling would not save him.

But Time (which Nature doth despise,
  And rudely gives her love the lie,
Makes Hope a fool, and Sorrow wise)
  His hands do neither wash nor dry;
But being made of steel and rust,
Turns snow and silk and milk to dust.

The light, the belly, lips, and breath,
  He dims, discolors, and destroys;
With those he feeds but fills not death,

Yea, Time doth dull each lively wit,
And dries all wantonness with it.

Oh, cruel Time! which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,

Even such is time, which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,

And from which earth, and grave, and dust
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.

From The discovery of the large, rich, and beautiful Empire of Guiana, with a relation of the great and golden city of Manoa (which the Spaniards call El Dorado)[1]

* * * When we were come to the tops of the first hills of the plains adjoining to the river, we beheld that wonderful breach of waters which ran down Caroni:[2] and might from that mountain see the river how it ran in three parts, above twenty miles off, and there appeared some ten or twelve overfalls in sight, every one as high over the other as a church tower, which fell with that fury, that the rebound of water made it seem as if it had been all covered over with a great shower of rain: and in some places we took it at the first for a smoke that had risen over some great town. For mine own part, I was well persuaded from thence to have returned, being a very ill footman,[3] but the rest were all so desirous to go near the said strange thunder of waters as they drew me on by little and little till we came into the next valley, where we might better discern the same. I never saw a more beautiful country nor more lively prospects, hills so raised here and there over the valleys, the river winding into divers branches, the plains adjoining without bush or stubble, all fair green grass, the ground of hard sand easy to march on either for horse or foot, the deer crossing in every path, the birds towards the evening singing on every tree with a thousand several[4] tunes, cranes and herons of white, crimson, and carnation perching in the river's side, the air fresh with a gentle easterly wind, and every stone that we stooped to take up promised either gold or silver by his complexion. * * *

[1] The final stanza of the preceding poem, recast as a farewell to life. The seventeenth-century story, which may be true, was that Ralegh inscribed the poem in his Bible the night before his execution.

[1] Ralegh had reports from several Spaniards of the unexplored Indian kingdom of Guiana ("Land of Waters"; now a part of Venezuela). Lying between the Orinoco and Amazon rivers, the kingdom supposedly included the city the Spaniards called El Dorado—The Golden City. Ralegh led an expedition to Guiana in 1595 and the following year published an account of it, which was reprinted in 1598—1600 in Richard Hakluyt's massive collection, The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffics, and Discoveries of the English Nation.

[2] The Caroni River is a tributary of the Orinoco. Intrigued by reports of its waterfalls and the country above them, Ralegh led a small group to explore the region.

[3] Poor walker.

* * * I will promise these things that follow, which I know to be true. Those that are desirous to discover and to see many nations may be satisfied within this river,[5] which bringeth forth so many arms and branches leading to several countries and provinces, above 2000 miles east and west, and 800 miles south and north, and of these, the most either rich in gold or in other merchandises. The common soldier shall here fight for gold, and pay himself, instead of pence, with plates of half a foot broad, whereas he breaketh his bones in other wars for provant[6] and penury. Those commanders and chieftains that shoot at honor and abundance shall find there more rich and beautiful cities, more temples adorned with golden images, more sepulchers filled with treasure, than either Cortez found in Mexico, or Pizarro in Peru: and the shining glory of this conquest will eclipse all those so far extended beams of the Spanish nation. There is no country which yieldeth more pleasure to the inhabitants, either for those common delights of hunting, hawking, fishing, fowling, or the rest, than Guiana doth. * * A

* * * Both for health, good air, pleasure, and riches I am resolved it cannot be equalled by any region either in the east or west. Moreover, the country is so healthful, as of an hundred persons and more (which lay without shift most sluttishly,[7] and were every day almost melted with heat in rowing and marching, and suddenly wet again with great showers, and did eat of all sorts of corrupt fruits, and made meals of fresh fish without seasoning, of tortugas, of lagartos[8] or crocodiles, and of all sorts good and bad, without either order or measure, and besides lodged in the open air every night) we lost not any one, nor had one ill disposed to my knowledge, nor found any calentura, or other of those pestilent diseases which dwell in all hot regions, and so near the equinoctial line.[9]

Where there is store[1] of gold, it is in effect needless to remember other commodities for trade: but it hath, towards the south part of the river, great quantities of brazil-wood, and diverse berries that dye a most perfect crimson and carnation. * * * All places yield abundance of cotton, of silk, of balsam, and of those kinds most excellent and never known in Europe, of all sorts of gums, of Indian pepper: and what else the countries may afford within the land, we know not, neither had we time to abide the trial,[2] and search. The soil besides is so excellent and so full of rivers, as it will carry sugar, ginger, and all those other commodities which the West Indies have.

It hath never been entered by any army of strength, and never conquered or possessed by any Christian prince. It is besides so defensible, that if two forts be builded in one of the provinces which I have seen, the flood[6] setteth in so near the bank, where the channel also lieth, that no ship can pass up but within a pike's length[7] of the artillery, first of the one, and afterwards of the other. * * *

* * * Guiana hath but one entrance by the sea (if it hath that) for any vessels of burden: so as whosoever shall first possess it, it shall be found unaccessible for any enemy, except he come in wherries,[8] barges, or canoes, or else in flat-bottomed boats, and if he do offer to enter it in that manner, the woods are so thick two hundred miles together upon the rivers of such entrance, as a mouse cannot sit in a boat unhit from the bank. By land it is more impossible to approach, for it hath the strongest situation of any region under the sun, and is so environed with impassable mountains on every side, as it is impossible to victual[9] any company in the passage: which hath been well proved by the Spanish nation, who since the conquest of Peru have never left five years free from attempting this empire, or discovering some way into it, and yet of three and twenty several gentlemen, knights, and noblemen there was never any that knew which way to lead an army by land, or to conduct ships by sea, anything near the said country. Orellana, of whom the river of Amazones taketh name, was the first, and Don Antonio de Berreo[1] (whom we displanted) the last: and I doubt much, whether he himself or any of his yet know the best way into the said empire. * * *

The Wider World

In 1496 a Venetian tradesman living in Bristol, John Cabot, was granted a license by Henry VII to sail on a voyage of exploration. In 1497, he reached Newfoundland. Other remarkable feats of seamanship and reconaissance followed, including what was the Elizabethan Age's supreme maritime achievement: on his ship The Golden Hind, Sir Francis Drake circumnavigated the globe in a three-year voyage from 1577 to 1580 and laid claim to California on behalf of the queen; a few years later (1586—88) a ship commanded by Thomas Cavendish also accomplished a circumnavigation. Though they failed to rival the Spanish and Portuguese in their astonishing national enterprises of exploration and conquest, the range of sixteenth-century English naval ventures, always difficult and dangerous, is extraordinary. Sir Martin Frobisher explored bleak Baffin Island in search of a northwest passage to the Orient; Sir John Davis explored the west coast of Greenland and discovered the Falkland Islands off the coast of Argentina; Sir John Hawkins made large profits by carrying shiploads of black slaves from West Africa for sale in the Caribbean; Sir Walter Ralegh ventured up the Orinoco delta, in what is now Venezuela, in search of the mythical city of El Dorado.

Accounts of these and many other exploits were collected by a clergyman, geographer, and tireless promoter of empire, Richard Hakluyt (1552?—1616), and published as The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffics, and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589; expanded three-volume edition 1598—1600). Hakluyt writes that he was incited to undertake his huge editorial labors during a stay in France, where he heard "other nations miraculously extolled for their discoveries and notable enterprises by sea, but the English of all others for their sluggish security and continual neglect of the like attempts, either ignominiously reported or exceedingly condemned." His response was to assemble the records of English voyages "to the most remote and farthest distant quarters of the earth, at any time within the compass of these 1500 years."

"To seek new worlds for gold, for praise, for glory," as Ralegh characterized such enterprises, was not for the faint of heart: Drake, Cavendish, Frobisher, and Hawkins all died at sea, as did huge numbers of those who sailed under their command. Elizabethans who were sensible enough to stay at home could have a few material glimpses of their fellow countrymen's far-reaching voyages. Expeditions brought back native plants (including, most famously, tobacco), animals, cultural artifacts, and, on occasion, some native people, most often seized against their will. There were exhibitions in London of a kidnapped Eskimo with his kayak and of Virginians with their canoes. Most of these miserable captives, violently uprooted and vulnerable to European diseases, quickly perished, but even in death they were evidently valuable property: while the English will not give one small coin "to relieve a lame beggar," one of the characters in The Tempest wryly remarks, "they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian" (2.2.32-33).

But the principal way in which stay-at-homes encountered the rapidly expanding world was through eyewitness accounts of the kind we present here. These accounts were not, on the whole, rhetorically ornate. Travelers' tales had an ancient and well-deserved reputation for exaggeration and outright mendacity; consequently Elizabethan writers strove for the effect of factual directness, simplicity, and trustworthiness. But the encounters they described were so remarkable, calling into question many of their culture's rooted assumptions about human behavior, that their writings often have the mingled wonder, fear, and longing that characterize the most extravagant literary romance.* The greatest Elizabethan writer of romance, Edmund Spenser, acknowledged the affinity in defending his Faerie Land against anyone who might complain that it was unreal:

> But let that man with better sense advise,
> That of the world least part to us is read:
> And daily how through hardy enterprise
> Many great regions are discovered,
> Which to late age were never mentioned.
> Who ever heard of th'Indian Peru?
> Or who in venturous vessel measured
> The Amazons' huge river, now found true?
> Or fruitfullest Virginia who did ever view?

FROBISHER'S VOYAGES TO THE ARCTIC, 1576-78

George Best, a navigator, was captain of a vessel in two of the three voyages led by Martin Frobisher (1535?—1594) to discover a northwest passage to China. On his return from the third voyage, Best published A true discourse of the late voyages of discovery, for the finding of a passage to Cathay. The expeditions, to a remote island dubbed Meta Incognita (the Unknown Boundary, now known as Baffin Island), were extremely arduous and ultimately proved disastrous. The Northwest Passage was not found, and five English sailors were seized by the Eskimos and never recovered. Frobisher kidnapped several Eskimos and brought them back to England, along with a thousand tons of promising-looking ore. The captives caused a sensation in London, but they quickly died; and the ore proved to contain only fool's gold.

From A true discourse of the late voyages of discovery, for the finding of a passage to Cathay by the Northwest, under the conduct of Martin Frobisher

God having blessed us with so happy a landfall,[1] we bare into the straits which run in next hand, and somewhat further up to the northward, and came as near the shore as we might for the ice, and upon the eighteenth day of July our general taking the goldfiners[2] with him, attempted to go on shore with a small rowing pinnace, upon the small island where the ore was taken up, to prove whether there were any store[3] thereof to be found, but he could not get in all that island a piece so big as a walnut, where the first was found. But our men which sought the other islands thereabouts found them all to have good store of the ore, whereupon our general with these good tidings returned aboard about ten of the clock at night, and was joyfully welcomed of the company with a volley of shot. He brought eggs, fowls, and a young seal aboard, which the company had killed ashore, and having found upon those islands gins[4] set to catch fowl, and sticks new cut, with other things, he well perceived that not long before some of the country people had resorted thither.

Having therefore found those tokens of the people's access in those parts, and being in his first voyage well acquainted with their subtle and cruel disposition, he provided well for his better safety, and on Friday the nineteenth of July in the morning early, with his best company of gentlemen and soldiers, to the number of forty persons, went on shore, as well to discover the inland and habitation of the people as also to find out some fit harbor for our ships. And passing towards the shore with no small difficulty by reason of the abundance of ice which lay alongst the coast so thick together that hardly any passage through them might be discovered, we arrived at length upon the main of Hall's greater island,[5] and found there also as well as in the other small islands good store of the ore. And leaving his boats here with sufficient guard, we passed up into the country about two English miles, and recovered the top of a high hill, on the top whereof our men made a column or cross of stones heaped up of a good height together in good sort, and solemnly sounded a trumpet, and said certain prayers kneeling about the ensign, and honored the place by the name of Mount Warwick, in remembrance of the Right Honorable the Lord Ambrose Dudley, earl of Warwick,[6] whose noble mind and good countenance[7] in this, as in all other good actions, gave great encouragement and good furtherance. This done, we retired our companies, not seeing anything here worth further discovery, the country seeming barren and full of ragged mountains, and in most parts covered with snow.

And thus marching towards our boats, we espied certain of the country people on the top of Mount Warwick with a flag wafting[8] us back again and making great noise, with cries like the mowing of bulls, seeming greatly desirous of conference with us: whereupon the general being therewith better acquainted, answered them again with the like cries, whereat and with the noise of our trumpets they seemed greatly to rejoice, skipping, laughing, and dancing for joy. And hereupon we made signs unto them, holding up two fingers, commanding two of our men to go apart from our companies, whereby they might do the like. So that forthwith two of our men and two of theirs met together a good space from company, neither party having their weapons about them. Our men gave them pins and points[9] and such trifles as they had. And they likewise bestowed on our men two bow cases and such things as they had. They earnestly desired our men to go up into their country, and our men offered them like kindness aboard our ships, but neither part (as it seemed) admitted or trusted the other's courtesy. Their manner of traffic is thus: they do use to lay down of their merchandise upon the ground so much as they mean to part withal, and so looking that the other party with whom they make trade should do the like, they themselves do depart, and then if they do like of their mart they come again, and take in exchange the other's merchandise;

otherwise if they like not, they take their own and depart. The day being thus well-near spent, in haste we retired our companies into our boats again, minding forthwith to search alongst the coast for some harbor fit for our ships: for the present necessity thereof was much, considering that all this while they lay off and on between the two lands, being continually subject as well to great danger of fleeting ice, which environed them, as to the sudden flaws[1] which the coast seemeth much subject unto. But when the people perceived our departure, with "great tokens of affection they earnestly called us back again, following us almost to our boats: whereupon our general taking his master[2] with him, who was best acquainted with their manners, went apart unto two of them, meaning, if they could lay sure hold upon them, forcibly to bring them aboard, with intent to bestow certain toys[3] and apparel upon the one, and so to dismiss him with all arguments[4] of courtesy, and retain the other for an interpreter. The general and his master being met with their two companions together, after they had exchanged certain things the one with the other, one of the savages for lack of better merchandise cut off the tail of his coat (which is a chief ornament among them) and gave it unto our general for a present. But he presently upon a watchword given with his master suddenly laid hold upon the two savages. But the ground underfoot being slippery with the snow on the side of the hill, their handfast failed, and their prey escaping ran away and lightly recovered their bow and arrows, which they had hid not far from them behind the rocks. And being only two savages in sight, they so fiercely, desperately, and with such fury assaulted and pursued our general and his master, being altogether unarmed, and not mistrusting their subtlety, that they chased them to their boats, and hurt the general in the buttock with an arrow, who the rather speedily fled back because they suspected a greater number behind the rocks. Our soldiers (which were commanded before to keep their boats) perceiving the danger, and hearing our men calling for shot, came speedily to rescue, thinking there had been a greater number. But when the savages heard the shot of one of our calivers[5] (and yet having first bestowed their arrows), they ran away, our men speedily following them. But a servant of my Lord of Warwick, called Nicholas Conger, a good footman, and uncumbered with any furniture,[6] having only a dagger at his back, overtook one of them, and being a Cornishman and a good wrestler, showed his companion such a Cornish trick that he made his sides ache against the ground for a month after. And so being stayed, he was taken alive and brought away, but the other escaped. Thus with their strange and new prey our men repaired to their boats, and passed from the main to a small island of a mile compass, where they resolved to tarry all night; for even now a sudden storm was grown so great at sea that by no means they could recover[7] their ships. And here every man refreshed himself with a small portion of victuals which was laid into the boats for their dinners, having neither eat nor drunk all the day before. But because they knew not how long the storm might last, nor how far off the ships might be put to sea, nor whether they should ever recover them again or not, they made great spare of their victuals, as it greatly behooved them: for they knew full well that the best cheer[8] the country could yield them was rocks and stones, a hard food to live withal, and the people more ready to eat them than to give them wherewithal to eat. And thus keeping very good watch and ward, they lay there all night upon hard cliffs of snow and ice, both wet, cold, and comfortless.

Upon the mainland over against the Countess's Island[9] we discovered and beheld to our great marvel the poor caves and houses of those country people, which serve them (as it should seem) for their winter dwellings, and are made two fathom[1] underground, in compass round like to an oven, being joined fast one by another, having holes like to a fox or cony berry,[2] to keep and come together. They undertrenched these places with gutters, so that the water falling from the hills above them may slide away without their annoyance: and are seated commonly in the foot of a hill, to shield them better from the cold winds, having their door and entrance ever open towards the south. From the ground upward they build with whales' bones, for lack of timber, which bending one over another are handsomely compacted in the top together, and are covered over with sealskins, which, instead of tiles, fence them from the rain. In which house they have only one room, having the one half of the floor raised with broad stones a foot higher than the other, whereon strewing moss, they make their nests to sleep in. They defile these dens most filthily with their beastly feeding, and dwell so long in a place (as we think) until, their sluttishness loathing them,[3] they are forced to seek a sweeter air and a new seat, and are (no doubt) a dispersed and wandering nation, as the Tartarians, and live in hordes and troops without any certain abode, as may appear by sundry circumstances of our experience.

Here our captive, being ashore with us to declare the use of such things as we saw, stayed himself alone behind the company, and did set up five small sticks round in a circle one by another, with one small bone placed just in the midst of all: which thing when one of our men perceived, he called us back to behold the matter, thinking that he had meant some charm or witchcraft therein. But the best conjecture we could make thereof was that he would thereby his countrymen should understand that for our five men which they betrayed[4] the last year (whom he signified by the five sticks) he was taken and kept prisoner, which he signified by the bone in the midst. For afterwards when we showed him the picture of his countryman which the last year was brought into England (whose counterfeit[5] we had drawn, with boat and other furniture, both as he was in his own, and also in English apparel), he was upon the sudden much amazed thereat, and beholding advisedly the same with silence a good while, as though he would strain courtesy whether[6] should begin the speech (for he thought him no doubt a lively[7] creature), at length began to question with him, as with his companion, and, finding him dumb and mute, seemed to suspect him, as one disdainful, and would with a little help have grown into choler[8] at the matter, until at last, by feeling and handling, he found him but a deceiving picture. And then with great noise and cries ceased not wondering, thinking that we could make men live or die at our pleasure.

And thereupon calling the matter to his remembrance, he gave us plainly to understand by signs that he had knowledge of the taking of our five men the last year, and confessing the manner of each thing, numbered the five men upon his five fingers and pointed unto a boat in our ship which was like unto that wherein our men were betrayed: and when we made him signs that they were slain and eaten, he earnestly denied, and made signs to the contrary.

DRAKE'S CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF THE GLOBE, 1577-80

The Spanish and Portuguese had been exploring the Pacific long before the great Elizabethan admiral and sometime privateer Francis Drake (ca. 1540—1596) caught sight of its waters in 1573. Drake returned to the Pacific in the course of an epochal journey chronicled in a narrative entitled The famous voyage of Sir Francis Drake into the South Sea, and therehence about the whole Globe of the Earth. The narrative, assembled by Hakluyt from several eyewitness accounts, includes a description of the place Drake called Nova Albion (New England), better known by the name given to it by Spanish explorers, California. Somewhere in the vicinity of what is now San Francisco (perhaps Drake's Bay, on the Point Reyes peninsula), the English believed (or claimed to believe) that the native "king" gave to Drake title to the whole land. The brass plate mentioned in the account has never been found, though a forgery sat for some years in a display case at the University of California, Berkeley.

From The famous voyage of Sir Francis Drake into the South Sea, and therehence about the whole Globe of the Earth, begun in the year of our Lord 1577

The fifth day of June, being in 43 degrees towards the pole arctic,[1] we found the air so cold that our men, being grievously pinched with the same, complained of the extremity thereof, and the further we went, the more the cold increased upon us. Whereupon we thought it best for that time to seek the land, and did so, finding it not mountainous but low plain land, till we came within 38 degrees towards the line.[2] In which height it pleased God to send us into a fair and good bay, with a good wind to enter the same.

In this bay we anchored, and the people of the country having their houses close by the water's side showed themselves unto us, and sent a present to our general.

When they came unto us, they greatly wondered at the things that we brought, but our general (according to his natural and accustomed humanity) courteously entreated them, and liberally bestowed on them necessary things to cover their nakedness, whereupon they supposed us to be gods, and would not be persuaded to the contrary. The presents which they sent to our general were feathers, and cauls[3] of net-work.

[1] I.e., 43° north latitude. The year is 1579.

[2] The equator. "38 degrees": a latitude a little north of present-day San Francisco.

[3] Headdresses.

Their houses are digged round about with earth, and have from the uttermost brims of the circle clefts[4] of wood set upon them, joining close together at the top like a spire steeple, which by reason of that closeness are very warm.

Their beds is the ground with rushes strewed on it, and lying about the house, have the fire in the midst. The men go naked, the women take bulrushes and comb them after the manner of hemp, and thereof make their loose garments, which being knit[5] about their middles, hang down about their hips, having also about their shoulders a skin of deer, with the hair upon it. These women are very obedient and serviceable to their husbands.

After they were departed from us, they came and visited us the second time and brought with them feathers and bags of tobacco for presents; and when they came to the top of the hill (at the bottom whereof we had pitched our tents), they stayed themselves: where one appointed for speaker wearied himself with making a long oration, which done, they left their bows upon the hill and came down with their presents.

In the meantime the women, remaining on the hill, tormented themselves lamentably, tearing their flesh from their cheeks, whereby we perceived that they were about[6] a sacrifice. In the meantime our general with his company went to prayer, and to reading of the Scriptures, at which exercise they were attentive, and seemed greatly to be affected with it: but when they were come unto us, they restored again unto us those things which before we bestowed upon them.

The news of our being there being spread through the country, the people that inhabited round about came down, and amongst them the king himself, a man of a goodly stature and comely personage, with many other tall and warlike men: before whose coming were sent two ambassadors to our general to signify that their king was coming, in doing of which message their speech was continued about half an hour. This ended, they by signs requested our general to send something by their hand to their king, as a token that his coming might be in peace: wherein our general having satisfied them, they returned with glad tidings to their king, who marched to us with a princely majesty, the people crying continually after their manner; and as they drew near unto us, so did they strive to behave themselves in their actions with comeliness.

In the forefront was a man of a goodly personage, who bare the scepter or mace before the king, whereupon hanged two crowns, a less and a bigger, with three chains of a marvelous length. The crowns were made of knit-work wrought artificially with feathers of divers colors; the chains were made of a bonny[7] substance, and few be the persons among them that are admitted to wear them—and of that number also the persons are stinted,[8] as some ten, some twelve, etc. Next unto him which bare the scepter was the king himself, with his guard about his person, clad with cony[9] skins and other skins; after them followed the naked common sort of people, everyone having his face painted, some with white, some with black and other colors, and having in their hands one thing or another for a present, not so much as their children, but they also brought their presents.

In the meantime our general gathered his men together and marched within his fenced place, making against their approaching a very warlike show. They being trooped together in their order, and a general salutation being made, there was presently a general silence. Then he that bare the scepter before the king, being informed by another, whom they assigned to that office, with a manly and lofty voice proclaimed that which the other spake to him in secret, continuing half an hour: which ended, and a general Amen as it were given, the king with the whole number of men and women (the children excepted) came down without any weapon, who descending to the foot of the hill set themselves in order.

In coming towards our bulwarks and tents, the scepter-bearer began a song, observing his measures in a dance, and that with a stately countenance, whom the king with his guard, and every degree of persons following, did in like manner sing and dance, saving only the women, which danced and kept silence. The general permitted them to enter within our bulwark, where they continued their song and dance a reasonable[1] time. When they had satisfied themselves, they made signs to our general to sit down, to whom the king and divers others made several orations, or rather supplications, that he would take their province and kingdom into his hand and become their king, making signs that they would resign unto him their right and title of the whole land and become his subjects. In which to persuade us the better, the king and the rest, with one consent and with great reverence, joyfully singing a song, did set the crown upon his head, enriched his neck with all their chains, and offered unto him many other things, honoring him by the name of Hioh, adding thereunto, as it seemed, a sign of triumph: which thing our general thought not meet[2] to reject, because he knew not what honor and profit it might be to our country. Wherefore in the name and to the use of Her Majesty he took the scepter, crown, and dignity of the said country into his hands, wishing that the riches and treasure thereof might so conveniently be transported to the enriching of her kingdom at home, as it aboundeth in the same.

The common sort of people, leaving the king and his guard with our general, scattered themselves together with their sacrifices among our people, taking a diligent view of every person: and such as pleased their fancy (which were the youngest), they enclosing them about offered their sacrifices unto them with lamentable weeping, scratching, and tearing the flesh from their faces with their nails, whereof issued abundance of blood. But we used signs to them of disliking this, and stayed their hands from force, and directed them upwards to the living God, whom only they ought to worship. They showed unto us their wounds and craved help of them at our hands, whereupon we gave them lotions, plasters, and ointments agreeing to the state of their griefs,[3] beseeching God to cure their diseases. Every third day they brought their sacrifices unto us, until they understood our meaning, that we had no pleasure in them: yet they could not be long absent from us, but daily frequented our company to the hour of our departure, which departure seemed so grievous unto them that their joy was turned into sorrow. They entreated us that being absent we would remember them, and by stealth provided a sacrifice, which we misliked.

Our necessary business being ended, our general with his company traveled up into the country to their villages, where we found herds of deer by 1000 in a company, being most large and fat of body.

We found the whole country to be a warren of a strange kind of conies, their bodies in bigness as be the Barbary conies, their heads as the heads of ours, the feet of a want,[4] and the tail of a rat, being of great length; under her chin is on either side a bag, into the which she gathereth her meat,[5] when she hath filled her belly abroad. The people eat their bodies and make great accompt[6] of their skins, for their king's coat was made of them.

Our general called this country Nova Albion,[7] and that for two causes: the one in respect of the white banks and cliffs which lie towards the sea; and the other, because[8] it might have some affinity with our country in name, which sometime was so called.

There is no part of earth here to be taken up wherein there is not some probable show of gold or silver.

At our departure hence our general set up a monument of our being there, as also of Her Majesty's right and title to the same, namely a plate nailed upon a fair great post, whereupon was engraven Her Majesty's name, the day and year of our arrival there, with the free giving up of the province and people into Her Majesty's hands, together with Her Highness' picture and arms[9] in a piece of sixpence of current English money under the plate, whereunder was also written the name of our general.

AMADAS AND BARLOWE'S VOYAGE TO VIRGINIA, 1584

The first English voyage to Virginia was commanded by Philip Amadas and Arthur Barlowe. The two captains had been sent forth by Sir Walter Ralegh to discover territories in North America suitable for colonization. In Barlowe's account, they encountered a people living very close to the blessed state of the inhabitants of the Golden Age celebrated by classical poets like Ovid, a state of simplicity, honesty, generosity, and peace. All the same, when a group of Algonkian hunters suddenly return home, the English colonists immediately reach for their weapons.

From The first voyage made to Virginia

The second of July we found shoal water, which smelt so sweetly and was so strong a smell as if we had been in the midst of some delicate garden abounding with all kind of odoriferous flowers, by which we were assured that the land could not be far distant. And keeping good watch and bearing but slack sail, the fourth of the same month we arrived upon the coast, which we supposed to be a continent and firm land, and we sailed along the same 120 English miles before we could find any entrance, or river issuing into the sea.

The first that appeared unto us we entered, though not without some difficulty, and cast anchor three harquebus-shot[1] within the haven's mouth, on the left hand of the same. And after thanks given to God for our safe arrival thither, we manned our boats, and went to view the land next adjoining and to take possession of the same in the right of the queen's most excellent Majesty, as rightful queen and princess of the same, and after delivered the same over to your use, according to Her Majesty's grant and letters patents,[2] under Her Highness's Great Seal. Which being performed according to the ceremonies used in such enterprises, we viewed the land about us, being whereas we first landed very sandy and low towards the waterside, but so full of grapes as the very beating and surge of the sea overflowed them. Of which we found such plenty, as well there as in all places else, both on the sand and on the green soil on the hills, as in the plains, as well on every little shrub, as also climbing towards the tops of high cedars, that I think in all the world the like abundance is not to be found. And myself having seen those parts of Europe that most abound, find such difference as were incredible to be written.

We passed from the seaside towards the tops of those hills next adjoining, being but of mean[3] height, and from thence we beheld the sea on both sides, to the north and to the south, finding no end any of both ways. This land lay stretching itself to the west, which after we found to be but an island of twenty leagues long and not above six miles broad. Under the bank or hill whereon we stood, we beheld the valleys replenished with goodly cedar trees, and having discharged our harquebus-shot, such a flock of cranes (the most part white) arose under us, with such a cry redoubled by many echoes, as if an army of men had shouted all together.

This island had many goodly woods, and full of deer, conies,[4] hares, and fowl, even in the midst of summer, in incredible abundance. The woods are not such as you find in Bohemia, Moscovia, or Hyrcania,[5] barren and fruitless, but the highest and reddest cedars of the world, far bettering the cedars of the Azores, of the Indies, or of Lybanus,[6] pines, cypress, sassafras, the lentisk or the tree that beareth the mastic,[7] the tree that beareth the rind of black cinnamon, of which Master Winter brought from the Straits of Magellan, and many other of excellent smell and quality.[8]

We remained by the side of this island two whole days before we saw any people of the country. The third day we espied one small boat rowing towards us, having in it three persons. This boat came to the land's side, four harquebus-shot from our ships; and there two of the people remaining, the third came along the shore side towards us, and we being then all within board, he walked up and down upon the point of the land next unto us. Then the master and the pilot of the admiral,[9] Simon Ferdinando, and the captain, Philip Amadas, myself, and others, rowed to the land; whose coming this fellow attended, never making any show of fear or doubt. And after he had spoken of many things not understood by us, we brought him, with his own good liking, aboard the ships, and gave him a shirt, a hat, and some other things, and made him taste of our wine and our meat,[1] which he liked very well. And after having viewed both barks he departed and went to his own boat again, which he had left in a little cove or creek adjoining. As soon as he was two bow-shot into the water he fell to fishing, and in less than half an hour he had laden his boat as deep as it could swim, with which he came again to the point of the land, and there he divided his fish into two parts, pointing one part to the ship and the other to the pinnace.[2] Which, after he had (as much as he might) requited the former benefits received, he departed out of our sight.

[9] Flagship.

The next day there came unto us divers boats, and in one of them the king's brother, accompanied with forty or fifty men, very handsome and goodly people, and in their behavior as mannerly and civil as any of Europe. His name was Granganimeo, and the king is called Wingina; the country, Wingandacoa (and now, by[3] Her Majesty, Virginia). The manner of his coming was in this sort: he left his boats all together, as the first man did, a little from the ships by the shore, and came along to the place over against the ships, followed with forty men. When he came to the place, his servants spread a long mat upon the ground, on which he sat down, and at the other end of the mat four others of his company did the like. The rest of his men stood round about him somewhat afar off. When we came to the shore to him, with our weapons, he never moved from his place, nor any of the other four, nor never mistrusted any harm to be offered from us; but, sitting still, he beckoned us to come and sit by him, which we performed. And, being set, he made all signs of joy and welcome, striking on his head and his breast and afterwards on ours, to show we were all one, smiling and making show the best he could of all love and familiarity. After he had made a long speech unto us we presented him with divers things, which he received very joyfully and thankfully. None of his company durst speak one word all the time; only the four which were at the other end spake one in the other's ear very softly.

The king is greatly obeyed, and his brothers and children reverenced. The king himself in person was at our being there sore wounded in a fight which he had with the king of the next country, called Wingiana, and was shot in two places through the body, and once clean through the thigh, but yet he recovered. By reason whereof, and for that[4] he lay at the chief town of the country, being six days' journey off, we saw him not at all.

After we had presented this his brother with such things as we thought he liked, we likewise gave somewhat to the other that sat with him on the mat. But presently he arose and took all from them and put it into his own basket, making signs and tokens that all things ought to be delivered unto him, and the rest were but his servants and followers. A day or two after this we fell to trading with them, exchanging some things that we had for chamois, buff,[5] and deer skins. When we showed him all our packet of merchandise, of all things that he saw a bright tin dish most pleased him, which he presently took up and clapt it before his breast, and after made a hole in the brim thereof and hung it about his neck, making signs that it would defend him against his enemies' arrows. For those people maintain a deadly and terrible war with the people and king adjoining. We exchanged our tin dish for twenty skins, worth twenty crowns or twenty nobles;[6] and a copper kettle for fifty skins, worth fifty crowns. They offered us good exchange for our hatchets and axes, and for knives, and would have given anything for swords; but we would not depart[7] with any. * * *

* * * We found the people most gentle, loving, and faithful, void of guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the Golden Age.[8] The people only care how to defend themselves from the cold in their short winter, and to feed themselves with such meat as the soil affordeth; their meat is very well sodden,[9] and they make broth very sweet and savory. Their vessels are earthen pots, very large, white, and sweet; their dishes are wooden platters of sweet timber. Within the place where they feed was their lodging, and within that their idol which they worship, of which they speak incredible things. While we were at meat, there came in at the gates two or three men with their bows and arrows from hunting, whom when we espied we began to look one towards another, and offered to reach our weapons. But as soon as she[1] espied our mistrust, she was very much moved, and caused some of her men to run out, and take away their bows and arrows and break them, and withal beat the poor fellows out of the gate again. When we departed in the evening and would not tarry all night, she was very sorry, and gave us into our boat our supper half-dressed,[2] pots and all, and brought us to our boat's side, in which we lay all night, removing the same a pretty[3] distance from the shore. She perceiving our jealousy[4] was much grieved, and sent divers men and thirty women to sit all night on the bank's side by us, and sent us into our boats fine mats to cover us from the rain, using very many words to entreat us to rest in their houses. But because we were few men, and if we had miscarried the voyage had been in very great danger, we durst not adventure anything, although there was no cause of doubt.[5] For a more kind and loving people there cannot be found in the world, as far as we have hitherto had trial.[6]

We brought home also two of the savages, being lusty[7] men, whose names were Wanchese and Manteo.

HARIOT'S REPORT ON VIRGINIA, 1585

Thomas Hariot (1560-1621), mathematician, astronomer, and surveyor in the service of Sir Walter Balegh, was observing sunspots and using a telescope at about the same time as Galileo; he also made important discoveries in algebra. He accompanied Sir

Richard Grenville's expedition to Virginia in 1585 and wrote an account of it intended to promote colonization. He describes the geography, climate, vegetation, wildlife, and, especially, inhabitants of the New World, about whom the English were intensely curious. Reports had begun to circulate in England about tensions with the Algonkian Indians, upon whom the colonists were almost completely dependent for food, and Hariot's brief ethnographic observations sketch the grounds for reassurance that the natives "are not to be feared."*

OF THE NATURE AND MANNERS OF THE PEOPLE

It resteth[1] I speak a word or two of the natural inhabitants, their natures and manners, leaving large discourse thereof until time more convenient hereafter: now only so farforth as that you may know how that they in respect of troubling our inhabiting and planting[2] are not to be feared, but that they shall have cause both to fear and love us that shall inhabit with them.

They are a people clothed with loose mantles made of deerskins, and aprons of the same round about their middles, all else naked, of such a difference of statures only as we in England,[3] having no edge tools or weapons of iron or steel to offend us withal, neither know they how to make any. Those weapons that they have are only bows made of witch hazel and arrows of reeds, flat-edged truncheons also of wood about a yard long, neither have they anything to defend themselves but targets[4] made of barks, and some armors made of sticks wickered together with thread.

Their towns are but small, and near the seacoast but few, some containing but ten or twelve houses, some twenty; the greatest that we have seen hath been but of thirty houses. If they be walled, it is only done with barks of trees made fast to stakes, or else with poles only fixed upright, and close one by another.

Their houses are made of small poles, made fast at the tops in round form after the manner as is used in many arbories in our gardens of England; in most towns, covered with barks, and in some with artificial[5] mats made of long rushes, from the tops of the houses down to the ground. The length of them is commonly double to the breadth; in some places they are but twelve and sixteen yards long, and in other some we have seen, of four-and-twenty.

In some places of the country, one only town belongeth to the government of a wiroans or chief lord, in other some two or three, in some six, eight, and more. The greatest wiroans that yet we had dealing with had but eighteen towns in his government and able to make not above seven or eight hundred fighting men at the most. The language of every government is different from any other, and the further they are distant, the greater is the difference.

Their manner of wars amongst themselves is either by sudden surprising one another, most commonly about the dawning of the day, or moonlight, or else by ambushes or some subtle devices. Set battles are very rare, except it fall out where there are many trees, where either part may have some hope of defense, after the delivery of every arrow, in leaping behind some or other.

If there fall out any wars between us and them, what their fight is likely to be, we having advantages against them so many manner of ways, as by our discipline, our strange weapons and devices else, especially ordnance[6] great and small, it may easily be imagined: by the experience we have had in some places, the turning up of their heels against us in running away was their best defense.

In respect of us they are a people poor, and for want of skill and judgment in the knowledge and use of our things, do esteem our trifles before things of greater value. Notwithstanding, in their proper[7] manner (considering the want of such means as we have), they seem very ingenious. For although they have no such tools nor any such crafts, sciences, and arts as we, yet in those things they do, they show excellency of wit.[8] And by how much they upon due consideration shall find our manner of knowledges and crafts to exceed theirs in perfection, and speed for doing or execution, by so much the more is it probable that they should desire our friendship and love, and have the greater respect for pleasing and obeying us. Whereby may be hoped, if means of good government be used, that they may in short time be brought to civility and the embracing of true religion.

Some religion they have already, which although it be far from the truth, yet being as it is, there is hope it may be the easier and sooner reformed.

They believe that there are many gods, which they call mantoac, but of different sorts and degrees, one only chief and great god, which hath been from all eternity. Who, as they affirm, when he purposed to make the world, made first other gods of a principal order to be as means and instruments to be used in the creation and government to follow, and after, the sun, moon, and stars as petty gods, and the instruments of the other order more principal. First, they say, were made waters, out of which by the gods was made all diversity of creatures that are visible or invisible.

For mankind, they say a woman was made first, which, by the working of one of the gods, conceived and brought forth children. And in such sort, they say, they had their beginning. But how many years or ages have passed since, they say they can make no relation, having no letters nor other such means as we to keep records of the particularities of times past, but only tradition from father to son.

They think that all the gods are of human shape, and therefore they represent them by images in the forms of men, which they call kewasowok; one alone is called kewas: them they place in houses appropriate, or temples, which they call machicomuck, where they worship, pray, sing, and make many times offering unto them. In some machicomuck we have seen but one kewas, in some two, and in other some three. The common sort think them to be also gods.

They believe also the immortality of the soul, that after this life as soon as the soul is departed from the body, according to the works it hath done, it is either carried to heaven, the habitacle[9] of gods, there to enjoy perpetual bliss and happiness, or else to a great pit or hole, which they think to be in the furthest parts of their part of the world toward the sunset, there to burn continually. The place they call Popogusso.

For the confirmation of this opinion, they told me two stories of two men that had been lately dead and revived again. The one happened, but few years before our coming into the country, of a wicked man, which having been dead and buried, the next day the earth of the grave being seen to move, was taken up again; who made declaration where his soul had been—that is to say, very near entering into Popogusso, had not one of the gods saved him and gave him leave to return again and teach his friends what they should do to avoid that terrible place of torment. The other happened in the same year we were there, but in a town that was sixty miles from us, and it was told me for strange news that one being dead, buried, and taken up again as the first, showed that although his body had lain dead in the grave, yet his soul was alive and had traveled far in a long broad way, on both sides whereof grew most delicate and pleasant trees, bearing more rare and excellent fruits than ever he had seen before or was able to express, and at length came to most brave[1] and fair houses, near which he met his father that had been dead before, who gave him great charge to go back and show his friends what good they were to do to enjoy the pleasures of that place, which when he had done he should after come again.

What subtlety soever be in the wiroances and priests, this opinion worketh so much in many of the common and simple sort of people that it maketh them have great respect to their governors, and also great care what they do, to avoid torment after death and to enjoy bliss; although notwithstanding there is punishment ordained for malefactors, as stealers, whoremongers, and other sorts of wicked-doers, some punished with death, some with forfeitures, some with beating, according to the greatness of the facts.[2]

And this is the sum of their religion, which I learned by having special familiarity with some of their priests. Wherein they were not so sure grounded, nor gave such credit to their traditions and stories, but through conversing with us they were brought into great doubts of their own,[3] and no small admiration of ours, with earnest desire in many to learn more than we had means, for want of perfect utterance in their language, to express.

Most things they saw with us, as mathematical instruments, sea compasses, the virtue of the lodestone[4] in drawing iron, a perspective glass whereby was showed many strange sights, burning glasses, wildfire works,[5] guns, books, writing and reading, spring-clocks that seem to go of themselves, and many other things that we had, were so strange unto them, and so far exceeded their capacities to comprehend the reason and means how they should be made and done, that they thought they were rather the works of gods than of men, or at the leastwise they had been given and taught us of the gods. Which made many of them to have such opinion of us, as that if they knew not the truth of God and religion already, it was rather to be had from us whom God so specially loved, than from a people that were so simple as they found themselves to be in comparison of us. Whereupon greater credit was given unto that we spoke of concerning such matters.

Many times and in every town where I came, according as I was able, I made declaration of the contents of the Bible, that therein was set forth the true and only God and his mighty works, that therein was contained the true doctrine of salvation through Christ, with many particularities of miracles and chief points of religion, as I was able then to utter, and thought fit for the time. And although I told them the book materially and of itself was not of any such virtue as I thought they did conceive, but only the doctrine therein contained, yet would many be glad to touch it, to embrace it, to kiss it, to hold it to their breasts and heads, and stroke over all their body with it, to show their hungry desire of that knowledge which was spoken of.

There could at no time happen any strange sickness, losses, hurts, or any other cross[6] unto them, but that they would impute to us the cause or means thereof, for offending or not pleasing us. One other rare and strange accident, leaving others, will I mention before I end, which moved the whole country that either knew or heard of us to have us in wonderful admiration.

There was no town where we had any subtle device practiced against us, we leaving it unpunished or not revenged (because we sought by all means possible to win them by gentleness), but that within a few days after our departure from every such town the people began to die very fast, and many in short space, in some towns about twenty, in some forty, and in one six score, which in truth was very many in respect of their numbers. This happened in no place that we could learn, but where we had been, where they used some practice against us, and after such time. The disease also was so strange that they neither knew what it was nor how to cure it, the like by report of the oldest men in the country never happened before, time out of mind—a thing specially observed by us, as also by the natural inhabitants themselves. Insomuch that when some of the inhabitants which were our friends, and especially the wiroans Wingina, had observed such effects in four or five towns to follow their wicked practices, they were persuaded that it was the work of our God through our means, and that we by him might kill and slay whom we would without weapons, and not come near them. And thereupon when it had happened that they had understanding that any of their enemies had abused us in our journeys, hearing that we had wrought no revenge with our weapons, and fearing upon some cause the matter should so rest, did come and entreat us that we would be a means to our God that they, as others that had dealt ill with us, might in like sort die, alleging how much it would be for our credit and profit, as also theirs, and hoping furthermore that we would do so much at their requests in respect of the friendship we professed them.

Whose entreaties although we showed that they were ungodly, affirming that our God would not subject himself to any such prayers and requests of men—that indeed all things have been and were to be done according to his good pleasure as he had ordained, and that we to show ourselves his true servants ought rather to make petition for the contrary, that they with them might live together with us, be made partakers of his truth, and serve him in righteousness, but notwithstanding in such sort that we refer that, as all other things, to be done according to his divine will and pleasure, and as by his wisdom he had ordained to be best—yet because the effect fell out so suddenly and shortly after according to their desires, they thought nevertheless it came to pass by our means, and that we in using such speeches unto them did but dissemble the matter, and therefore came unto us to give us thanks in their manner, that although we satisfied them not in promise, yet in deeds and effect we had fulfilled their desires.

[6] Affliction.

This marvelous accident in all the country wrought so strange opinions of us that some people could not tell whether to think us gods or men, and the rather because that all the space of their sickness there was no man of ours known to die, or that was specially sick: they noted also that we had no women amongst us, neither that we did care for any of theirs.

Some therefore were of opinion that we were not born of women, and therefore not mortal, but that we were men of an old generation many years past, then risen again to immortality.

Some would likewise seem to prophesy that there were more of our generation yet to come, to kill theirs and take their places, as some thought the purpose was, by[7] that which was already done. Those that were immediately to come after us they imagined to be in the air, yet invisible and without bodies, and that they by our entreaty and for the love of us did make the people to die in that sort as they did, by shooting invisible bullets into them.

To confirm this opinion, their physicians (to excuse their ignorance in curing the disease) would not be ashamed to say, but earnestly make the simple people believe, that the strings of hlood that they sucked out of the sick bodies were the strings wherewithal the invisible bullets were tied and cast. Some also thought that we shot them ourselves out of our pieces[8] from the place where we dwelt, and killed the people in any town that had offended us as we listed,[9] how far distant from us soever it were. And other some said that it was the special work of God for our sakes (as we ourselves have cause in some sort to think no less, whatsoever some do or may imagine to the contrary), specially some astrologers, knowing of the eclipse of the sun which we saw the same year before in our voyage thitherward, which unto them appeared very terrible; and also of a comet which began to appear but a few days before the beginning of the said sickness. But to exclude them from being the special causes of so special an accident, there are further reasons than I think fit at this present to be alleged. These their opinions I have set down the more at large, that it may appear unto you that there is good hope they may be brought through discreet dealing and government to the embracing of the truth, and consequently to honor, obey, fear, and love us.

And although some of our company towards the end of the year showed themselves too fierce in slaying some of the people in some towns, upon causes that of our part might easily enough have been borne withal, yet notwithstanding, because it was on their part justly deserved, the alteration of their opinions generally and for the most part concerning us is the less to be doubted.[1] And whatsoever else they may be, by carefulness of ourselves need nothing at all to be feared.

JOHN LYLY
1554-1606

John Lyly was the grandson of William Lily, the author of the standard Latin grammar that every English schoolboy studied. After receiving the M.A. degree at Oxford, Lyly went to London, where his prose romance Euphues (1578) was an instant success. Subsequently, he wrote several elegant, sophisticated plays acted at court by the children's companies, and served several terms as a member of Parliament, though his hopes of obtaining a lucrative court appointment, such as Master of the Revels, were disappointed.

The title Euphues, taken from the name of that book's hero, is Greek for "of good natural parts, graceful, witty"; the subtitle, Anatomy of Wit, means something like "analysis of the mental faculties." The plot of the work involves a young man who leaves university for the carnal temptations of the city, falls in love, betrays his best friend, is in turn betrayed, repents, and thereafter ladles out great quantities of moral wisdom. But the story of the repentant prodigal is distinctly secondary to the prose style which has come to be known as Euphuism. It has two features: an elaborately patterned sentence structure based on comparison and antithesis, and a wealth of ornament including proverbs, incidents from history and poetry, and fanciful similes drawn from contemporary science, classical texts, or the author's own imagination. Euphuism became a rage for a while, especially at court, though it was criticized by Sidney, parodied by Shakespeare, and mocked by Nashe and Jonson. The style may have been particularly popular among court women; the publisher of Lyly's Six Court Comedies in 1632 informed his readers that "All our ladies were then his [Euphues's or Lyly's] scholars, and the beauty in court who could not parley Euphuism was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French." Although it did not last, this highly self-conscious, overwrought style is an example of the Elizabethans' fascination with ornate language and artifice.*

From Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit

[EUPHUES INTRODUCED]

There dwelt in Athens a young gentleman of great patrimony, and of so comely a personage, that it was doubted[1] whether he were more bound to Nature for the lineaments of his person, or to Fortune for the increase of his possessions. But Nature impatient of comparisons, and as it were disdaining a companion or copartner in her working, added to this comeliness of his body such a sharp capacity of mind, that not only she proved Fortune counterfeit, but was half of that opinion that she herself was only current.[2] This young gallant, of more wit[3] than wealth, and yet of more wealth than wisdom, seeing himself inferior to none in pleasant conceits,[4] thought himself superior to all in honest conditions, insomuch that he deemed himself so apt to all things, that he gave himself almost to nothing, but practicing of those things commonly which are incident to these sharp wits, fine phrases, smooth quipping, merry taunting, using jesting without mean,[5] and abusing mirth without measure. As therefore the sweetest rose hath his prickle, the finest velvet his brack,[6] the fairest flower his bran,[7] so the sharpest wit hath his wanton will, and the holiest head his wicked way. And true it is that some men write and most men believe, that in all perfect shapes, a blemish bringeth rather a liking every way to the eyes, than a loathing any way to the mind. Venus had her mole in her cheek which made her more amiable: Helen[8] her scar on her chin which Paris called cos amoris, the whetsone of love. Aristippus his wart, Lycurgus[9] his wen: So likewise in the disposition of the mind, either virtue is overshadowed with some vice, or vice overcast with some virtue. Alexander valiant in war, yet given to wine. Tully eloquent in his glozes, yet vainglorious: Solomon wise, yet too too wanton: David holy but yet an homicide:[1] none more witty than Euphues, yet at the first none more wicked. The freshest colors soonest fade, the teenest[2] razor soonest turneth his edge, the finest cloth is soonest eaten with moths, and the cambric sooner stained than the coarse canvas: which appeared well in this Euphues, whose wit being like wax apt to receive any impression, and having the bridle in his own hands, either to use the rein or the spur, disdaining counsel, leaving his country, loathing his old acquaintance, thought either by wit to obtain some conquest, or by shame to abide some conflict, and leaving the rule of reason, rashly ran unto destruction. Who preferring fancy before friends, and his present humor[3] before honor to come, laid reason in water being too salt for his taste, and followed unbridled affection, most pleasant for his tooth.[4] When parents have more care how to leave their children wealthy than wise, and are more desirous to have them maintain the name than the nature of a gentleman; when they put gold into the hands of youth, where they should put a rod under their girdle,[5] when instead of awe they make them past grace, and leave them rich executors of goods, and poor executors of godliness, then is it no marvel that the son, being left rich by his father's will, become retchless by his own will.[6]

It hath been an old-said saw,[7] and not of less truth than antiquity, that wit is the better if it be the dearer bought: as in the sequel of this history shall most manifestly appear. It happened this young imp[8] to arrive at Naples (a place of more pleasure than profit, and yet of more profit than piety), the very walls and windows whereof shewed it rather to be the Tabernacle of Venus than the Temple of Vesta.[9]

There was all things necessary and in readiness that might either allure the mind to lust or entice the heart to folly, a court more meet[1] for an atheist than for one of Athens, for Ovid than for Aristotle, for a graceless lover than for a godly liver: more fitter for Paris than Hector, and meeter for Flora than Diana.[2]

Here my youth (whether for weariness he could not, or for wantonness would not, go any further) determined to make his abode: whereby it is evidently seen that the fleetest fish swalloweth the delicatest bait, that the highest soaring hawk traineth[3] to the lure, and that the wittiest sconce[4] is inveigled with the sudden view of alluring vanities.

Here he wanted[5] no companions which courted him continually with sundry kinds of devices, whereby they might either soak his purse to reap commodity, or soothe his person to win credit, for he had guests and companions of all sorts.

There frequented to this lodging and mansion house as well the spider to suck poison of his fine wit as the bee to gather honey, as well the drone as the dove, the fox as the lamb, as well Damocles[6] to betray him as Damon[7] to be true to him: yet he behaved himself so warily, that he singled his game[8] wisely. He could easily discern Apollo's music from Pan his pipe,[9] and Venus's beauty from Juno's bravery,[1] and the faith of Laelius[2] from the flattery of Aristippus, he welcomed all but trusted none, he was merry but yet so wary that neither the flatterer could take advantage to entrap him in his talk nor the wisest any assurance of his friendship: who being demanded of[3] one what countryman he was, he answered, "What countryman am I not? If I be in Crete, I can lie, if in Greece I can shift, if in Italy I can court it:[4] if thou ask whose son I am also, I ask thee whose son I am not. I can carouse with Alexander, abstain with Romulus, eat with the Epicure, fast with the Stoic, sleep with Endymion, watch with Chrysippus,"[5] using these speeches and other like. An old gentleman in Naples seeing his pregnant wit,[6] his eloquent tongue somewhat taunting, yet with delight, his mirth without measure yet not without wit, his sayings vainglorious yet pithy, began to bewail his nurture and to muse at his nature, being incensed against the one as most pernicious, and enflamed with the other as most precious: for he well knew that so rare a wit would in time either breed an intolerable trouble or bring an incomparable treasure to the common weal:[7] at the one he greatly pitied, at the other he rejoiced.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY
1554-1586

Sir Philip Sidney's face was "spoiled with pimples," Ben Jonson remarked in 1619, wryly distancing himself from the virtual Sidney cult that had arisen in the years after his death. Knight, soldier, poet, friend, and patron, Sidney seemed to the Elizabethans to embody all the traits of character and personality they admired: he was Castiglione's perfect courtier come to life. When he was killed in battle in the Low Countries at the age of thirty-two, fighting for the Protestant cause against the hated Spanish, all England mourned. Stories, possibly apocryphal, began immediately to circulate about his gallantry on the battlefield—grievously wounded, he gave his water to a dying footsoldier with the words "Thy necessity is yet greater than mine"—and about his astonishing self-composure as he himself lay dying: suffering from his putrifying, gangrenous wound, Sidney composed a song and had it sung by his deathbed. When his corpse was brought back to England for burial, the spectacular funeral procession, one of the most elaborate ever staged, almost bankrupted his father-in-law, Francis Walsingham, the wealthy head of Queen Elizabeth's secret service.

Philip Sidney's father was Sir Henry Sidney, thrice lord deputy (governor) of Ireland, and his mother was a sister of Bobert Dudley, earl of Leicester, the most spectacular and powerful of all the queen's favorites. He entered Shrewsbury School in 1564, at the age of ten, on the same day as Fulke Greville, who became his lifelong friend and his biographer. Greville wrote of Sidney, "though I lived with him and knew him from a child, yet I never knew him other than a man—with such staidness of mind, lovely and familiar gravity, as carried grace and reverence above greater years." He attended Oxford but left without taking a degree and completed his education by extended travels on the Continent. There he met many of the most important people of the time, from kings and queens to philosophers, theologians, and poets. In France he witnessed the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, which began in Paris on August 24, 1572, and raged through France for more than a month, as Catholic mobs incited by Queen Catherine de Medicis slaughtered perhaps 50,000 Huguenots (French Protestants). This experience undoubtedly strengthened Sidney's ardent Protestantism, which had been inculcated by his family background and education. In an intense correspondence with his mentor, the Burgundian humanist Hubert Languet, he brooded on how he could help to save Europe from what he viewed as the Roman Catholic menace.

Languet and his associates clearly hoped that this brilliant and wonderfully well-connected young Englishman would be able to steer royal policy toward active intervention in Europe's wars of religion. Yet when he returned to England Sidney found the direct path to heroic action blocked by the caution and hard-nosed realism of Oueen Elizabeth and her principal advisers. Though she sent him on some diplomatic missions, the queen clearly regarded the zealous young man with considerable skepticism. As a prominent, well-connected courtier with literary interests, Sidney actively encouraged authors such as Edward Dyer, Greville, and, most important, Edmund Spenser, who dedicated The Shepheardes Calender to him as "the president [chief exemplar] of noblesse and of chevalree." But he clearly longed to be something more than an influential patron of letters. In 1580 his Protestant convictions led him publicly to oppose Queen Elizabeth's projected marriage to the Catholic duke of Anjou. The queen, who hated interference with her diplomatic maneuvers, angrily dismissed Sidney from the court.

He retired to Wilton, the estate of his beloved and learned sister, Mary Herbert, countess of Pembroke, and there he wrote a long, elaborate epic romance in prose called Arcadia. Sidney's claim, made with studied nonchalance, that the work was casually tossed off for his sister's private entertainment is belied by its considerable literary, political, and moral ambitions, qualities that were reinforced and intensified in the extensive revisions he began to make to it in 1582. Our selection is from this revised version, termed by scholars the New Arcadia.

In addition to Arcadia, which inspired many imitations, including the Urania of Sidney's niece, Lady Mary Wroth, two other influential works by Sidney have had still more lasting importance. One of these, The Defense of Poesy, is the major work of literary criticism produced in the English Renaissance. In this long essay Sidney eloquently defends poetry (his term for all imaginative literature) against its attackers and, in the process, greatly exalts the role of the poet, the freedom of the imagination, and the moral value of fiction. Perhaps Sidney's finest literary achievement is Astrophil and Stella (Starlover and Star), the first of the great Elizabethan sonnet cycles. The principal focus of these sonnets is not a sequence of events or an unfolding relationship. Rather, they explore the lover's state of mind and soul, the contradictory impulses, intense desires, and frustrations that haunt him.

In his guise as a Petrarchan sonneteer, Sidney repeatedly insists that the thought of his beloved drives all more mundane matters from his mind. Yet a number of the sonnets betray a continuing preoccupation with matters of politics and foreign policy. Neither love nor literature could distract Sidney for long from what he took to be his destined role. In 1585 he tried to join Sir Francis Drake's West Indian expedition but was prevented by the queen; instead, she appointed him governor of Flushing in the Netherlands, where as a volunteer and knight-errant he engaged in several vicious skirmishes in the war against Spain. At Zutphen on September 13, 1586, leading a charge against great odds, Sidney was wounded in the thigh, shortly after he had thrown away his thigh armor in an ill-fated chivalric gesture. He died after lingering for twenty-six days.

Sidney called poetry his "unelected vocation," and in keeping with the norms of his class, he did not publish any of his major literary works himself. His ambition, continually thwarted, was to be a man of action whose deeds would affect his country's destiny. Yet he was the author of the most ambitious work of prose fiction, the most important piece of literary criticism, and the most influential sonnet cycle of the Elizabethan Age.*

The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia

Sidney wrote his epic romance in two forms which scholars have dubbed the Old Arcadia and the New Arcadia. Shortly after the Old Arcadia was completed, in five "books," Sidney began to recast and greatly expand it, but broke off in mid-sentence and left the revision unfinished. This revised fragment, almost three books, is known as the New Arcadia; it was published posthumously in 1590. In 1593 Sidney's sister, the countess of Pembroke, herself a gifted writer, made some small changes to the New Arcadia and the last two books of the Old, stitched them together, and published them as a single text. (The complete Old Arcadia, as Sidney had left it in manuscript, was not rediscovered and published until the twentieth century.) Both Sidney's original version and his revision are full of oracles, princes disguised as shepherd and amazon, mistaken identity, melodramatic incidents, and tangled love situations, but the New Arcadia has a much more labyrinthine, interwoven plot, as well as a more consistently elevated tone of moral and heroic high seriousness. Some episodes are of political interest, and Sidney clearly put into the work more of his serious thought on statecraft (the responsibilities of a king or queen, the evils of rebellion, and the duties of ministers, judges, and advisers of state) than his description of the Arcadia as mere entertainment suggests. Many poems—pastoral eclogues and songs—are interspersed throughout the narrative; they represent Sidney's experiments with diverse lyric kinds and verse forms.

Prior to the chapter reprinted below, Pyrocles, prince of Macedon, has fallen in love with Philoclea, daughter of Basilius and Gynecia, the king and queen of Arcadia. To gain entrance to the royal household, he has disguised himself as a woman, the amazon Zelmane. To his dismay, though, both Basilius and Gynecia (who sees through his disguise) have fallen in love with him.

Chapter 1

In these pastoral pastimes[1] a great number of days were sent to follow their flying predecessors, while the cup of poison[2] (which was deeply tasted of this noble company) had left no sinew of theirs without mortally searching into it; yet never manifesting his venomous work, till once that the night (parting away angry that she could distill no more sleep into the eyes of lovers) had no sooner given place to the breaking out of the morning light and the sun bestowed his beams upon the tops of the mountains, but that the woeful Gynecia (to whom rest was no ease) had left her loathed lodging and gotten herself into the solitary places those deserts[3] were full of, going up and down with such unquiet motions as a grieved and hopeless mind is wont to bring forth. There appeared unto the eyes of her judgment the evils she was like to run into, with ugly infamy waiting upon them: she felt the terrors of her own conscience; she was guilty of a long exercised virtue which made this vice the fuller of deformity. The uttermost of the good she could aspire unto was a mortal wound to her vexed spirits; and lastly, no small part of her evils was that she was wise to see her evils. Insomuch that, having a great while thrown her countenance ghastly about her (as if she had called all the powers of the world to be witness of her wretched estate), at length casting up her watery eyes to heaven:

"O sun," said she, "whose unspotted light directs the steps of mortal mankind, art thou not ashamed to impart the clearness of thy presence to such a dust-creeping worm as I am? O you heavens, which continually keep the course allotted unto you, can none of your influences prevail so much upon the miserable Gynecia as to make her preserve a course so long embraced by her? O deserts, deserts, how fit a guest am I for you, since my heart can people you with wild ravenous beasts, which in you are wanting! O virtue, where dost thou hide thyself? What hideous thing is this which doth eclipse thee? Or is it true that thou wert never but a vain name and no essential thing, which hast thus left thy professed servant when she had most need of thy lovely presence? O imperfect proportion of reason, which can too much foresee and too little prevent! Alas, alas," said she, "if there were but one hope for all my pains or but one excuse for all my faultiness! But wretch that I am, my torment is beyond all succor, and my evil-deserving doth exceed my evil fortune. For nothing else did my husband take this strange resolution to live so solitarily, for nothing else have the winds delivered this strange guest to my country, for nothing else have the destinies reserved my life to this time, but that only I, most wretched I, should become a plague to myself and a shame to womankind. Yet if my desire, how unjust soever it be, might take effect, though a thousand deaths followed it and every death were followed with a thousand shames, yet should not my sepulcher receive me without some contentment. But alas, though sure I am that Zelmane is such as can answer my love, yet as sure I am that this disguising must needs come for some foretaken conceit.[4] And then, wretched Gynecia, where canst thou find any small ground-plot for hope to dwell upon? No, no, it is Philoclea his heart is set upon; it is my daughter I have borne to supplant me. But if it be so, the life I have given thee, ungrateful Philoclea, I will sooner with these hands bereave thee of than my birth[5] shall glory she hath bereaved me of my desires. In shame there is no comfort but to be beyond all bounds of shame."

[1] The reference is to the elaborate entertainment, featuring a series of pastoral songs, that had concluded Book 1.

[2] I.e., love.

[3] Uninhabited regions. In consequence of an oracle, Basilius has taken the royal family to live in "a certain forest which he calleth his desert."

Having spoken thus, she began to make a piteous war with her fair hair, when she might hear not far from her an extremely doleful voice, but so suppressed with a kind of whispering note that she could not conceive the words distinctly. But as a lamentable tune is the sweetest music to a woeful mind, she drew thither near-away[6] in hope to find some companion of her misery; and as she paced on she was stopped with a number of trees so thickly placed together that she was afraid she should, with rushing through, stop the speech of the lamentable party which she was so desirous to understand. And therefore sitting her down as softly as she could (for she was now in distance to hear) she might first perceive a lute excellently well played upon, and then the same doleful voice accompanying it with these verses:

In vain, mine eyes, you labor to amend
With flowing tears your fault of hasty sight;
Since to my heart her shape you so did send,
That her I see, though you did lose your light.

In vain, my heart, now you with sight are burned,
With sighs you seek to cool your hot desire;
Since sighs, into mine inward furnace turned,
For bellows serve to kindle more the fire.

Reason in vain, now you have lost my heart,
My head you seek, as to your strongest fort;
Since there mine eyes have played so false a part,
That to your strength your foes have sure resort.
Then since in vain I find were all my strife,
To this strange death I vainly yield my life.

The ending of the song served but for a beginning of new plaints, as if the mind, oppressed with too heavy a burden of cares, was fain to discharge itself of all sides and, as it were, paint out the hideousness of the pain in all sorts of colors. For the woeful person (as if the lute had evil joined with the voice) threw it to the ground with suchlike words:

"Alas, poor lute, how much art thou deceived to think that in my miseries thou could'st ease my woes, as in my careless[7] times thou wast wont to please my fancies! The time is changed, my lute, the time is changed; and no more did my joyful mind then receive everything to a joyful consideration than my careful[8] mind now makes each thing taste like the bitter juice of care. The evil is inward, my lute, the evil is inward; which all thou dost doth serve but to make me think more freely of, and the more I think, the more cause I find of thinking, but less of hoping. And alas, what is then thy harmony but the sweetmeats of sorrow? The discord of my thoughts, my lute, doth ill agree to the concord of thy strings; therefore be not ashamed to leave thy master, since he is not afraid to forsake himself."

[4] With some prior purpose.

[5] Offspring.

[6] Near to it.

[7] Carefree.

And thus much spoken, instead of a conclusion was closed up with so hearty a groaning that Gynecia could not refrain to show herself, thinking such griefs could serve fitly for nothing but her own fortune. But as she came into the little arbor of this sorrowful music, her eyes met with the eyes of Zelmane, which was the party that thus had indicted herself of misery, so that either of them remained confused with a sudden astonishment, Zelmane fearing lest she had heard some part of those complaints which she had risen up that morning early of purpose to breathe out in secret to herself. But Gynecia a great while stood still with a kind of dull amazement, looking steadfastly upon her. At length returning to some use of herself, she began to ask Zelmane what cause carried her so early abroad. But, as if the opening of her mouth to Zelmane had opened some great floodgate of sorrow whereof her heart could not abide the violent issue, she sank to the ground with her hands over her face, crying vehemently, "Zelmane, help me, O Zelmane have pity on me!"

Zelmane ran to her, marveling what sudden sickness had thus possessed her; and beginning to ask her the cause of her pain and offering her service to be employed by her, Gynecia opening her eyes wildly upon her, pricked with the flames of love and the torments of her own conscience, "O Zelmane, Zelmane," said she, "dost thou offer me physic, which art my only poison? Or wilt thou do me service, which hast already brought me into eternal slavery?"

Zelmane then knowing well at what mark she shot, yet loth to enter into it, "Most excellent lady," said she, "you were best retire yourself into your lodging, that you the better may pass this sudden fit."

"Betire myself?" said Gynecia, "If I had retired myself into myself when thou (to me unfortunate guest) earnest to draw me from myself, blessed had I been, and no need had I had of this counsel. But now, alas, I am forced to fly to thee for succor whom I accuse of all my hurt, and make thee judge of my cause, who art the only author of my mischief."

Zelmane the more astonished, the more she understood her, "Madam," said she, "whereof do you accuse me that I will not clear myself? Or wherein may I stead[9] you that you may not command me?"

"Alas!" answered Gynecia, "What shall I say more? Take pity of me, O Zelmane, but not as Zelmane, and disguise not with me in words, as I know thou dost in apparel."

Zelmane was much troubled with that word, finding herself brought to this strait. But as she was thinking what to answer her, they might see old Basilius pass hard by them without ever seeing them, complaining likewise of love very freshly, and ending his complaint with this song, love having renewed both his invention and voice:

---

[8] Full of care.

[9] Be of use to.

Let not old age disgrace my high desire;
O heavenly soul in human shape contained:
Old wood inflamed doth yield the bravest fire,
When younger doth in smoke his virtue[1] spend,

Ne let white hairs which on my face do grow
Seem to your eyes of a disgraceful hue,
Since whiteness doth present the sweetest show,[2]
Which makes all eyes do homage unto you.

Old age is wise and full of constant truth;
Old age well stayed from ranging humor[3] lives;
Old age hath known whatever was in youth;
Old age o'ercome, the greater honor gives.
And to old age since you yourself aspire,
Let not old age disgrace my high desire,

Which being done, he looked very curiously upon himself, sometimes fetching a little skip as if he had said his strength had not yet forsaken him.

But Zelmane, having in this time gotten some leisure to think for an answer, looking upon Gynecia as if she thought she did her some wrong, "Madam," said she, "I am not acquainted with those words of disguising; neither is it the profession of an Amazon; neither are you a party with whom it is to be used. If my service may please you, employ it, so long as you do me no wrong in misjudging of me."

"Alas, Zelmane," said Gynecia, "I perceive you know full little how piercing the eyes are of a true lover. There is no one beam of those thoughts you have planted in me but is able to discern a greater cloud than you do go in. Seek not to conceal yourself further from me, nor force not the passion of love into violent extremities."

Now was Zelmane brought to an exigent,[4] when the king, turning his eyes that way through the trees, perceived his wife and mistress together; so that framing the most lovely[5] countenance he could, he came straightway towards them, and at the first word, thanking his wife for having entertained Zelmane, desired her she would now return into the lodge because he had certain matters of estate[6] to impart to the Lady Zelmane. The queen, being nothing troubled with jealousy in that point, obeyed the king's commandment, full of raging agonies, and determinately bent[7] that as she would seek all loving means to win Zelmane, so she would stir up terrible tragedies rather than fail of her intent. And so went she from them to the lodge-ward;[8] with such a battle in her thoughts and so deadly an overthrow given to her best resolutions that even her body (where the field was fought) was oppressed withal, making a languishing sickness wait upon the triumph of passion,[9] which the more it prevailed in her, the more it made her jealousy watchful both over her daughter and Zelmane, having ever one of them entrusted to her own eyes.[1]

But as soon as Basilius was rid of his wife's presence, falling down on his knees, "O lady," said he, "which hast only had the power to stir up again those flames which had so long lain dead in me, see in me the power of your beauty, which can make old age come to ask counsel of youth, and a prince unconquered to become a slave to a stranger. And when you see that power of yours, love that at least in me, since it is yours, although of me you see nothing to be loved."

"Worthy prince," answered Zelmane, taking him up from his kneeling, "both your manner and your speech are so strange unto me as I know not how to answer it better than with silence."

"If silence please you," said the king, "it shall never displease me, since my heart is wholly pledged to obey you. Otherwise, if you would vouchsafe mine ears such happiness as to hear you, they shall convey your words to such a mind which is with the humblest degree of reverence to receive them."

"I disdain not to speak to you, mighty prince," said Zelmane, "but I disdain to speak to any matter which may bring my honor into question."

And therewith, with a brave counterfeited scorn she departed from the king, leaving him not so sorry for his short answer as proud in himself that he had broken[2] the matter. And thus did the king, feeding his mind with those thoughts, pass great time in writing verses and making more of himself than he was wont to do, that, with a little help, he would have grown into a pretty kind of dotage.

But Zelmane, being rid of this loving but little loved company, "Alas," said she, "poor Pyrocles, was there ever one but I that had received wrong and could blame nobody, that having more than I desire, am still in want of that I would?[3] Truly, love, I must needs say thus much on thy behalf; thou hast employed my love there where all love is deserved, and for recompense hast sent me more love than ever I desired. But what wilt thou do, Pyrocles? Which way canst thou find to rid thee of thy intricate troubles? To her whom I would be known to, I live in darkness; and to her am revealed from whom I would be most secret. What shift[4] shall I find against the diligent love of Basilius? What shield against the violent passions of Gynecia? And if that be done, yet how am I the nearer to quench the fire that consumes me? Well, well, sweet Philoclea, my whole confidence must be builded in thy divine spirit, which cannot be ignorant of the cruel wound I have received by you."

The Defense of Poesy

In 1579 Sidney found himself the unwilling dedicatee of a small book entitled The School of Abuse. Its author, the playwright-turned-moralist Stephen Gosson, attacked poets and actors from a narrowly Puritan perspective that called into question the morality of any fiction-making. Sidney may have shared in the author's militant Protestantism, but he took a very different, more sympathetic and more complex view of the poet's art. He did not specifically answer Gosson's polemic, but he must have had it in mind when he composed, perhaps in the same year, a major piece of critical prose that was published after his death under two titles, The Defense of Poesy and An Apology for Poetry. Probably written in 1579 though not published until 1595, The Defense of Poesy is an eloquent argument for the dignity, social efficacy, and moral value of imaginative literature in verse or prose. Sidney responds to ancient charges against poetic fictions—charges of irresponsibility and unreality—that had been revived in his own time most strenuously by Puritan moralists. In a graceful, if strikingly paradoxical, rhetorical performance, the Defense argues both that the poet, liberated from the world, is free to range "within the zodiac of his own wit" and that poetry actively intervenes in the world and transforms it for the better. After a slyly self-deprecating introduction, Sidney points out the antiquity of poetry, its prestige in the biblical and classical worlds, and its universality; also, he cites the names given to poets—vates, or "prophet," by the Romans and poietes, or "maker," by the Greeks—as evidence of their ancient dignity. But he bases his defense essentially on the special status of the poetic imagination. While all arts, from astronomy to music to medicine, depend ultimately on nature as their object, poetry, he claims, is uniquely free: "Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature."

[2] Broached.

[3] Of the thing I desire.

[4] Evasion, stratagem.

This freedom, Sidney argues, enables the poet to present virtues and vices in a livelier and more affecting way than nature does, teaching, delighting, and moving the reader at the same time. The poet is superior to both the philosopher and the historian, because he is more concrete than the one and more universal than the other. The Defense also refutes Plato's charge that poets are liars by arguing that the poet "nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth," and it denies as well the Platonic claim that poetry arouses base desires. Tragedy, for example, "openeth the greatest wounds," in Sidney's account, "and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue," thereby making "kings fear to be tyrants." Surveying the English literary scene of his own century, Sidney finds little to praise except for Surrey's lyrics, the moralizing narratives of A Mirror for Magistrates, and Spenser's Shepheardes Calender; the drama he faults for "mingling kings and clowns" and for unrealistic distortions of time and space. (The great, sprawling plays of Marlowe and Shakespeare, plays that triumphantly violated many of Sidney's cherished principles, lay just ahead.) The Defense ends with a mock conjuration and a playful curse, reminders of the magical power of poetry, a power that lurks beneath both Sidney's idealism and his didacticism.

[THE LESSONS OF HORSEMANSHIP]

When the right virtuous Edward Wotton and I were at the Emperor's court together,[1] we gave ourselves to learn horsemanship of John Pietro Pugliano, one that with great commendation had the place of an esquire[2] in his stable. And he, according to the fertileness of the Italian wit, did not only afford us the demonstration of his practice but sought to enrich our minds with the contemplations therein which he thought most precious. But with none I remember mine ears were at any time more loaden, than when (either angered with slow payment, or moved with our learner-like admiration) he exercised his speech in the praise of his faculty.[3] He said soldiers were the noblest estate of mankind, and horsemen the noblest of soldiers. He said they were the masters of war and ornaments of peace, speedy goers and strong abiders, triumphers both in camps and courts. Nay, to so unbelieved a point he proceeded, as that no earthly thing bred such wonder to a prince as to be a good horseman. Skill of government was but a pedanteria[4] in comparison. Then would he add certain praises, by telling what a peerless beast the horse was, the only serviceable courtier without flattery, the beast of most beauty, faithfulness, courage, and such more, that if I had not been a piece of a logician[5] before I came to him I think he would have persuaded me to have wished myself a horse.[6] But thus much at least with his no few words he drave into me, that self-love is better than any gilding[7] to make that seem gorgeous wherein ourselves be parties. Wherein, if Pugliano's strong affection and weak arguments will not satisfy you, I will give you a nearer example of myself, who (I know not by what mischance) in these my not old years and idlest times having slipped into the title of a poet, am provoked to say something unto you in the defense of that my unelected vocation, which if I handle with more good will than good reasons, bear with me, since the scholar is to be pardoned that followeth the steps of his master.[8] And yet I must say that, as I have just cause to make a pitiful defense of poor poetry, which from almost the highest estimation of learning is fallen to be the laughingstock of children, so have I need to bring some more available[9] proofs; since the former is by no man barred of his deserved credit, the silly[1] latter hath had even the names of philosophers used to the defacing of it, with great danger of civil war among the Muses.

[THE POET, POETRY]

* * * Since the authors of most of our sciences[2] were the Romans, and before them the Greeks, let us a little stand upon their authorities, but even so far as to see what names they have given unto this now scorned skill.[3]

Among the Romans a poet was called vates, which is as much as a diviner, foreseer, or prophet, as by his conjoined words vaticinium and vaticinari[4] is manifest: so heavenly a title did that excellent people bestow upon this heart-ravishing knowledge. And so far were they carried into the admiration thereof, that they thought in the chanceable hitting upon any such verses great foretokens of their following fortunes were placed. Whereupon grew the word of Sortes Virgilianae,[5] when by sudden opening Virgil's book they lighted upon any verse of his making, whereof the histories of the emperors' lives are full: as of Albinus,[6] the governor of our island, who in his childhood met with this verse and in his age performed it. Which, although it were a very vain and godless superstition, as also it was to think spirits were commanded by such verses—whereupon this word charms, derived of carmina,[8] cometh—so yet serveth it to show the great reverence those wits were held in; and altogether not without ground, since both the oracles of Delphos and Sibylla's prophecies[9] were wholly delivered in verses. For that same exquisite observing of number and measure in the words, and that high flying liberty of conceit[1] proper to the poet, did seem to have some divine force in it.

Arma amens capio nec sat rationis in armis[7]

[7] Frantic, I take up arms, yet there is little purpose in arms (Aeneid 2.314).

[8] Songs, poems.

And may not I presume a little further, to show the reasonableness of this word vates, and say that the holy David's[2] Psalms are a divine poem? If I do, I shall not do it without the testimony of great learned men, both ancient and modern. But even the name of Psalms will speak for me, which being interpreted, is nothing but songs; then that it is fully written in meter, as all learned hebricians agree, although the rules be not yet fully found;[3] lastly and principally, his handling his prophecy, which is merely[4] poetical: for what else is the awaking his musical instruments, the often and free changing of persons, his notable prosopopoeias,[5] when he maketh you, as it were, see God coming in His majesty, his telling of the beasts' joyfulness and hills leaping, but a heavenly poesy, wherein almost[6] he showeth himself a passionate lover of that unspeakable and everlasting beauty to be seen by the eyes of the mind, only cleared by faith? But truly now having named him, I fear me I seem to profane that holy name, applying it to poetry, which is among us thrown down to so ridiculous an estimation. But they that with quiet judgments will look a little deeper into it, shall find the end and working of it such as, being rightly applied, deserveth not to be scourged out of the Church of God.

But now let us see how the Greeks named it, and how they deemed of it. The Greeks called him a "poet," which name hath, as the most excellent, gone through other languages. It cometh of this word poiein, which is, to make: wherein, I know not whether by luck or wisdom, we Englishmen have met with the Greeks in calling him a maker:[7] which name, how high and incomparable a title it is, I had rather were known by marking the scope of other sciences than by any partial[8] allegation.

There is no art delivered to mankind that hath not the works of nature for his principal object, without which they[9] could not consist, and on which they so depend, as they become actors and players, as it were, of what nature will have set forth. So doth the astronomer look upon the stars, and, by that he seeth, set down what order nature hath taken therein. So doth the geometrician and arithmetician in their diverse sorts of quantities. So doth the musicians in time tell you which by nature agree,[1] which not. The natural philosopher thereon hath his name, and the moral philosopher standeth upon[2] the natural virtues, vices, or passions of man; and follow nature (saith he) therein, and thou shalt not err. The lawyer saith what men have determined; the historian what men have done. The grammarian speaketh only of the rules of speech; and the rhetorician and logician, considering what in nature will soonest prove and persuade, thereon give artificial rules, which still are compassed within the circle of a question according to the proposed matter.[3] The physician weigheth[4] the nature of man's body, and the nature of things helpful or hurtful unto it. And the metaphysic, though it be in the second and abstract notions, and therefore be counted supernatural, yet doth he indeed build upon the depth of nature. Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature, in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature, as the Heroes, Demigods, Cyclops, Chimeras, Furies,[5] and such like: so as he goeth hand in hand with nature, not enclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging only within the zodiac of his own wit.[6] Nature never set forth the earth in so rich tapestry as divers poets have done; neither with so pleasant rivers, fruitful trees, sweet-smelling flowers, nor whatsoever else may make the too much loved earth more lovely. Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden.[7]

But let those things alone, and go to man—for whom as the other things are, so it seemeth in him her uttermost cunning is employed—and know whether she have brought forth so true a lover as Theagenes, so constant a friend as Pylades, so valiant a man as Orlando, so right a prince as Xenophon's Cyrus,[8] so excellent a man every way as Virgil's Aeneas. Neither let this be jestingly conceived, because the works of the one be essential, the other in imitation or fiction,[9] for any understanding knoweth the skill of each artificer standeth in that idea or fore-conceit[1] of the work, and not in the work itself. And that the poet hath that idea is manifest, by delivering them forth in such excellency as he had imagined them. Which delivering forth also is not wholly imaginative, as we are wont[2] to say by them that build castles in the air; but so far substantially it worketh, not only to make a Cyrus, which had been but a particular excellency as nature might have done, but to bestow a Cyrus upon the world to make many Cyruses, if they will learn aright why and how that maker made him.

Neither let it be deemed too saucy a comparison to balance the highest point of man's wit with the efficacy of nature; but rather give right honor to the heavenly Maker of that maker, who having made man to His own likeness, set him beyond and over all the works of that second nature:[3] which in nothing he showeth so much as in poetry, when with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth surpassing her doings—with no small arguments to the credulous of that first accursed fall of Adam, since our erected wit maketh us know what perfection is, and yet our infected will[4] keepeth us from reaching unto it. But these arguments will by few be understood, and by fewer granted.

This much (I hope) will be given me, that the Greeks with some probability of reason gave him the name above all names of learning.

Now let us go to a more ordinary opening[5] of him, that the truth may be the more palpable: and so I hope, though we get not so unmatched a praise as the etymology of his names will grant, yet his very description, which no man will deny, shall not justly be barred from a principal commendation.

Poesy therefore is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle termeth it in the word mimesis[6]—that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth—to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight.[7]

[THREE KINDS OF POETS]

Of this have been three general kinds. The chief, both in antiquity and excellency, were they that did imitate the unconceivable excellencies of God. Such were David in his Psalms; Solomon in his Song of Songs, in his Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs; Moses and Deborah in their Hymns; and the writer of Job: which, beside other, the learned Emanuel Tremellius and Franciscus Junius[8] do entitle the poetical part of the Scripture. Against these none will speak that hath the Holy Ghost in due holy reverence. (In this kind, though in a full wrong divinity, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his Hymns, and many other, both Greeks and Romans.) And this poesy must be used by whosoever will follow St. James's counsel in singing psalms when they are merry,[9] and I know is used with the fruit of comfort by some, when, in sorrowful pangs of their death-bringing sins, they find the consolation of the never-leaving goodness.

The second kind is of them that deal with matters philosophical, either moral, as Tyrtaeus, Phocylides, Cato,[1] or natural, as Lucretius and Virgil's Georgics; or astronomical, as Manilius and Pontanus; or historical, as Lucan:[2] which who mislike, the fault is in their judgment quite out of taste, and not in the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge.

But because this second sort is wrapped within the fold of the proposed subject, and takes not the course of his own invention, whether they properly be poets or no let grammarians dispute, and go to the third, indeed right[3] poets, of whom chiefly this question ariseth: betwixt whom and these second is such a kind of difference as betwixt the meaner[4] sort of painters, who counterfeit only such faces as are set before them, and the more excellent, who having no law but wit, bestow that in colors upon you which is fittest for the eye to see: as the constant though lamenting look of Lucretia, when she punished in herself another's fault,[5] wherein he painteth not Lucretia whom he never saw, but painteth the outward beauty of such a virtue. For these third[6] be they which most properly do imitate to teach and delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be; but range, only reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be. These be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates, so these are waited on in the excellentest languages and best understandings with the fore-described name of poets. For these indeed do merely[7] make to imitate, and imitate both to delight and teach; and delight, to move men to take that goodness in hand, which without delight they would fly as from a stranger; and teach, to make them know that goodness whereunto they are moved—which being the noblest scope to which ever any learning was directed, yet want there not idle tongues to bark at them.

[5] Analysis or explanation.

[6] Poetics 1.2.

[7] The primary authorities for the commonplace notions that a poem is a "speaking picture" and that the end of poetry is "to teach and delight" are, respectively, Plutarch (ca. 46—ca. 120 C.E.), Hoiv to Study Poetry, 17-18, and Horace (65—8 B.C.E.), Art of Poetry, 343.

[8] Two scholars who published a Protestant Latin translation of the Bible in 1579. "Moses and Deborah in their Hymns": see Exodus 15.1—18, Deuteronomy 32.1-43; Judges 5.1—31.

[9] "Is anv merry? Let him sing psalms" (James 5.13).

[1] The Roman Marcus Cato was the author of Disticha de moribus, an immensely popular collection, in verse and prose, of moral maxims. Tyrtaeus and Phocylides were Greek poets.

[2] Lucan wrote De hello civili (Pharsalia), an epic poem on the struggle between Caesar and Pompey. Lucretius wrote a philosophical poem De rerum natura (On the Nature of Things). Virgil's Georgics exalts the life and work of the farmer.

[3] Justly entitled to the name.

[4] Lower.

[5] A notable exemplar of chastity and honor, the Roman matron Lucretia committed suicide after being raped by the son of King Tarquinius Superbus. "Wit": creative imagination.

[6] I.e., the right poets.

These be subdivided into sundry more special denominations. The most notable be the heroic,[8] lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral, and certain others, some of these being termed according to the matter they deal with, some by the sorts of verses they liked best to write in; for indeed the greatest part of poets have appareled their poetical inventions in that numbrous[9] kind of writing which is called verse—indeed but appareled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon, who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem histi imperii, the portraiture of a just empire, under the name of Cyrus (as Cicero saith of him), made therein an absolute heroical poem. So did Heliodorus in his sugared invention of that picture of love in Theagenes and Chariclea; and yet both these wrote in prose: which I speak to show that it is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet—no more than a long gown maketh an advocate,[1] who though he pleaded in armor should be an advocate and no soldier. But it is that feigning notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note to know a poet by; although indeed the senate of poets hath chosen verse as their fittest raiment, meaning, as in matter they passed all in all,[2] so in manner to go beyond them: not speaking (table-talk fashion or like men in a dream) words as they chanceably fall from the mouth, but peising[3] each syllable of each word by just proportion according to the dignity of the subject.

[POETRY, PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY]

Now therefore it shall not be amiss first to weigh this latter sort of poetry by his works, and then by his parts; and if in neither of these anatomies he be condemnable, I hope we shall obtain a more favorable sentence.[4]

This purifying of wit—this enriching of memory, enabling of judgment, and enlarging of conceit[5]—which commonly we call learning, under what name soever it come forth, or to what immediate end soever it be directed, the final end is to lead and draw us to as high a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clayey lodgings, can be capable of.

This, according to the inclination of the man, bred many-formed[6] impressions. For some that thought this felicity principally to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be so high or heavenly as acquaintance with the stars, gave themselves to astronomy; others, persuading themselves to be demigods if they knew the causes of things, became natural and supernatural philosophers; some an admirable delight drew to music; and some the certainty of demonstration to the mathematics. But all, one and other, having this scope:[7] to know, and by knowledge to lift up the mind from the dungeon of the body to the enjoying his own divine essence.

But when by the balance of experience it was found that the astronomer, looking to the stars, might fall in a ditch, that the inquiring philosopher might be blind in himself, and the mathematician might draw forth a straight line with a crooked heart, then lo, did proof, the overruler of opinions, make manifest that all these are but serving sciences, which, as they have each a private end in themselves, so yet are they all directed to the highest end of the mistress-knowledge, by the Greeks called architectonike,[8] which stands (as I think) in the knowledge of a man's self, in the ethic and politic consideration, with the end of well-doing and not of well-knowing only—even as the saddler's next[9] end is to make a good saddle, but his further end to serve a nobler faculty, which is horsemanship, so the horseman's to soldiery, and the soldier not only to have the skill, but to perform the practice of a soldier. So that, the ending end of all earthly learning being virtuous action, those skills that most serve to bring forth that have a most just title to be princes over all the rest.

Wherein, if we can, show we the poet's nobleness, by setting him before his other competitors. Among whom as principal challengers step forth the moral philosophers, whom, methinketh, I see coming towards me with a sullen gravity, as though they could not abide vice by daylight, rudely clothed for to witness outwardly their contempt of outward things, with books in their hands against glory, whereto they set their names, sophistically[1] speaking against subtlety, and angry with any man in whom they see the foul fault of anger. These men casting largess as they go, of definitions, divisions, and distinctions,[2] with a scornful interrogative do soberly ask whether it be possible to find any path so ready to lead a man to virtue as that which teacheth what virtue is; and teach it not only by delivering forth his very being, his causes and effects, but also by making known his enemy, vice, which must be destroyed, and his cumbersome servant, passion, which must be mastered; by showing the generalities that containeth it, and the specialities that are derived from it; lastly, by plain setting down how it extendeth itself out of the limits of a man's own little world to the government of families and maintaining of public societies.

The historian scarcely giveth leisure to the moralist to say so much, but that he, laden with old mouse-eaten records, authorizing himself[3] (for the most part) upon other histories, whose greatest authorities are built upon the notable foundation of hearsay; having much ado to accord differing writers and to pick truth out of their partiality;[4] better acquainted with a thousand years ago than with the present age, and yet better knowing how this world goeth than how his own wit runneth; curious for antiquities and inquisitive of novelties; a wonder to young folks and a tyrant in table talk, denieth, in a great chafe,[5] that any man for teaching of virtue, and virtuous actions, is comparable to him. "I am testis temporum, lux veritatis, vita memoriae, magistra vitae, nuntia vetustatis.[6] "The philosopher," saith he, "teacheth a disputative virtue, but I do an active. His virtue is excellent in the dangerless Academy of Plato, but mine showeth forth her honorable face in the battles of Marathon, Pharsalia, Poitiers, and Agincourt.[7] He teacheth virtue by certain abstract considerations, but I only bid you follow the footing of them that have gone before you. Old-aged experience goeth beyond the fine-witted philosopher, but I give the experience of many ages. Lastly, if he make the songbook, I put the learner's hand to the lute; and if he be the guide, I am the light." Then would he allege you innumerable examples, confirming story by stories, how much the wisest senators and princes have been directed by the credit of history, as Brutus, Alphonsus of Aragon,[8] and who not, if need be? At length the long line of their disputation maketh a point in this, that the one giveth the precept, and the other[9] the example.

Now, to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of history, in respect of the notable learning is got by marking the success,[1] as though therein a man should see virtue exalted and vice punished—truly that commendation is particular to poetry, and far off from history. For indeed poetry ever sets virtue so out in her best colors, making Fortune her well-waiting handmaid, that one must needs be enamored of her. Well may you see Ulysses in a storm,[2] and in other hard plights; but they are but exercises of patience and magnanimity, to make them shine the more in the near-following prosperity. And of the contrary part, if evil men come to the stage, they ever go out (as the tragedy writer[3] answered to one that misliked the show of such persons) so manacled as they little animate folks to follow them. But the history, being captived to the truth of a foolish world, is many times a terror from well-doing, and an encouragement to unbridled wickedness. For see we not valiant Miltiades rot in his fetters? The just Phocion and the accomplished Socrates put to death like traitors? The cruel Severus live prosperously? The excellent Severus miserably murdered? Sulla and Marius dying in their beds? Pompey and Cicero[4] slain then when they would have thought exile a happiness? See we not virtuous Cato driven to kill himself,[5] and rebel Caesar so advanced that his name yet, after 1600 years, lasteth in the highest honor? And mark but even Caesar's own words of the aforenamed Sulla (who in that only did honestly, to put down his dishonest tyranny), literas nescivit, as if want of learning caused him to do well.[6] He meant it not by poetry, which, not content with earthly plagues, deviseth new punishments in hell for tyrants, nor yet by philosophy, which teacheth occidendos esse;[7] but no doubt by skill in history, for that indeed can afford you Cypselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionysius,[8] and I know not how many more of the same kennel, that speed[9] well enough in their abominable injustice of usurpation.

I conclude, therefore, that he[1] excelleth history, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserveth to be called and accounted good: which setting forward, and moving to well-doing, indeed setteth the laurel crown upon the poets as victorious, not only of the historian, but over the philosopher, howsoever in teaching it may be questionable.[2]

For suppose it be granted (that which I suppose with great reason may be denied) that the philosopher, in respect of his methodical proceeding, doth teach more perfectly than the poet, yet do I think that no man is so much philophilosophos[3] as to compare the philosopher in moving with the poet. And that moving is of a higher degree than teaching, it may by this appear, that it is well nigh both the cause and effect of teaching. For who will be taught, if he be not moved with desire to be taught? And what so much good doth that teaching bring forth (I speak still of moral doctrine) as that it moveth one to do that which it doth teach? For, as Aristotle saith, it is not gnosis but praxis[4] must be the fruit. And how praxis can be, without being moved to practice, it is no hard matter to consider.

The philosopher showeth you the way, he informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousness of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by-turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive studious painfulness;[5] which constant desire whosoever hath in him, hath already passed half the hardness of the way, and therefore is beholding to the philosopher but for the other half. Nay truly, learned men have learnedly thought that where once reason hath so much overmastered passion as that the mind hath a free desire to do well, the inward light each mind hath in itself is as good as a philosopher's book; since in nature[6] we know it is well to do well, and what is well, and what is evil, although not in the words of art which philosophers bestow upon us; for out of natural conceit[7] the philosophers drew it. But to be moved to do that which we know, or to be moved with desire to know, hoc opus, hie labor est.[8]

Now therein of all sciences (I speak still of human,[9] and according to the human conceit) is our poet the monarch. For he doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth, as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of that taste, you may long to pass further. He heginneth not with obscure definitions, which must blur the margin with interpretations, and load the memory with doubtfulness; but he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner. And, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue—even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste, which, if one should begin to tell them the nature of aloes or rhabarbarum[1] they should receive, would sooner take their physic at their ears than at their mouth.[2] So is it in men (most of which are childish in the best things, till they be cradled in their graves): glad will they be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas; and, hearing them, must needs hear the right description of wisdom, valor, and justice; which, if they had been barely, that is to say philosophically, set out, they would swear they be brought to school again.

[THE POETIC KINDS]

But I am content not only to decipher him[3] by his works (although works, in commendation or dispraise, must ever hold a high authority), but more narrowly will examine his parts; so that (as in a man) though all together may carry a presence full of majesty and beauty, perchance in some one defectous piece[4] we may find blemish.

Now in his parts, kinds, or species (as you list[5] to term them), it is to be noted that some poesies have coupled together two or three kinds, as the tragical and comical, whereupon is risen the tragi-comical. Some, in the manner, have mingled prose and verse, as Sannazzaro and Boethius.[6] Some have mingled matters heroical and pastoral. But that cometh all to one in this question, for, if severed they be good, the conjunction cannot be hurtful. Therefore, perchance forgetting some and leaving some as needless to be remembered, it shall not be amiss in a word to cite the special kinds, to see what faults may be found in the right use of them.

Is it then the Pastoral poem which is misliked? (For perchance where the hedge is lowest[7] they will soonest leap over.) Is the poor pipe[8] disdained, which sometime out of Meliboeus' mouth can show the misery of people under hard lords or ravening soldiers, and again, by Tityrus, what blessedness is derived to them that lie lowest from the goodness of them that sit highest;[9] sometimes, under the pretty tales of wolves and sheep, can include the whole considerations of wrong-doing and patience; sometimes show that contentions for trifles can get but a trifling victory: where perchance a man may see that even Alexander and Darius, when they strave who should be cock of this world's dunghill, the benefit they got was that the after-livers may say

Or is it the lamenting Elegiac; which in a kind heart would move rather pity than blame; who bewails with the great philosopher Heraclitus[2] the weakness of mankind and the wretchedness of the world; who surely is to be praised, either for compassionate accompanying just causes of lamentations, or for rightly painting out how weak be the passions of woefulness?[3] Is it the bitter but wholesome Iambic,[4] who rubs the galled mind, in making shame the trumpet of villainy, with bold and open crying out against naughtiness? Or the Satiric, who

> Omne vafer vitium ridenti tangit amico;[5]

who sportingly never leaveth till he make a man laugh at folly, and at length ashamed, to laugh at himself, which he cannot avoid without avoiding the folly; who, while

> Est Ulubris, animus si nos non deficit aequus?[7]

No, perchance it is the Comic, whom naughty play-makers and stage-keepers have justly made odious. To the arguments of abuse I will answer after. Only this much now is to be said, that the comedy is an imitation of the common errors of our life, which he representeth in the most ridiculous and scornful sort that may be, so as it is impossible that any beholder can be content to be such a one. Now, as in geometry the oblique must be known as well as the right, and in arithmetic the odd as well as the even, so in the actions of our life who seeth not the filthiness of evil wanteth[8] a great foil to perceive the beauty of virtue. This doth the comedy handle so in our private and domestical matters as with hearing it we get as it were an experience what is to be looked for of a niggardly Demea, of a crafty Davus, of a flattering Gnatho, of a vainglorious Thraso;[9] and not only to know what effects are to be expected, but to know who be such, by the signifying badge given them by the comedian.[1] And little reason hath any man to say that men learn the evil by seeing it so set out, since, as I said before, there is no man living but, by the force truth hath in nature, no sooner seeth these men play their parts, but wisheth them in pistrinum;[2] although perchance the sack of his own faults lie so hidden behind his back that he seeth not himself dance the same measure;[3] whereto yet nothing can more open his eyes than to find his own actions contemptibly set forth.

So that the right use of comedy will (I think) by nobody be blamed; and much less of the high and excellent Tragedy, that openeth the greatest wounds, and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue; that maketh kings fear to be tyrants, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humors; that, with stirring the affects[4] of admiration and commiseration, teacheth the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilden roofs are builded; that maketh us know

Qui sceptra saevus duro imperio regit
Timet timentes; metus in auctorem redit.[5]

But how much it can move, Plutarch yieldeth a notable testimony of the abominable tyrant Alexander Pheraeus,[6] from whose eyes a tragedy, well made and represented, drew abundance of tears, who without all pity had murdered infinite numbers, and some of his own blood: so as he, that was not ashamed to make matters for tragedies, yet could not resist the sweet violence of a tragedy. And if it wrought no further good in him, it was that he, in despite of himself, withdrew himself from hearkening to that which might mollify his hardened heart. But it is not the tragedy they do mislike; for it were too absurd to cast out so excellent a representation of whatsoever is most worthy to be learned.

Is it the Lyric[7] that most displeaseth, who with his tuned lyre and well-accorded voice giveth praise, the reward of virtue, to virtuous acts; who gives moral precepts, and natural problems; who sometimes raiseth up his voice to the height of the heavens, in singing the lauds of the immortal God? Certainly, I must confess my own barbarousness, I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas[8] that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet; and yet is it sung but by some blind crowder,[9] with no rougher voice than rude style; which, being so evil appareled in the dust and cobwebs of that uncivil age, what would it work trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindar?[1] In Hungary I have seen it the manner at all feasts, and other such meetings, to have songs of their ancestors' valor, which that right soldierlike nation think one of the chiefest kindlers of brave courage. The incomparable Lacedemonians[2] did not only carry that kind of music ever with them to the field, but even at home, as such songs were made, so were they all content to be singers of them—when the lusty men were to tell what they did, the old men what they had done, and the young what they would do. And where a man may say that Pindar many times praiseth highly victories of small moment, matters rather of sport than virtue; as it may be answered, it was the fault of the poet, and not of the poetry, so indeed the chief fault was in the time and custom of the Greeks, who set those toys at so high a price that Philip of Macedon reckoned a horserace won at Olympus among his three fearful felicities.[3] But as the unimitable Pindar often did, so is that kind most capable and most fit to awake the thoughts from the sleep of idleness to embrace honorable enterprises.

There rests the Heroical[4]—whose very name (I think) should daunt all backbiters: for by what conceit[5] can a tongue be directed to speak evil of that which draweth with him no less champions than Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas, Turnus, Tydeus, and Rinaldo?[6]—who doth not only teach and move to a truth, but teacheth and moveth to the most high and excellent truth; who maketh magnanimity and justice shine through all misty tearfulness and foggy desires; who, if the saying of Plato and Tully[7] be true, that who could see virtue would be wonderfully ravished with the love of her beauty—this man sets her out to make her more lovely in her holiday apparel, to the eye of any that will deign not to disdain until they understand. But if anything be already said in the defense of sweet poetry, all concurreth to the maintaining the heroical, which is not only a kind, but the best and most accomplished kind of poetry. For, as the image of each action stirreth and instructeth the mind, so the lofty image of such worthies most inflameth the mind with desire to be worthy, and informs with counsel how to be worthy. Only let Aeneas be worn in the tablet of your memory, how he governeth himself in the ruin of his country; in the preserving his old father, and carrying away his religious ceremonies;[8] in obeying God's commandment to leave Dido, though not only all passionate kindness, but even the human consideration of virtuous gratefulness, would have craved other of him; how in storms, how in sports, how in war, how in peace, how a fugitive, how victorious, how besieged, how besieging, how to strangers, how to allies, how to enemies, how to his own; lastly, how in his inward self, and how in his outward government—and I think, in a mind not prejudiced with a prejudicating humor, he will be found in excellency fruitful, yea, even as Horace saith, melius Chrysippo et Crantore.[9]

But truly I imagine it falleth out with these poet-whippers, as with some good women, who often are sick, but in faith they cannot tell where; so the name of poetry is odious to them, but neither his cause nor effects, neither the sum that contains him, nor the particularities descending from him, give any fast[1] handle to their carping dispraise.

Since then poetry is of all human learning the most ancient and of most fatherly antiquity, as from whence other learnings have taken their beginnings; since it is so universal that no learned nation doth despise it, nor barbarous nation is without it; since both Roman and Greek gave such divine names unto it, the one of prophesying, the other of making, and that indeed that name of making is fit for him, considering that where all other arts retain themselves within their subject, and receive, as it were, their being from it, the poet only bringeth his own stuff, and doth not learn a conceit out of a matter, but maketh matter for a conceit; since neither his description nor end containing any evil, the thing described cannot be evil; since his effects be so good as to teach goodness and to delight the learners; since therein (namely in moral doctrine, the chief of all knowledges) he doth not only far pass the historian, but, for instructing, is well nigh comparable to the philosopher, for moving leaves him behind him; since the Holy Scripture (wherein there is no uncleanness) hath whole parts in it poetical, and that even our Savior Christ vouchsafed to use the flowers of it; since all his kinds are not only in their united forms but in their severed dissections fully commendable; I think (and think I think rightly) the laurel crown appointed for triumphant captains doth worthily (of all other learnings) honor the poet's triumph.

[ANSWERS TO CHARGES AGAINST POETRY]

Now then go we to the most important imputations laid to the poor poets. For aught I can yet learn, they are these. First, that there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them than in this. Secondly, that it is the mother of lies. Thirdly, that it is the nurse of abuse, infecting us with many pestilent desires; with a siren's sweetness drawing the mind to the serpent's tail of sinful fancies (and herein, especially, comedies give the largest field to ear,[2] as Chaucer saith); how, both in other nations and in ours, before poets did soften us, we were full of courage, given to martial exercises, the pillars of manlike liberty, and not lulled asleep in shady idleness with poets' pastimes. And lastly, and chiefly, they cry out with open mouth as if they had overshot Robin Hood, that Plato banished them out of his commonwealth.[3] Truly, this is much, if there be much truth in it.

First, to the first.[4] That a man might better spend his time, is a reason indeed; but it doth (as they say) but petere principium.[5] For if it be as I affirm, that no learning is so good as that which teacheth and moveth to virtue; and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poetry: then is the conclusion manifest that ink and paper cannot be to a more profitable purpose employed. And certainly, though a man should grant their first assumption, it should follow (methinks) very unwillingly, that good is not good because better is better. But I still and utterly deny that there is sprung out of earth a more fruitful knowledge.

To the second, therefore, that they should be the principal liars, I will answer paradoxically, but truly, I think truly, that of all writers under the sun the poet is the least liar, and, though he would, as a poet can scarcely be a liar. The astronomer, with his cousin the geometrician, can hardly escape,[6] when they take upon them to measure the height of the stars. How often, think you, do the physicians lie, when they aver things good for sicknesses, which afterwards send Charon[7] a great number of souls drowned in a potion before they come to his ferry? And no less of the rest, which take upon them to affirm. Now, for the poet, he nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth. For, as I take it, to lie is to affirm that to be true which is false. So as the other artists,[8] and especially the historian, affirming many things, can, in the cloudy knowledge of mankind, hardly escape from many lies. But the poet (as I said before) never affirmeth. The poet never maketh any circles[9] about your imagination, to conjure you to believe for true what he writes. He citeth not authorities of other histories, but even for his entry[1] calleth the sweet Muses to inspire into him a good invention; in truth, not laboring to tell you what is or is not, but what should or should not be. And therefore, though he recount things not true, yet because he telleth them not for true, he lieth not—without we will say that Nathan lied in his speech before-alleged to David;[2] which as a wicked man durst scarce say, so think I none so simple would say that Aesop lied in the tales of his beasts; for who thinks that Aesop wrote it for actually true were well worthy to have his name chronicled among the beasts he writeth of. What child is there, that, coming to a play, and seeing Thebes written in great letters upon an old door, doth believe that it is Thebes? If then a man can arrive to that child's age to know that the poets' persons and doings are but pictures what should be, and not stories what have been, they will never give the lie to[3] things not affirmatively but allegorically and figuratively written.

So that, since the excellencies of it may be so easily and so justly confirmed, and the low-creeping objections so soon trodden down: it not being an art of lies, but of true doctrine; not of effeminateness, but of notable stirring of courage; not of abusing man's wit, but of strengthening man's wit; not banished, but honored by Plato:[4] let us rather plant more laurels for to engarland the poets' heads (which honor of being laureate, whereas besides them only triumphant captains were, is a sufficient authority to show the price they ought to be held in) than suffer the ill-favored breath of such wrong-speakers once to blow upon the clear springs of poesy.

[POETRY IN ENGLAND]

But since I have run so long a career[5] in this matter, methinks, before I give my pen a full stop, it shall be but a little more lost time to inquire why England, the mother of excellent minds, should be grown so hard a stepmother to poets, who certainly in wit ought to pass all other, since all only proceedeth from their wit, being indeed makers of themselves, not takers of others.

wanting estimation is want of desert—taking upon us to be poets in despite of Pallas.[6]

Now, wherein we want desert were a thankworthy labor to express; but if I knew, I should have mended myself. But I, as I never desired the title, so have I neglected the means to come by it. Only, overmastered by some thoughts, I yielded an inky tribute unto them. Marry, they that delight in poesy itself should seek to know what they do, and how they do; and especially look themselves in an unflattering glass of reason, if they be inclinable unto it. For poesy must not be drawn by the ears; it must be gently led, or rather it must lead—which was partly the cause that made the ancient-learned affirm it was a divine gift, and no human skill: since all other knowledges lie ready for any that hath strength of wit. A poet no industry can make, if his own genius be not carried into it; and therefore it is an old proverb, orator fit, poeta nascitur.[7]

Yet confess I always that as the fertilest ground must be manured,[8] so must the highest-flying wit have a Daedalus[9] to guide him. That Daedalus, they say, both in this and in other, hath three wings to bear itself up into the air of due commendation: that is, art, imitation, and exercise. But these, neither artificial rules nor imitative patterns, we much cumber ourselves withal. Exercise indeed we do, but that very forebackwardly: for where we should exercise to know, we exercise as having known; and so is our brain delivered of much matter which never was begotten by knowledge. For there being two principal parts, matter to be expressed by words and words to express the matter, in neither we use art or imitation rightly. Our matter is quodlibet indeed, though wrongly performing Ovid's verse, never marshaling it into any assured rank, that almost the readers cannot tell where to find themselves.

Quicquid conabor dicere, versus erit;[1]

Chaucer, undoubtedly, did excellently in his Troilus and Criseyde; of whom, truly, I know not whether to marvel more, either that he in that misty time could see so clearly, or that we in this clear age go so stumblingly after him. Yet had he great wants,[2] fit to be forgiven in so reverent an antiquity. I account the Mirror of Magistrates[3] meetly furnished of beautiful parts, and in the Earl of Surrey's lyrics many things tasting of a noble birth, and worthy of a noble mind. The Shepherds' Calendar[4] hath much poetry in his eclogues, indeed worthy the reading, if I be not deceived. (That same framing of his style to an old rustic language I dare not allow, since neither Theocritus in Greek, Virgil in Latin, nor Sannazzaro in Italian did affect it.[5]) Besides these I do not remember to have seen but few (to speak boldly) printed that have poetical sinews in them; for proof whereof, let but most of the verses be put in prose, and then ask the meaning, and it will be found that one verse did but beget another, without ordering at the first what should be at the last; which becomes a confused mass of words, with a tingling sound of rhyme, barely accompanied with reason.

[2] Deficiencies.

[3] The Mirror for Magistrates, a large collection of Elizabethan poems on the downfall of princes and other notables.

[4] Spenser's first major work (1579), a set of pastoral poems ("eclogues") dedicated to Sidney.

[5] That is, none of the great models for pastoral poetry offered a precedent for Spenser's archaic diction.

Our tragedies and comedies (not without cause cried out against), observing rules neither of honest civility nor skillful poetry—excepting Gorboduc[6] (again, I say, of those that I have seen), which notwithstanding as it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca's style,[7] and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of poesy, yet in truth it is very defectuous in the circumstances, which grieveth me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions. For where the stage should always represent but one place, and the uttermost time presupposed in it should be, both by Aristotle's precept and common reason, but one day, there is both many days, and many places, inartificially[8] imagined.

But if it be so in Gorboduc, how much more in all the rest, where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Afric of the other, and so many other underkingdoms, that the player, when he cometh in, must ever begin with telling where he is, or else the tale will not be conceived? Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers: and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place: and then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock. Upon the back of that comes out a hideous monster with fire and smoke: and then the miserable beholders are bound to take it for a cave. While in the meantime two armies fly in, represented with four swords and bucklers: and then what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field?[9]

Now, of time they are much more liberal: for ordinary it is that two young princes fall in love; after many traverses,[1] she is got with child, delivered of a fair boy; he is lost, groweth a man, falls in love, and is ready to get another child; and all this in two hours' space: which, how absurd it is in sense, even sense may imagine, and art hath taught, and all ancient examples justified—and at this day, the ordinary players in Italy will not err in. Yet will some bring in an example of Eunuchus in Terence, that containeth matter of two days,[2] yet far short of twenty years. True it is, and so was it to be played in two days, and so fitted to the time it set forth. And though Plautus have in one place done amiss,[3] let us hit with him, and not miss with him.

But they will say: How then shall we set forth a story which containeth both many places and many times? And do they not know that a tragedy is tied to the laws of poesy, and not of history; not bound to follow the story, but having liberty either to feign a quite new matter or to frame the history to the most tragical conveniency? Again, many things may be told which cannot be showed, if they know the difference betwixt reporting and representing. As, for example, I may speak (though I am here) of Peru, and in speech digress from that to the description of Calicut; but in action I cannot represent it without Pacolet's horse;[4] and so was the manner the ancients took, by some Nuntius[5] to recount things done in former time or other place. Lastly, if they will represent a history, they must not (as Horace saith) begin ab ovo;[6] but they must come to the principal point of that one action which they will represent.

[7] The highly declamatory and relentlessly moralizing Roman tragedies of Seneca (5 B.C.E.—65 C.E.) were models of the grand tragic style in the Renaissance.

[8] Unskillfully. Sidney here voices the Renaissance commonplace (erroneously derived from Aristotle's Poetics) that tragedies should observe the "three unities": of time (one day), place (one locale), and action (one plot). Aristotle insisted only on unity of action.

[9] Battle. "Bucklers": shields.

[1] Difficulties, mishaps.

[2] In point of fact, the action of Terence's Eunuch takes place in a single day. Sidney is probably confusing it with another of Terence's plays, The Self-tormentor.

[3] Plautus's Captives violates the unity of time.

By example this will be best expressed. I have a story of young Polydorus,[7] delivered for safety's sake, with great riches, by his father Priam to Polymnestor, king of Thrace, in the Trojan war time; he, after some years, hearing the overthrow of Priam, for to make the treasure his own, murdereth the child; the body of the child is taken up by Hecuba;[8] she, the same day, findeth a sleight[9] to be revenged most cruelly of the tyrant. Where now would one of our tragedy writers begin, but with the delivery of the child? Then should he sail over into Thrace, and so spend I know not how many years, and travel numbers of places. But where doth Euripides? Even with the finding of the body, leaving the rest to be told by the spirit of Polydorus. This need no further to be enlarged; the dullest wit may conceive it.

But besides these gross absurdities, how all their plays be neither right tragedies nor right comedies, mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders to play a part in majestical matters with neither decency nor discretion,[1] so as neither the admiration and commiseration, nor the right sportfulness,[2] is by their mongrel tragi-comedy obtained. I know Apuleius[3] did somewhat so, but that is a thing recounted with space of time, not represented in one moment; and I know the ancients have one or two examples of tragi-comedies, as Plautus hath Amphitruo;[4] but, if we mark them well, we shall find that they never, or very daintily, match hornpipes[5] and funerals. So falleth it out that, having indeed no right comedy, in that comical part of our tragedy, we have nothing but scurrility, unworthy of any chaste ears, or some extreme show of doltishness, indeed fit to lift up a loud laughter, and nothing else: where the whole tract of a comedy should be full of delight, as the tragedy should be still maintained in a well-raised admiration.

But our comedians think there is no delight without laughter; which is very wrong, for though laughter may come with delight, yet cometh it not of delight, as though delight should be the cause of laughter; but well may one thing breed both together. Nay, rather in themselves they have, as it were, a kind of contrariety: for delight we scarcely do but in things that have a conveniency[6] to ourselves or to the general nature; laughter almost ever cometh of things most disproportioned to ourselves and nature. Delight hath a joy in it, either permanent or present. Laughter hath only a scornful tickling.

For example, we are ravished with delight to see a fair woman, and yet are far from being moved to laughter; we laugh at deformed creatures, wherein certainly we cannot delight. We delight in good chances, we laugh at mischances: we delight to hear the happiness of our friends, or country, at which he were worthy to be laughed at that would laugh; we shall, contrarily, laugh sometimes to find a matter quite mistaken and go down the hill against the bias[7] in the mouth of some such men—as for the respect of them one shall be heartily sorry, he cannot choose but laugh, and so is rather pained than delighted with laughter.

Yet deny I not but that they may go well together. For as in Alexander's picture well set out we delight without laughter, and in twenty mad antics we laugh without delight; so in Hercules, painted with his great beard and furious countenance, in a woman's attire, spinning at Omphale's commandment,[8] it breedeth both delight and laughter: for the representing of so strange a power in love procureth delight, and the scornfulness of the action stirreth laughter. But I speak to this purpose, that all the end of the comical part be not upon such scornful matters as stir laughter only, but, mixed with it, that delightful teaching which is the end of poesy. And the great fault even in that point of laughter, and forbidden plainly by Aristotle, is that they stir laughter in sinful things, which are rather execrable than ridiculous, or in miserable, which are rather to be pitied than scorned. For what is it to make folks gape at a wretched beggar and a beggarly clown; or, against law of hospitality, to jest at strangers, because they speak not English so well as we do? What do we learn, since it is certain

Nil habet infelix paupertas durius in se,
Quam quod ridiculos homines facit?[9]

But rather, a busy loving courtier and a heartless threatening Thraso; a self-wise-seeming schoolmaster; an awry-transformed traveler. These, if we saw walk in stage names, which we play naturally, therein were delightful laughter, and teaching delightfulness—as in the other, the tragedies of Buchanan[1] do justly bring forth a divine admiration.

But I have lavished out too many words of this play matter. I do it because, as they are excelling parts of poesy, so is there none so much used in England, and none can be more pitifully abused; which, like an unmannerly daughter showing a bad education, causeth her mother Poesy's honesty[2] to be called in question.

Other sort of poetry almost have we none, but that lyrical kind of songs and sonnets: which, Lord, if He gave us so good minds, how well it might be employed, and with how heavenly fruit, both private and public, in singing the praises of the immortal beauty: the immortal goodness of that God who giveth us hands to write and wits to conceive; of which we might well want words, but never matter; of which we could turn our eyes to nothing, but we should ever have new-budding occasions. But truly many of such writings as come under the banner of unresistible love, if I were a mistress, would never persuade me they were in love: so coldly they apply fiery speeches, as men that had rather read lovers' writings—and so caught up certain swelling phrases which hang together like a man that once told my father that the wind was at northwest and by south, because he would be sure to name winds enough—than that in truth they feel those passions, which easily (as I think) may be bewrayed[3] by that same forcibleness or energia (as the Greeks call it) of the writer. But let this be a sufficient though short note, that we miss the right use of the material point of poesy.

Now of versifying there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other modern: the ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and according to that framed his verse; the modern, observing only number[4] (with some regard of the accent), the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words, which we call rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches: the ancient (no doubt) more fit for music, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express diverse passions, by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighed syllable; the latter likewise, with his rhyme, striketh a certain music to the ear, and, in fine, since it doth delight, though by another way, it obtains the same purpose: there being in either sweetness, and wanting[5] in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar[6] language I know, is fit for both sorts. For, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels that it must ever be cumbered with elisions; the Dutch[7] so, of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding, fit for a verse; the French in his whole language hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable saving two, called antepenultima; and little more hath the Spanish, and therefore very gracelessly may they use dactyls.[8] The English is subject to none of these defects. Now for the rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely. That caesura, or breathing place in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have, the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, even the very rhyme itself, the Italian cannot put it in the last syllable, by the French named the masculine rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the female, or the next before that, which the Italians term sdrucciola. The example of the former is buono: suono, of the sdrucciola is femina: semina. The French, of the other side, hath both the male, as bon: son, and the female, as plaise: taise, but the sdrucciola he hath not: where the English hath all three, as due: true, father: rather, motion: potion[9]—with much more which might be said, but that already I find the triflingness of this discourse is much too much enlarged.

[CONCLUSION]

So that since the ever-praiseworthy Poesy is full of virtue-breeding delightfulness, and void of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning; since the blames laid against it are either false or feeble; since the cause why it is not esteemed in England is the fault of poet-apes, not poets; since, lastly, our tongue is most fit to honor poesy, and to be honored by poesy; I conjure you all that have had the evil luck to read this ink-wasting toy of mine, even in the name of the nine Muses, no more to scorn the sacred mysteries of poesy; no more to laugh at the name of poets, as though they were next inheritors to fools; no more to jest at the reverent title of a rhymer; but to believe, with Aristotle, that they were the ancient treasurers of the Grecians' divinity; to believe, with Bembus, that they were first bringers-in of all civility; to believe, with Scaliger, that no philosopher's precepts can sooner make you an honest man than the reading of Virgil; to believe, with Clauserus, the translator of Cornutus, that it pleased the heavenly Deity, by Hesiod[1] and Homer, under the veil of fables, to give us all knowledge, logic, rhetoric, philosophy natural and moral, and quid non?[2] to believe, with me, that there are many mysteries contained in poetry, which of purpose were written darkly, lest by profane wits it should be abused; to believe, with Landino,[3] that they are so beloved of the gods that whatsoever they write proceeds of a divine fury; lastly, to believe themselves, when they tell you they will make you immortal by their verses. Thus doing, your name shall flourish in the printers' shops; thus doing, you shall be of kin to many a poetical preface; thus doing, you shall be most fair, most rich, most wise, most all, you shall dwell upon superlatives; thus doing, though you be libertino patre natus, you shall suddenly grow Herculea proles,[4]

[8] God of ridicule, son of Night and Sleep, hence, a critic. "Mome": a stupid person.

[9] He was given ass's ears because he preferred Pan's music to Apollo's (Ovid, Metamorphoses 11.146-79).

[1] Bupalus, a sculptor who hanged himself when his works were satirized by the poet Hipponax. Sidney fuses the two names.

[2] Irish bards were thought to be able to cause death with their rhymed charms.

[3] Because you are unable to write a sonnet.

AstfOphil and Stella Sidney was a jealous protector of his privacy. "I assure you before God," he had written once in an angry letter to his father's private secretary, Molyneux, "that if ever I know you do so much as read any letter I write to my father, without his commandment or my consent, I will thrust my dagger into you. And trust to it, for I speak it in earnest." Yet in Astrophil and Stella he seems to hold up a mirror to every nuance of his emotional being. For its original coterie audience, Sidney's sonnet sequence must have been an elaborate game of literary masks, psychological risk-taking, and open secrets. The loosely linked succession of 108 sonnets and eleven songs, with its dazzling display of technical virtuosity, provides tantalizing glimpses of identifiable characters and, still more, a sustained and remarkably intimate portrait of the poet's inner life.

Much biographical speculation has centered on Sidney's ambiguous relationship with Penelope Devereux, the supposed original of Stella. A marriage between the two had been proposed in 1576 and was talked about for some years, but in 1581 she married Lord Robert Rich, and two years later Sidney also married. (At their high social rank, marriages were negotiated in the interests of the powerful families involved, not of the individuals.) Some of the sonnets contain sly puns on the name Rich, and it seems likely that there are autobiographical elements in the shadowy narrative sketched by the work. At the same time, however, the "plot" of the sequence, full of trials, setbacks, much suffering on the part of the lover and occasional encouragement on the part of the lady, is highly conventional, derived from Petrarch and his many Italian, French, and Spanish imitators.

Poets in this tradition undertook to produce an anatomy of love, displaying its shifting and often contradictory states: hope and despair, tenderness and bitterness, exultation and modesty, bodily desire and spiritual transcendence. Petrarch had deployed a series of ingenious metaphors to describe these states, but by Sidney's time the metaphors—love as a freezing fire, the beloved's glance as an arrow striking the lover's heart, and so forth—had through endless repetition become familiar and predictable, less a revelation than a role. Sidney, in the role of Astrophil, protests that he uses no standard conventional phrases, that his verse is original and comes from his heart. This protest is itself conventional, and yet Sidney manages to infuse his sonnets with an extraordinary vigor and freshness. Certain of the sonnets have, within their narrow fourteen-line bounds, the force of the drama: "Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death-wound, fly" or "What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?" Others, in their grappling with insistent desire, have the probing, psychological resonance of private confession: "With what sharp checks I in myself am shent" or "Who will in fairest book of Nature know." Still others ask crucial questions about the whole project of self-representation: "Stella oft sees the very face of woe." Virtually all of them manifest the exceptional energia—forcibleness—that Sidney, in The Defense of Poesy, says is the key ingredient of good poetry.

From Astrophil and Stella

i[1]

Loving in truth, and fain° in verse my love to show, desirous
That the dear She might take some pleasure of my pain,
Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know,
Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain,

---

[1] One of six sonnets in the sequence written in hexameters.

I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe,
Studying inventions fine, her wits to entertain,
Oft turning others' leaves, to see if thence would flow
Some fresh and fruitful showers upon my sunburned brain.
But words came halting forth, wanting Invention's stay;[2]
Invention, Nature's child, fled step-dame Study's blows,
And others' feet still° seemed but strangers in my way. continually
Thus great with child to speak, and helpless in my throes,
Biting my trewand° pen, beating myself for spite, truant
"Fool," said my Muse to me, "look in thy heart and write."

Not at first sight, nor with a dribbed[3] shot
Love gave the wound, which while I breathe will bleed,
But known worth did in mine[4] of time proceed,
Till by degrees it had full conquest got.
I saw and liked, I liked but loved not,
I loved, but straight did not[5] what Love decreed;
At length to Love's decrees, I, forced, agreed,
Yet with repining° at so partial° lot. complaining / unfair
Now even that footstep of lost liberty
Is gone, and now like slave-born Muscovite,[6]
I call it praise to suffer tyranny;
And now employ the remnant of my wit,° mind
To make myself believe that all is well,
While with a feeling skill I paint my hell.

It is most true that eyes are formed to serve
The inward light,° and that the heavenly part i.e., reason, understanding
Ought to be king, from whose rules who do swerve,
Rebels to Nature, strive for their own smart.° pain
It is most true, what we call Cupid's dart
An image is, which for ourselves we carve;
And, fools, adore in temple of our heart,
Till that good god make church and churchman starve.[7]
True, that true beauty virtue is indeed,
Whereof this beauty can be but a shade,° shadow
Which elements with mortal mixture[8] breed;
True, that on earth we are but pilgrims made,
And should in soul up to our country move:
True, and yet true that I must Stella love.

---

[2] I.e., lacking the support of Invention, his words moved haltingly.

[3] Ineffectual or at random.

[4] Tunnel dug to undermine a besieged fortress.

[5] Did not immediately do.

[6] Inhabitant of Muscovy, Russian principality ruled from Moscow; sixteenth-century travel books describe Muscovites as contented slaves.

[7] Die (not necessarily of hunger). The concessions made in the argument are to Neoplatonic and Christian doctrines opposed to romantic love. Neoplatonic theory held that physical beauty is only a shadow of inner virtue, which is at one with the true, transcendent and immortal Idea of Beauty. For a highly influential exposition of this theory, see the excerpts from Castiglione's The Courtier, p. 646.

[8] Physical beauty is a mixture of the four elements (earth, air, water, and fire) and so is mortal.

Some lovers speak, when they their muses entertain,
Of hopes begot by fear, of wot° not what desires, know
Of force of heavenly beams infusing hellish pain,
Of living deaths, dear wounds, fair storms, and freezing fires;[9]
Some one his song in Jove and Jove's strange tales attires,
Broidered with bulls and swans, powdered with golden rain;[1]
Another humbler wit to shepherd's pipe retires,
Yet hiding royal blood full oft in rural vein.[2]
To some a sweetest plaint a sweetest style affords,[3]
While tears pour out his ink, and sighs breathe out his words,
His paper pale Despair, and pain his pen doth move.
I can speak what I feel, and feel as much as they,
But think that all the map of my state I display,
When trembling voice brings forth that I do Stella love.

When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes,
In color black why wrapped she beams so bright?
Would she in beamy° black, like painter wise, radiant
Frame daintiest luster, mixed of shades and light?
Or did she else that sober hue devise,
In object° best to knit and strength° our sight, with purpose / strengthen
Lest if no veil those brave gleams did disguise,
They sun-like should more dazzle than delight?
Or would she her miraculous power show,
That whereas black seems beauty's contrary,
She even in black doth make all beauties flow?
Both so and thus: she, minding° Love should be remembering
Placed ever there, gave him this mourning weed,° funeral garb
To honor all their deaths, who for her bleed.

Queen Virtue's court, which some call Stella's face,
Prepared by Nature's chiefest furniture,[4]
Hath his front° built of alablaster° pure; i.e., Stella's forehead / alabaster
Gold is the covering of that stately place.
The door, by which sometimes comes forth her Grace,
Red porphir[5] is, which lock of pearl makes sure;
Whose porches rich (which name of cheeks endure),
Marble mixed red and white do interlace.
The windows now through which this heavenly guest
Looks o'er the world, and can find nothing such,
Which dare claim from those lights the name of best,

[9] Conventional Petrarchan oxymorons.

[1] I.e., embroidered with mythological figures. Jove courted Europa in the shape of a bull; Leda, as a swan; and Danae, as a golden shower.

[2] I.e., in pastoral allegory. By convention, a pastoral poet pipes his songs on an oaten or reed pipe.

[3] Parodying the overuse of the word sweet in love complaints, with allusion to the very musical dolce stil nuovo (sweet new style) associated with Dante and his Italian contemporaries.

[4] The best materials Nature furnishes.

[5] Porphyry, an ornamental red or purple stone.

Of touch[6] they are that without touch doth touch,
Which Cupid's self from Beauty's mine did draw:
Of touch they are, and poor I am their straw.

10

Reason, in faith thou art well served, that still Wouldst brabling° be with sense and love in me: quarreling
I rather wished thee climb the Muses' hill,[7]
Or reach the fruit of Nature's choicest tree,[8]
Or seek heaven's course, or heaven's inside to see.
Why shouldst thou toil our thorny soil to till?
Leave sense, and those which sense's objects be:
Deal thou with powers of thoughts, leave love to will.
Rut thou wouldst needs fight both with love and sense,
With sword of wit,° giving wounds of dispraise, intellect
Till downright blows did foil thy cunning fence:° sword-play
For soon as they strake° thee with Stella's rays, struck
Reason thou kneel'dst, and offeredst straight° to prove straightway
By reason good, good reason her to love.

15

You that do search for every purling° spring murmuring
Which from the ribs of old Parnassus[9] flows,
And every flower,[1] not sweet perhaps, which grows
Near therabout, into your poesy[2] wring;
You that do dictionary's method bring
Into your rhymes, running in rattling rows;
You that poor Petrarch's long-deceased woes
With new-born sighs and denizened wit° do sing; naturalized ingenuity
You take wrong ways, those far-fet° helps be such, far-fetched
As do bewray a want of inward touch,[3]
And sure at length stolen goods do come to light.
But if (both for your love and skill) your name
You seek to nurse at fullest breasts of Fame,
Stella behold, and then begin to endite.° write

16

In nature apt to like when I did see
Beauties, which were of many carats fine,
My boiling sprites° did thither soon incline, spirits
And, Love, I thought that I was full of thee:
But finding not those restless flames in me,
Which others said did make their souls to pine,
I thought those babes of some pin's hurt did whine,

[6] Glossy black stone (lignite or jet) able to attract light bodies such as straw by static electricity.

[7] Mount Helicon in Greece, sacred lo the Nine Muses—a symbol of poetic inspiration.

[8] The tree of knowledge.

[9] Mountain near Delphos in Greece, sacred to the Muses, who foster poetry and other arts.

[1] Also, poetic figures ("flowers of rhetoric").

[2] Also, a nosegay (posy).

[3] Reveal a lack of innate talent.

By my love judging what love's pain might be.
But while I thus with this young lion[4] played,
Mine eyes (shall I say cursed or blessed) beheld
Stella; now she is named, need more be said?
In her sight I a lesson new have spelled,
I now have learned love right, and learned even so,
As who by being poisoned doth poison know.

18

With what sharp checks° I in myself am shent,° rebukes / shamed
When into Reason's audit I do go,
And by just counts myself a bankrout° know bankrupt
Of all those goods, which heaven to me hath lent;
Unable quite to pay even Nature's rent,
Which unto it by birthright I do owe;
And which is worse, no good excuse can show,
But that my wealth I have most idly spent.
My youth doth waste, my knowledge brings forth toys,[5]
My wit° doth strive those passions to defend, intellect
Which for reward spoil it with vain annoys.
I see my course to lose myself doth bend:° turn
I see and yet no greater sorrow take,
Than that I lose no more for Stella's sake.

20

Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death-wound, fly;
See there that boy, that murth'ring° boy, I say, murdering
Who like a thief hid in dark bush doth lie
Till bloody bullet get him wrongful prey.
So tyran° he no fitter place could spy, tyrant
Nor so fair level° in so secret stay,° aim / stopping place
As that sweet black° which veils the heav'nly eye; pupil
There himself with his shot he close° doth lay. secretly
Poor passenger,° pass now thereby I did, passerby
And stay'd, pleas'd with the prospect of the place,
While that black hue from me the bad guest hid;
But straight I saw motions of lightning grace,
And then descried° the glist'ring° of his dart; saw / glittering
But ere I could fly thence, it pierc'd my heart.

21

Your words, my friend (right healthful caustics),[6] blame
My young mind marred, whom Love doth windlass° so, ensnare
That mine own writings like bad servants show
My wits quick in vain thoughts, in virtue lame;

---

[4] In a popular fable, a shepherd raised a lion cub that, while young, was a pet for his children but when grown destroyed all his flocks.

[5] Trifles, i.e., these poems.

[6] Caustic substances for burning away diseased tissue.

That Plato I read for nought, but if° he tame — unless Such coltish gyres,[7] that to my birth I owe Nobler desires, least° else that friendly foe, — lest
Great Expectation, wear a train of shame.
For since mad March great promise made of me,
If now the May of my years much decline,
What can be hoped my harvest time will be?
Sure you say well; your wisdom's golden mine
Dig deep with learning's spade; now tell me this,
Hath this world ought° so fair as Stella is? — aught, anything

27

Because I oft, in dark abstracted guise,
Seem most alone in greatest company,
With dearth of words, or answers quite awry,
To them that would make speech of speech arise,
They deem, and of their doom° the rumor flies, — judgment
That poison foul of bubbling pride doth lie
So in my swelling breast that only I° — that I do nothing but
Fawn on myself, and others do despise.
Yet pride, I think, doth not my soul possess,
Which looks too oft in his unflatt'ring glass;° — mirror
But one worse fault, ambition, I confess,
That makes me oft my best friends overpass,° — pass by, ignore
Unseen, unheard, while thought to highest place
Bends all his powers, even unto Stella's grace.° — beauty, elegance; favor

28

You that with allegory's curious frame° — intricate contrivance
Of others' children changelings use° to make, — are accustomed
With me those pains, for God's sake, do not take;
I list not° dig so deep for brazen fame. — I don't care to
When I say Stella, I do mean the same
Princess of beauty for whose only sake
The reins of love I love, though never slake,° — slack
And joy therein, though nations count it shame.
I beg no subject to use eloquence,[8]
Nor in hid ways do guide philosophy;
Look at my hands for no such quintessence,[9]
But know that I in pure simplicity
Breathe out the flames which burn within my heart,
Love only reading unto me this art.

31

With how sad steps, O Moon, thou climb'st the skies,
How silently, and with how wan a face!

---

[7] Wild circles, like those of a young horse; there is a probable reference to Plato's story of the charioteer Reason reining in the horses of Passion (Phaedrus 254).

[8] I.e., I don't ask for a topic simply as an excuse to display my rhetorical skills.

[9] The mysterious "fifth element" of matter (supplementary to earth, air, fire, and water), which alchemists labored to extract.

What, may it be that even in heavenly place
That busy archer° his sharp arrows tries? Cupid.
Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eyes
Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case;
I read it in thy looks: thy languished grace,
To me that feel the like, thy state descries.° reveals
Then even of fellowship, O Moon, tell me,
Is constant love deemed there but want of wit?° lack of intelligence
Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
Do they above love to be loved, and yet
Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?[1]

33[2]

I might (unhappy word), O me, I might,
And then would not, or could not, see my bliss:
Till now, wrapped in a most infernal night,
I find how heav'nly day, wretch, I did miss.
Heart, rent° thyself, thou dost thyself but right: rend, tear
No lovely Paris made thy Helen his;[3]
No force, no fraud robbed thee of thy delight;
Nor Fortune of thy fortune author is;
But to myself myself did give the blow,
While too much wit° (forsooth) so troubled me, cleverness
That I respects for both our sakes must show:[4]
And yet could not by rising morn foresee
How fair a day was near. O punished eyes,
That I had been more foolish, or more wise!

34

Come, let me write. "And to what end?" To ease
A burdened heart. "How can words ease, which are
The glasses° of thy daily vexing care?" mirrors
Oft cruel fights well pictured forth do please.
"Art° not ashamed to publish thy disease?" are you
Nay, that may breed my fame, it is so rare.
"But will not wise men think thy words fond ware?"° foolish trinkets
Then be they close,[5] and so none shall displease.
"What idler thing, than speak and not be hard?"° heard
What harder thing than smart,° and not to speak? feel pain
Peace, foolish wit;° with wit my wit is marred. reason, intellect
Thus while I write I doubt° to write, and wreak° hesitate; fear / avenge
My harms on Ink's poor loss; perhaps some find Stella's great powers, that so confuse my mind.

---

[1] I.e., is the lady's ingratitude considered virtue in heaven (as here)? Also, is the lover's virtue (fidelity) considered distasteful in heaven (as here)?

[2] The sonnet seems to allude to the abortive scheme to betroth Sidney to Penelope Devereux in 1576, when she was about thirteen, he twenty-one.

[3] I.e., Astrophil did not lose Stella to a more attractive rival, as Menelaus lost Helen of Troy to Paris.

[4] I.e., he thought he was acting in the best interests of both.

[5] Let them (my words) be kept private.

37

My mouth doth water, and my breast doth swell,
My tongue doth itch, my thoughts in labor be:
Listen then, lordings, with good ear to me,
For of my life I must a riddle tell.
Towards Aurora's court a nymph doth dwell,[6]
Rich in all beauties which man's eye can see,
Beauties so far from reach of words, that we
Abase her praise, saying she doth excel:
Rich in the treasure of deserved renown,
Rich in the riches of a royal heart,
Rich in those gifts which give th'eternal crown;
Who though most rich in these and every part,
Which make the patents[7] of true worldly bliss,
Hath no misfortune, but that Rich she is.

39

Come sleep! O sleep the certain knot of peace,
The baiting place[8] of wit,[0] the balm of woe, mind
The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
Th' indifferent[0] judge between the high and low; impartial
With shield of proof[9] shield me from out the prease[0] throng
Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw:
0 make in me those civil wars to cease;
1 will good tribute pay if thou do so.
Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest bed,
A chamber deaf to noise and blind to light,
A rosy garland, and a weary head:[1]
And if these things, as being thine by right,
Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me
Livelier[0] than elsewhere Stella's image see. more lifelike

41

Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance
Guided so well that I obtained the prize,
Both by the judgment of the English eyes
And of some sent from that sweet enemy France;[2]
Horsemen my skill in horsemanship advance;[3]
Townfolks my strength; a daintier[0] judge applies more discerning
His praise to sleight,[0] which from good use[0] doth rise; art / experience
Some lucky wits impute it but to chance;
Others, because of both sides I do take

---

[6] Aurora (the dawn) has her court in the east; Penelope Devereux Rich, the original of Stella, dwells in Essex, one of the eastern counties. Sidney puns on her married name throughout this sonnet.

[7] Grants, titles to possession.

[8] Resting place on a journey.

[9] Proven strength.

[1] The offer of gifts to Morpheus, god of sleep, is a poetic convention. A likely source is Chaucer's Book of the Duchess, lines 240—69.

[2] Sidney took part in several tournaments between 1579 and 1585 with French spectators present, but the one in May 1581 was devised specifically to entertain French commissioners.

[3] I.e., put forward as the reason for my triumph.

My blood from them who did excel in this,[4]
Think Nature me a man of arms did make.
How far they shoot awry! The true cause is,
Stella looked on, and from her heavenly face
Sent forth the beams which made so fair my race.

45

Stella oft sees the very face of woe
Painted in my beclouded stormy face,
But cannot skill to pity° my disgrace,° is unable to / misfortune
Not though thereof the cause herself she know.[5]
Yet hearing late a fable which did show,
Of lovers never known, a grievous case,
Pity thereof gate° in her breast such place got
That, from that sea derived, tears' spring did flow.
Alas, if fancy,° drawn by imaged things, fantasy
Though false, yet with free scope more grace° doth breed favor
Than servant's wrack, where new doubts honor brings,[6]
Then think, my dear, that you in me do read
Of lover's ruin some sad tragedy:
I am not I; pity the tale of me.

47

What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?
Can those black beams such burning marks° engrave brands of slavery
In my free side? or am I born a slave,
Whose neck becomes° such yoke of tyranny? is suited to
Or want I sense to feel my misery?
Or sprite,° disdain of such disdain to have? spirit
Who for long faith, though daily help I crave,
May get no alms but scorn of beggary.[7]
Virtue awake! Beauty but beauty is;
I may, I must, I can, I will, I do
Leave following that which it is gain to miss.
Let her go. Soft, but here she comes. Go to,[8]
Unkind, I love you not. O me, that eye
Doth make my heart give to my tongue the lie.° contradict my tongue

49

I on my horse, and Love on me doth try
Our horsemanships, while by strange work I prove
A horseman to my horse, a horse to Love;
And now man's wrongs in me, poor beast, descry.° discover
The reins wherewith my rider doth me tie

---

[4] Sidney's father and grandfather and his maternal uncles, the earls of Leicester and Warwick, were frequent participants in tournaments.

[5] I.e., even though she knows she herself is the cause of it.

[6] I.e., than the ruin of her lover ("servant"), caused by the new scruples ("doubts") her honor brings up.

[7] I.e., scorn for [my] begging.

[8] An emphatic expression, like "I tell you."

Are humbled thoughts, which bit of reverence move,
Curbed in with fear, but with gilt bosse° above   gold studs
Of hope, which makes it seem fair to the eye.
The wand° is will; thou, fancy, saddle art,   whip
Girt fast by memory; and while I spur
My horse, he spurs with sharp desire my heart;
He sits me fast,° however I do stir,   tightly
And now hath made me to his hand so right
That in the manage[1] myself takes delight.

52

A strife is grown between Virtue and Love,
While each pretends° that Stella must be his: claims
Her eyes, her lips, her all, saith Love, do this,
Since they do wear his badge,[2] most firmly prove.
But Virtue thus that title doth disprove:
That Stella (O dear name) that Stella is
That virtuous soul, sure heir of heavenly bliss;
Not this fair outside, which our hearts doth move.
And therefore, though her beauty and her grace
Be Love's indeed, in Stella's self he may
By no pretence claim any manner° place.   kind of
Well, Love, since this demur° our suit[3] doth stay,°   objection / stop
Let Virtue have that Stella's self; yet thus,
That Virtue but° that body grant to us.   only

53

In martial sports I had my cunning° tried,   skill
And yet to break more staves° did me address;   lances
While with the people's shouts, I must confess,
Youth, luck, and praise even filled my veins with pride.
When Cupid, having me his slave descried°   discerned
In Mars's livery,[4] prancing in the press,°   throng
"What now, Sir Fool," said he, "I would no less;[5]
Look here, I say." I looked, and Stella spied,
Who hard by° made a window send forth light.   nearby
My heart then quaked, then dazzled were mine eyes,
One hand forgot to rule,° th' other to fight.   govern the horse
Nor trumpets' sound I heard, nor friendly cries;
My foe came on, and beat the air for me,[6]
Till that her blush taught me my shame to see.

54

Because I breathe not love to everyone,
Nor do not use set colors for to wear,[7]

I.e., you, Fancy (imagination), are the saddle.

Training or handling of a horse.

Device or livery worn to identify someone's ere, Cupid's) servants.

"Courtship," in addition to the legal meaning.

The uniform that identifies the servants belonging to a nobleman's household; here, to Mars, god of war.

[5] I.e., I want no less [service from you].

[6] Struck the empty air instead of me.

[7] Am not accustomed to wear colors associated with a particular woman.

Nor nourish special locks of vowed hair,[8]
Nor give each speech a full point[9] of a groan,
The courtly nymphs, acquainted with the moan
Of them who in their lips Love's standard° bear, ensign
"What, he?" say they of me, "now I dare swear
He cannot love; no, no, let him alone!"
And think so still, so[1] Stella know my mind.
Profess indeed I do not Cupid's art;
But you, fair maids, at length this true shall find,
That his right badge[2] is but worn in the heart:
Dumb swans, not chatt'ring pies,° do lovers prove;[3] magpies
They love indeed, who quake to say they love.

56

Fie, school of Patience, fie, your lesson is Far far too long to learn it without book:° by memory
What, a whole week without one piece of look,[4]
And think I should not your large precepts miss?° forget
When I might read those letters fair of bliss,
Which in her face teach virtue, I could brook° bear
Somewhat thy leaden counsels, which I took
As of a friend that meant not much amiss.
But now that I, alas, do want° her sight, lack
What, dost thou think that I can ever take
In thy cold stuff a phlegmatic° delight? apathetic
No, Patience, if thou wilt my good, then make
Her come and hear with patience my desire,
And then with patience bid me bear my fire.

61

Oft with true sighs, oft with uncalled tears,
Now with slow words, now with dumb eloquence
I Stella's eyes assail, invade her ears;
But this at last is her sweet-breathed defence:
That who indeed infelt affection bears,
So captives to his saint both soul and sense
That, wholly hers, all selfness° he forbears; concern with self
Thence his desires he learns, his life's course thence.
Now since her chaste mind hates this love in me,
With chastened mind I straight must shew° that she show
Shall quickly me from what she hates remove.
O Doctor[5] Cupid, thou for me reply,
Driven else° to grant by angel's sophistry, otherwise
That I love not, without I leave to love.° unless I stop loving

---

[8] I.e., lovelocks: long, flowing locks characteristic of amorous courtiers.

[9] Final punctuation, period.

[1] Go on thinking so, provided only that.

[2] True badge, livery.

[3] Prove to be (true) lovers.

[4] Without the briefest glimpse of her.

[5] In the sense of eminently learned scholar.

69

O joy, too high for my low style to show,
O bliss, fit for a nobler state than me!
Envy, put out thine eyes, lest thou do see
What oceans of delight in me do flow.
My friend, that oft saw through all masks my woe,
Come, come, and let me pour myself on thee:
Gone is the winter of my misery;
My spring appears; O see what here doth grow.
For Stella hath, with words where faith doth shine,
Of her high heart given me the monarchy:
I, I, O I may say that she is mine.
And though she give but thus conditionly
This realm of bliss, while virtuous course I take,
No kings be crowned but° they some covenants[6] make. unless

71

Who will in fairest book of Nature know
How Virtue may best lodged in beauty be,
Let him but learn of Love to read in thee,
Stella, those fair lines, which true goodness show.
There shall he find all vices' overthrow,
Not by rude force, but sweetest sovereignty
Of reason, from whose light those night-birds[7] fly;
That inward sun in thine eyes shineth so.
And not content to be Perfection's heir
Thyself, dost strive all minds that way to move,
Who mark° in thee what is in thee most fair.[8] perceive
So while thy beauty draws the heart to love,
As fast° thy Virtue bends that love to good; at the same rate
"But, ah," Desire still cries, "give me some food."

72

Desire, though thou my old companion art,
And oft so clings to my pure Love that I
One from the other scarcely can descry,° distinguish
While each doth blow the fire of my heart,
Now from thy fellowship I needs must part:
Venus is taught with Dian's wings to fly;[9]
I must no more in thy sweet passions lie;
Virtue's gold now must head my Cupid's dart.
Service and honor, wonder with delight,
Fear to offend, will worthy to appear,[1]
Care shining in mine eyes, faith in my sprite:° spirit

[1] The phrase can mean either "the wish to appear worthy" or "desire that is worthy to appear [i.e., not shameful]."

These things are left me by my only dear;
But thou, Desire, because thou wouldst have all,
Now banished art. But yet alas how shall?

74

I never drank of Aganippe well,
Nor ever did in shade of Tempe[2] sit;
And Muses scorn with vulgar° brains to dwell; common
Poor layman I, for sacred rites unfit.
Some do I hear of Poets' fury° tell, inspiration
But God wot,° wot not what they mean by it; knows
And this I swear by blackest brook of hell,[3]
I am no pick-purse of another's wit.
How falls it then that with so smooth an ease
My thoughts I speak, and what I speak doth flow
In verse, and that my verse best wits doth please?
Guess we the cause. "What, is it thus?" Fie no.
"Or so?" Much less. "How then?" Sure thus it is:
My lips are sweet, inspired with Stella's kiss.[4]

81

O kiss, which dost those ruddy gems impart,
Or° gems, or fruits of new-found Paradise, either
Breathing all bliss and sweet'ning to the heart,
Teaching dumb lips a nobler exercise!
O kiss, which souls, even souls, together ties
By links of love, and only nature's art,
How fain° would I paint thee to all men's eyes, gladly
Or of thy gifts at least shade out° some part. sketch
But she forbids, with blushing words, she says
She builds her fame on higher-seated praise.
But my heart burns, I cannot silent be.
Then since (dear life) you fain would have me peace,[5]
And I, mad with delight, want wit[6] to cease,
Stop you my mouth with still still kissing me.

Fourth Song[7]

Only joy, now here you are,
Fit to hear and ease my care;
Let my whispering voice obtain
Sweet reward for sharpest pain:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

[4] A kiss he stole from Stella when he caught her napping (Song 2).

[5] You want me to be silent.

[6] Lack the mental faculties.

[7] Like Petrarch, Sidney intersperses songs (eleven of them) in his sequence, thereby extending its emotional range. Some of them incorporate Stella's voice. This song appears between sonnets 85 and 86.

Night hath closed all in her cloak,
Twinkling stars love-thoughts provoke,
Danger hence good care doth keep,
Jealousy itself doth sleep:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Better place no wit can find,
Cupid's yoke to loose or bind;
These sweet flowers on fine bed, too,
Us in their best language woo:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

This small light the moon bestows
Serves thy beams but to disclose,
So to raise my hap° more high; good fortune
Fear not else, none can us spy:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

That you heard was but a mouse,
Dumb sleep holdeth all the house;
Yet asleep methinks they say,
"Young folks, take time while you may."
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Niggard° Time threats, if we miss stingy
This large offer of our bliss,
Long stay° ere he grant the same; wait
Sweet, then, while each thing doth frame,° serve
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Your fair mother is abed,
Candles out, and curtains spread;
She thinks you do letters write:
Write, but first let me indite:° dictate
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Sweet, alas, why strive you thus?
Concord better fitteth us.
Leave to Mars the force of hands,
Your power in your beauty stands:
Take me to thee, and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Woe to me, and do you swear
Me to hate? But I forbear.
Cursed be my destines° all, fates
That brought me so high to fall:

Soon with my death I will please thee.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

87

When I was forced from Stella ever dear,
Stella, food of my thoughts, heart of my heart,
Stella, whose eyes make all my tempests clear,
By iron laws of duty to depart,
Alas, I found that she with me did smart;° suffer
I saw that tears did in her eyes appear;
I saw that sighs her sweetest lips did part,
And her sad words my sadded sense did hear.
For me, I wept to see pearls scattered so,
I sighed her sighs, and wailed for her woe,
Yet swam in joy, such love in her was seen.
Thus while th' effect most bitter was to me,
And nothing than the cause more sweet could be,
I had been° vexed, if vexed I had not been. i.e., would have been

89[8]

Now that of absence the most irksome night
With darkest shade doth overcome my day,
Since Stella's eyes, wont° to give me my day, accustomed
Leaving my hemisphere, leave me in night,
Each day seems long, and longs for long-stayed° night;
The night, as tedious, woos th' approach of day.
Tired with the dusty toils of busy day,
Languished with horrors of the silent night,
Suffering the evils both of the day and night,
While no night is more dark than is my day,
Nor no day hath less quiet than my night,
With such bad mixture of my night and day
That, living thus in blackest winter night,
I feel the flames of hottest summer day.

91

Stella, while now by Honor's cruel might
I am from° you, light of my life, mis-led, away from
And that fair you, my sun, thus overspread
With absence' veil, I live in Sorrow's night,
If this dark place yet shew,° like candlelight, show
Some beauty's piece,[9] as amber-colored head,
Milk hands, rose cheeks, or lips more sweet, more red,
Or seeing jets,° black, but in blackness bright, eyes
They please I do confess, they please mine eyes;

[8] A sonnet with only two rhyme words, wight and day.

[9] Some beauties in other women.

But why? because of you they models be;
Models such be wood-globes of glist'ring° skies.[1] glittering
Dear, therefore be not jealous over me,
If you hear that they seem my heart to move:
Not them, O no, but you in them I love.

94

Grief, find the words; for thou hast made my brain
So dark with misty vapors which arise
From out thy heavy mold,° that in-bent° eyes earth / inward-turned.
Can scarce discern the shape of mine own pain.
Do thou, then (for thou canst), do thou complain
For[2] my poor soul, which now that sickness tries° experiences
Which even to sense, sense of itself denies,[3]
Though harbingers[4] of Death lodge there his train.
Or if thy love of plaint° yet mine forbears,[5] complaint, lamentation
As of a caitiff worthy so to die,
Yet wail thyself,° and wail with causeful° tears, for yourself / well-founded
That though in wretchedness thy life doth lie,
Yet grow'st more wretched than thy nature bears,
By being placed in such a wretch as I.

Eleventh Song[6]

"Who is it that this dark night
Underneath my window plaineth?"[7]
It is one who from thy sight
Being (ah) exiled, disdaineth
Every other vulgar° light. common

"Why, alas, and are you he?
Be not yet those fancies changed?"
Dear, when you find change in me,
Though from me you be estranged,
Let my change to ruin be.

"Well, in absence this will die;
Leave° to see, and leave to wonder." cease
Absence sure will help, if I
Can learn how myself to sunder
From what in my heart doth lie.

"But time will these thoughts remove:
Time doth work what no man knoweth."
Time doth as the subject prove;[8]

Poorly counterfeiting thee.

"But your reason's purest light,

Dear, do reason no such spite:
Never doth thy beauty flourish
More than in my reason's sight.

"But the wrongs love bears will make Love at length leave undertaking."
No, the more fools it do shake,

Which can make me thus to leave you,
And from louts to run away.

106

O absent presence, Stella is not here;
False flattering Hope, that with so fair a face
Bare me in hand,° that in this orphan place deceived, me
Stella, I say my Stella, should appear.
What say'st thou now? Where is that dainty cheer° countenance; food
Thou told'st mine eyes should help their famished case?
But thou art gone, now that self-felt disgrace
Dost make me most to wish thy comfort near.
But here I do store° of fair ladies meet, abundance
Who may with charm of conversation sweet
Make in my heavy mold° new thoughts to grow: earth

5 But soon as thought of thee breeds my delight,
  And my young soul flutters to thee, his nest,
  Most rude Despair, my daily unbidden guest,
Clips straight° my wings, straight wraps me in his night, immediately
  And makes me then bow down my head and say,
10 "Ah, what doth Phoebus'° gold that wretch avail, god of the sun
Whom iron doors do keep from use of day?"
So strangely (alas) thy works in me prevail,
  That in my woes for thee thou art my joy,

  And in my joys for thee my only annoy.° trouble, pain

FULKE GREVILLE, LORD BROOKE
1554-1628

Fulke Greville came from a wealthy family, was educated at Shrewsbury and Cambridge, and was a successful courtier under Elizabeth I, James I, and Charles I. Greville, who never married, wrote some conventional heterosexual verse, but his most passionate expressions of love were for his friend Sir Philip Sidney, whose death in 1586 he never ceased to mourn. Greville refused to publish any of his own work, but he brought out the 1590 version of Sidney's Arcadia and wrote his friend's biography. Greville began a sonnet cycle, Caelica, in the manner of Sidney's Astrophil and Stella, but the later poems in the sequence are in a very different style, somber, brooding, and philosophical. He also wrote long philosophical verse treatises and several politically charged closet dramas (plays meant to be read, not acted on stage). His vision of the human condition is perhaps best summed up in bleak verses from one of these dramas, Mustapha:

O wearisome condition of humanity!
Born under one law, to another bound;
Vainly begot and yet forbidden vanity;
Created sick, commanded to be sound.

The end of Greville's life was grimly in keeping with his pessimism: he was stabbed to death by a long-time servant.*

In night when colors all to black are cast,

Which but expressions be of inward evils.

MARY (SIDNEY) HERBERT, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE

1562-1621

When her brother, the celebrated courtier and author Philip Sidney, died in 1586, Mary Sidney, the countess of Pembroke, became the custodian not only of his writings but also of his last name. Though her marriage in 1577 to Henry Herbert, the second earl of Pembroke, represented a great social advance for her family—her offspring would no longer be members of the gentry but rather would be among the nation's tiny hereditary nobility—yet throughout her life the countess of Pembroke held onto her identity as a Sidney.

She had good reason to do so. The Sidneys were celebrated for their generous support of poets, clergymen, alchemists, naturalists, scientists, and musicians. The Pembroke country estate, Wilton, quickly became a gathering place for thinkers who enjoyed the countess's patronage and shared her staunch Protestant convictions and her literary interests. Books, pamphlets, and scores of poems were dedicated in the 1590s and thereafter to her, as well as to her brother Robert (his country house, Penshurst, is praised in a well-known poem by Ben Jonson). Nicholas Breton and Samuel Daniel in particular benefited from her support, as did her niece, goddaughter, and frequent companion, Mary Wroth.

In one of the dedicatory poems to Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, Aemilia Lanyer praises Mary Sidney not only for her generosity toward poets but also for those "works that are more deep and more profound." These include her translation of Robert Garnier's neoclassical French tragedy Antonius and a prose translation of the religious tract A Discourse of Life and Death by the French Protestant Philippe de Mornay. Her translation of Petrarch's Triumph of Death was the first in English to maintain the original terza rima (a particularly challenging rhyme scheme for an English versifier). Although translation was considered an especially appropriate genre for women to work in, it is a mistake to assume that Mary Sidney's efforts as a poet are merely derivative: Elizabethans understood that translation offered the opportunity not only for the display of linguistic and technical skills but also for the indirect expression of personal and political concerns. Mary Sidney also expressed these concerns more directly: among her original poems was a powerful elegy for her brother Philip and a short pastoral entertainment for Queen Elizabeth.

Mary Sidney was best known for having prepared a composite edition of Philip Sidney's Arcadia and for contributing the larger number (107) of the verse translations of the 150 biblical psalms that her brother had begun. Her very free renderings re-create the psalms as English poems, using an amazing variety of stanzaic and metrical patterns and some strikingly effective images. Widely circulated in manuscript, this influential collection was an important bridge between the many metrical paraphrases of psalms in this period and the works of the great religious lyric poets of the seventeenth century, especially George Herbert. Donne's poem Upon the Translation of the Psalms by Sir Philip Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke His Sister testifies to that importance: "They tell us why, and teach us how to sing."*

Psalm 52

Tyrant, why swell'st thou thus,
Of mischief vaunting?
Since help from God to us
Is never wanting.

Lewd lies thy tongue contrives,
Loud lies it soundeth;
Sharper than sharpest knives
With lies it woundeth.

Falsehood thy wit° approves, mind
All truth rejected:
Thy will all vices loves,
Virtue neglected.

Not words from cursed thee,
But gulfs° are poured; abysses, yawning chasms
Gulfs wherein daily be Good men devoured.

Think'st thou to bear it° so? bear it off, triumph
God shall displace thee;
God shall thee overthrow,
Crush thee, deface° thee. destroy

The just shall fearing see
These fearful chances,
And laughing shoot at thee
With scornful glances.

SAMUEL DANIEL

1562-1619

Samuel Daniel was a gifted, learned, and deeply thoughtful writer. A poet, playwright, historian, and translator, he was a member of the circle of Mary Sidney, countess of Pembroke, whose son he tutored, and he later held various offices in the household of James I's queen, Anne of Denmark. He wrote tragedies, court masques, a historical epic called The Civil Wars Between the Two Houses of Lancaster and York, a prose History of England, several fine verse epistles, one of the best Elizabethan sonnet sequences, Delia, and a verse dialogue on the purpose of writing poetry, Musophilus. One of the speakers in this dialogue prophetically imagines a time in which the English language, seemingly so marginal, will be spoken in the New World, the "yet unformed Occident":

And who, in time, knows whither we may vent
The treasure of our tongue, to what strange shores
This gain of our best glory shall be sent?

Daniel's lyrics are marked by clarity, restraint, and quiet eloquence. His Defense of Rhyme (1603), an answer to Thomas Campion's objections to the use of rhyme as contrary to classical precedents, defends native English traditions in poetry. His Jacobean writings often implicitly criticize James's reign. Accused of sedition in his tragedy Philotas (1604), he successfully defended himself by citing his classical sources.*

The world shall find this miracle in me,
That fire can burn when all the matter's spent;
Then what my faith hath been thyself shall see,
And that thou wast unkind thou mayst repent.
Thou mayst repent that thou hast scorned my tears,
When winter snows upon thy golden hairs.

MICHAEL DRAYTON

1563-1631

Michael Drayton was born about a year before Shakespeare and in the same county, Warwickshire. He had a long career as poet, extending from the early 1590s until well into the seventeenth century. He collaborated on plays, wrote scriptural paraphrases, pastorals, odes, poetic epistles, verse legends, and a historical epic called The Barons' Wars. His self-styled masterpiece is Poly-Olbion, a thirty-thousand-line historical-geographical poem celebrating all the counties of England and Wales. He made a significant contribution as well to the period's vogue for sonnets, publishing a sequence called Idea's Mirror (1594) that, following substantial revision, he republished as Idea. It was in fact Drayton's standard practice to revise and add to his poems in each new edition, so that one can trace his response to shifting fashions, his rethinking of his antiquarian fascinations, and his development from an Elizabethan to a seventeenth-century poet.*

When nothing else remaineth of these days,
And queens hereafter shall be glad to live
Upon the alms of thy superfluous praise.
Virgins and matrons, reading these my rhymes,
Shall be so much delighted with thy story
That they shall grieve they lived not in these times
To have seen thee, their sex's only glory;
So shalt thou fly above the vulgar° throng, common
Still to survive in my immortal song.

Since there's no help, come, let us kiss and part;
Nay, I have done, you get no more of me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart
That thus so cleanly I myself can free.
Shake hands forever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.
Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath,
When, his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
When Faith° is kneeling by his bed of death, faithfulness
And Innocence is closing up his eyes;
Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
From death to life thou mightst him yet recover.

Ode. To the Virginian Voyage[1]

You brave heroic minds,
Worthy your country's name,

---

[1] The expedition of the Virginia Company was ordered in April 1606; its mission was to establish Jamestown, England's first permanent settlement in the New World. Three ships set out in December, after Drayton's poem was published.

Drayton was the first English author to attempt a careful imitation of the classical ode, taking as his principal model the odes of the Roman poet Horace.

That honor still pursue,
Go, and subdue,
Whilst loit'ring hinds[0] rustics
Lurk here at home, with shame.

Britons, you stay too long;
Quickly aboard bestow you,
And with a merry gale
Swell your stretched sail,
With vows as strong
As the winds that blow you.

Your course securely steer,
West and by south forth keep,
Rocks, lee shores, nor shoals,
When Aeolus[2] scowls,
You need not fear,
So absolute the deep.

And cheerfully at sea,
Success you still entice,
To get the pearl and gold,
And ours to hold,
Virginia,
Earth's only paradise,

Where nature hath in store
Fowl, venison, and fish,
And the fruitful'st soil
Without your toil
Three harvests more,
All greater than your wish.

And the ambitious vine
Crowns with his purple mass,
The cedar reaching high
To kiss the sky,
The cypress, pine,
And useful sassafras.[3]

To whose the Golden Age[4]
Still nature's laws doth give,
No other cares that tend,
But them to defend
From winter's age,
That long there doth not live.

[2] In Greek mythology, the god who controls the winds.

Whenas the luscious smell
Of that delicious land,
Above the seas that flows,
The clear wind throws,
Your hearts to swell
Approaching the dear strand,° shore

In kenning° of the shore, sighting
Thanks to God first given,
O you, the happi'st men,
Be frolic then,
Let cannons roar,
Frighting the wide heaven.

And in regions far
Such heroes bring ye forth
As those from whom we came,
And plant our name
Under that star
Not known unto our north.

And as there plenty grows
Of laurel everywhere,
Apollo's sacred tree,
You it may see
A poet's brows
To crown, that may sing there.

Thy voyages attend,
Industrious Hakluyt,[5]
Whose reading shall inflame
Men to seek fame,
And much commend
To after times thy wit.° intellect

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE
1564-1593

The son of a Canterbury shoemaker, Christopher Marlowe was born two months before William Shakespeare. In 1580 he went to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, on a scholarship that was ordinarily awarded to students preparing for the ministry. He held the scholarship for the maximum time, six years, but did not take holy orders. Instead, he began to write plays. When he applied for his Master of Arts degree in 1587, the university was about to deny it to him on the ground that he intended to go abroad to join the dissident English Catholics at Rheims. But the Privy Council intervened and requested that because Marlowe had done the queen "good service"—evidently as some kind of secret agent—he be granted his degree at the next commencement. "It is not Her Majesty's pleasure," the government officials added, "that anyone employed as he had been in matters touching the benefit of his country should be defamed by those that are ignorant in the affairs he went about." Although much sensational information about Marlowe has been discovered in modern times, we are still largely "ignorant in the affairs he went about." The likeliest possibility is that he served as a spy or agent provocateur against English Catholics who were conspiring to overthrow the Protestant regime.

Before he left Cambridge, Marlowe had certainly written his tremendously successful play Tamburlaine and perhaps also, in collaboration with his younger Cambridge contemporary Thomas Nashe, the tragedy of Dido, Queen of Carthage. Tamburlaine dramatizes the exploits of a fourteenth-century Mongol warrior who rose from humble origins to conquer a huge territory that extended from the Black Sea to Delhi. In some sixteenth-century chronicles, Tamburlaine is represented as God's scourge, the instrument of divine wrath. In Marlowe's play there are few if any glimpses of a transcendent design. His hero is the vehicle for the expression of boundless energy and ambition, the impulse to strive ceaselessly for absolute dominance. Yet Tamburlaine's conquests are achieved not only by force of arms, but also by his extraordinary mastery of language, his "high astounding terms." The English theater audience had never before heard such resonant, immensely energetic blank verse. The great period of Elizabethan drama was launched by what Ben Jonson called "Marlowe's mighty line."

From the time of his first theatrical success, when he was twenty-three, Marlowe had only six years to live. They were not calm years. In 1589 he was involved in a brawl with one William Bradley, in which the poet Thomas Watson intervened and killed Bradley. Both poets were jailed, but Watson got off on a plea of self-defense, and Marlowe was released. In 1591 Marlowe was living in London with the playwright Thomas Kyd, who later, under torture, gave information to the Privy Council accusing him of atheism and treason. On May 30, 1593, an informer named Bichard Baines submitted a note to the Council which, on the evidence of Marlowe's own alleged utterances, branded him with atheism, sedition, and homosexuality. Four days later, at an inn in the London suburb of Deptford, Marlowe was killed by a dagger thrust, purportedly in an argument over the bill. Modern scholars have discovered that the murderer and the others present in the room at the inn had connections to the world of spies, double agents, and swindlers to which Marlowe himself was in some way linked. Those who were arrested in connection with the murder were briefly held and then quietly released.

On the bare surface, Marlowe's tragic vision seems for the most part religiously and socially conventional. Tamburlaine at last suffers divine retribution and death at the end of the sequel, Tamburlaine Part II; the central character of The Jew of Malta is a monstrous anti-Semitic caricature; Doctor Faustus and Edward II (which treats the tragic fate of a homosexual king) demonstrate the destruction that awaits those who rebel against God or violate the official moral order. Yet there is a force at work in these plays that relentlessly questions and undermines conventional morality. The crime for which Tamburlaine is apparently struck down is the burning of the Muslim Koran; the Jew of Malta turns out to be, if anything, less ruthless and hypocritical than his Christian counterparts; and Edward II's life of homoerotic indulgence seems innocent in comparison with the cynical and violent dealings of the corrupt rebels who turn against him. In a way that goes far beyond the demands of moral instruction, Marlowe seems to revel in the depiction of flamboyant transgression, physical abjection, and brutal punishment. Whether as a radical pursuit of absolute liberty or an expression of sheer destructive negativity, Marlowe's plays, written in the turbulent years before his murder at the age of twenty-nine, have continued to fascinate and disturb readers and audiences.*

Hero and Leander

Marlowe's mythological erotic poem is a free and original treatment of a classic tale about two ill-fated lovers. The story derives from a version by the Alexandrian poet Musaeus (fifth century C.E.), but in its blend of poignancy and irony Hero and Leander is closer to that of the Roman poet Ovid, who briefly recounts the story in two epistles of his Heroides and who refers to it in one of his Elegies, which Marlowe translated.

Hero and Leander is a rich and elusive poem: it is comic, erotic, decorative, cruel; now swiftly narrative, now digressive, playful, and yet, in a light way, philosophical. The characters are evidently not intended to be consistent or psychologically credible; they inhabit a World of fancy, of strange contrasts between innocence and the wild riot of amorous intrigues among the gods that is Ovid's subject matter. Hero is paradoxically a nun vowed to chastity and a devotee of Venus, the love goddess; Leander is both a sharp, sophisticated seducer and an incredibly innocent novice in sex. The deadpan asides, with their irony, hyperbole, and cynicism mingling with exuberant delight in the body's instinctual freedom, heighten the poem's elusiveness, its cunning evasion of all fixed categories.

Hero and Leander cannot be precisely dated. Marlowe's translations of Ovid, to which Hero and Leander is closely related in spirit, are generally thought to be work of the later 1580s. But Marlowe may alternatively have been participating in a vogue for brief erotic epics (epyllia, as they are sometimes called) that dates from the early 1590s when Shakespeare composed his contribution to the genre, Venus and Adonis. Hero and Leander was entered in the Stationers' Register (a list of forthcoming titles) on September 28, 1593, four months after the poet's death, but the earliest known edition was not published until 1598.

Marlowe left his poem unfinished; George Chapman, the playwright and translator of Homer, undertook to complete it. Chapman's moralizing, weightily philosophical continuation, which divides the poem into "sestiads" (named after Sestos, where Hero lived), was published shortly after Marlowe's fragment. The work is printed here without Chapman's additions.

Hero and Leander

On Hellespont, guilty of true-loves'° blood, sweethearts'
In view and opposite, two cities stood,
Sea-borderers, disjoined by Neptune's might;
The one Abydos, the other Sestos hight.° called
At Sestos Hero dwelt; Hero the fair,
Whom young Apollo courted for her hair,
And offered as a dower his burning throne,
Where she should sit for men to gaze upon.
The outside of her garments were of lawn,[1]
The lining purple silk, with gilt stars drawn;
Her wide sleeves green, and bordered with a grove

[1] A kind of fine linen or thin cambric,

Where Venus in her naked glory strove
To please the careless and disdainful eyes
Of proud Adonis, that before her lies;[2]
Her kirtle° blue, whereon was many a stain, long dress
Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain.[3]
Upon her head she ware a myrtle wreath,
From whence her veil reached to the ground beneath.
Her veil was artificial flowers and leaves,
Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives;
Many would praise the sweet smell as she passed,
When 'twas the odor which her breath forth cast;
And there for honey, bees have sought in vain,
And, beat from thence, have lighted there again.
About her neck hung chains of pebble-stone,
Which, lightened° by her neck, like diamonds shone. illuminated
She ware no gloves, for neither sun nor wind
Would burn or parch her hands, but to her mind° as she wished
Or° warm or cool them, for they took delight either
To play upon those hands, they were so white.
Buskins° of shells all silvered used she, boots
And branched with blushing coral to the knee,
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold;
Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
Which, as she went,° would chirrup through the bills. walked
Some say, for her the fairest Cupid pined,
And looking in her face, was strooken blind.
But this is true: so like was one the other,
As he imagined Hero was his mother;° i.e., Venus
And oftentimes into her bosom flew,
About her naked neck his bare arms threw,
And laid his childish head upon her breast,
And with still° panting rocked, there took his rest. continual
So lovely fair was Hero, Venus' nun,[4]
As Nature wept, thinking she was undone,
Because she took more from her than she left
And of such wondrous beauty her bereft;
Therefore, in sign her° treasure suffered wrack,° i.e., Nature's / destruction
Since Hero's time hath half the world been black.
Amorous Leander, beautiful and young,
(Whose tragedy divine Musaeus[5] sung)
Dwelt at Abydos; since him dwelt there none
For whom succeeding times make greater moan.
His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
Had they been cut and unto Colchos borne,

[2] Venus's love for the young hunter Adonis and his death in a boar hunt are recounted by Ovid and by Shakespeare in Venus and Adonis.

[3] The extravagant claim is made that many "wretched lovers" had committed suicide at her feet because Hero would not have them.

[4] The connotations of these two words are contradictory. Hero is a maiden in attendance at the temple of Venus, who is, of course, the goddess of love.

[5] The author of the Greek poem on which Hero and Leander is remotely based. Though he lived in late antiquity (ca. 5th century C.E.), he was sometimes confused with a legendary early Musaeus, supposed son of Orpheus—hence Marlowe calls him "divine."

Would have allured the vent'rous youth of Greece[6]
To hazard more than for the Golden Fleece.
Fair Cynthia° wished his arms might be her sphere;°   the moon / orbit
Grief makes her pale, because she moves not there.
His body was as straight as Circe's wand;[7]
Jove might have sipped out nectar from his hand.
Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
So was his neck in touching, and surpassed
The white of Pelops' shoulder.[8] I could tell ye
How smooth his breast was, and how white his belly,
And whose immortal fingers did imprint
That heavenly path, with many a curious dint,°   exquisite indentation
That runs along his back; but my rude° pen   crude
Can hardly blazon forth the loves of men,
Much less of powerful gods; let it suffice
That my slack° muse sings of Leander's eyes,   dull
Those orient° cheeks and lips, exceeding his   shining
That leapt into the water for a kiss
Of his own shadow,° and despising many,   reflection
Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.[9]
Had wild Hippolytus[1] Leander seen,
Enamored of his beauty had he been;
His presence made the rudest peasant melt,
That in the vast uplandish country dwelt;
The barbarous Thracian soldier, moved with nought,
Was moved with him, and for his favor sought.
Some swore he was a maid in man's attire,
For in his looks were all that men desire:
A pleasant smiling cheek, a speaking° eye,   expressive
A brow for love to banquet royally;
And such as knew he was a man, would say,
"Leander, thou art made for amorous play;
Why art thou not in love, and loved of° all?   by Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall."°   captive
The men of wealthy Sestos every year,
For his sake whom their goddess held so dear,
Rose-cheeked Adonis, kept a solemn feast.
Thither resorted many a wandering guest
To meet their loves; such as had none at all
Came lovers home from this great festival;
For every street, like to a firmament,
Glistered° with breathing stars, who, where they went,   glittered
Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed
As if another Phaeton[2] had got
The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.
But, far above the loveliest, Hero shined,

[7] The wand with which Circe, in the Odyssey, turned men into beasts.

[1] Like Adonis, he preferred hunting to love.

[2] A son of the sun god, he drove his father's chariot erratically across the sky and almost burned up the world.

And stole away th' enchanted gazer's mind;
For like sea nymphs' inveigling° harmony, deceitful
So was her beauty to the standers by.
Nor that night-wandering pale and watery star° the moon
(When yawning dragons draw her thirling car
From Latmos' mount[3] up to the gloomy sky,
Where, crowned with blazing light and majesty,
She proudly sits) more over-rules° the flood° rules over / tide
Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
Even as when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,° hunt
Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,[4]
Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain
From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,
So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
And all that viewed her were enamored on her.
And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
Their fellows being slain or put to flight,
Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dead-strooken,
So at her presence all, surprised and tooken,
Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
He whom she favors lives, the other dies.
There might you see one sigh, another rage,
And some, their violent passions to assuage,
Compile sharp satires; but alas, too late,
For faithful love will never turn to hate.
And many, seeing great princes were denied,
Pined as they went, and thinking on her, died.
On this feast day, oh, cursed day and hour!
Went Hero thorough° Sestos, from her tower through
To Venus' temple, where unhappily,
As after chanced, they did each other spy.
So fair a church as this had Venus none;
The walls were of discolored° jasper stone, many-colored
Wherein was Proteus[5] carved, and o'erhead
A lively° vine of green sea-agate spread, lifelike
Where, by one hand, light-headed Bacchus[6] hung,
And with the other, wine from grapes out-wrung.
Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
The town of Sestos called it Venus' glass;° looking glass
There might° you see the gods in sundry shapes, could
Committing heady° riots, incest, rapes: passionate; violent
For know that underneath this radiant floor
Was Danae's statue in a brazen tower,
Jove slyly stealing from his sister's[7] bed
To dally with Idalian Ganymed,
And for his love Europa bellowing loud,[8]

And tumbling with the rainbow in a cloud;[9]
Blood-quaffing Mars heaving the iron net
Which limping Vulcan and his Cyclops set;[1]
Love kindling fire to burn such towns as Troy;
Sylvanus weeping for the lovely boy[2]
That now is turned into a cypress tree,
Under whose shade the wood-gods love to be.
And in the midst a silver altar stood;
There Hero sacrificing turtles'[3] blood,
Vailed° to the ground, veiling her eyelids close, bowed
And modestly they opened as she rose;
Thence flew love's arrow with the golden head,[4]
And thus Leander was enamored.
Stone still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
Till with the fire that from his countenance blazed,
Relenting Hero's gentle heart was strook;
Such force and virtue° hath an amorous look. power
It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is overruled by fate.
When two are stripped, long ere the course° begin race
We wish that one should lose, the other win;
And one especially do we affect° fancy
Of two gold ingots, like in each respect.
The reason no man knows, let it suffice,
What we behold is censured° by our eyes. judged
Where both deliberate, the love is slight;
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?[5]
He kneeled, but unto her devoutly prayed.
Chaste Hero to herself thus softly said,
"Were I the saint he worships, I would hear him,"
And as she spake those words, came somewhat near him.
He started up; she blushed as one ashamed,
Wherewith Leander much more was inflamed.
He touched her hand; in touching it she trembled:
Love deeply grounded hardly° is dissembled. with difficulty
These lovers parled° by the touch of hands; spoke
True love is mute, and oft amazed stands.
Thus while dumb signs their yielding hearts entangled,
The air with sparks of living fire was spangled,
And Night, deep drenched in misty Acheron,[6]
Heaved up her head, and half the world upon
Breathed darkness forth. (Dark night is Cupid's day.)
And now begins Leander to display
Love's holy fire, with words, with sighs and tears,
Which like sweet music entered Hero's ears,
And yet at every word she turned aside

Of that which hath no being do not boast:
Things that are not at all are never lost.
Men foolishly do call it virtuous:
What virtue is it that is born with us?[4]

Honor is purchased by the deeds we do.
Believe me, Hero, honor is not won
Until some honorable deed be done.
Seek you for chastity, immortal fame,
And know that some have wronged Diana's name?[5]

[9] A traditional concept, going back to Aristotle.

[1] God of marriage. "Never-singling": i.e., one who never separates, but always joins.

[2] For the impression that makes metal ("bullion") into a coin.

[3] Ancient philosophers, like Aristotle.

[4] I.e., a virtue is not a virtue unless it is acquired.

[5] I.e., no fame for chastity is secure. Even Diana, goddess of chastity, has been slandered.

Perhaps thy sacred priesthood makes thee loath.
Tell me, to whom madest thou that heedless oath?"
"To Venus," answered she, and as she spake,
Forth from those two tralucent cisterns° brake i.e., translucent eyes
A stream of liquid pearl, which down her face
Made milk-white paths whereon the gods might trace° go
To Jove's high court. He thus replied: "The rites
In which Love's beauteous empress most delights
Are banquets, Doric music,[6] midnight revel,
Plays, masques, and all that stern age counteth evil.
Thee as a holy idiot doth she scorn;
For thou, in vowing chastity, hast sworn
To rob her name and honor, and thereby
Commit'st a sin far worse than perjury—
Even sacrilege against her Deity,
Through regular and formal purity.
To expiate which sin, kiss and shake hands;
Such sacrifice as this Venus demands."
Thereat she smiled and did deny him so
As, put° thereby, yet might he hope for mo.° put off/more
Which makes him quickly reinforce his speech
And her in humble manner thus beseech:
"Though neither gods nor men may thee deserve,
Yet for her sake whom you have vowed to serve,
Abandon fruitless, cold Virginity,
The gentle Queen of Love's sole enemy.
Then shall you most resemble Venus' nun,
When Venus' sweet rites are performed and done.
Flint-breasted Pallas[7] joys in single life,
But Pallas and your mistress are at strife.
Love, Hero, then, and be not tyrannous,
But heal the heart that thou hast wounded thus,
Nor stain thy youthful years with avarice;[8]
Fair fools delight to be accounted nice.° shy, reluctant
The richest corn° dies, if it be not reaped; grain
Beauty alone is lost, too warily kept."
These arguments he used, and many more,
Wherewith she yielded, that was won before.
Hero's looks yielded, but her words made war:
Women are won when they begin to jar.° dispute
Thus, having swallowed Cupid's golden hook,
The more she strived, the deeper was she strook.
Yet, evilly° feigning anger, strove she still badly
And would be thought to grant against her will.
So having paused a while, at last she said:
"Who taught thee rhetoric to deceive a maid?
Aye me, such words as these should I abhor,
And yet I like them for the orator."
With that, Leander stooped to have embraced her,

[6] A solemn, military mode. Leander would more appropriately have said "Lydian" (as in Milton's "L'Allegro," line 136); Lydian music was soft and sensual.

[7] Athena, a rival goddess, usually portrayed in armor.

[8] I.e., by hoarding the treasure of her beauty.

But from his spreading arms away she cast her,
And thus bespake him: "Gentle youth, forbear
To touch the sacred garments which I wear.
    "Upon a rock, and underneath a hill,
Far from the town, where all is whist° and still, silent
Save that the sea, playing on yellow sand,
Sends forth a rattling murmur to the land,
Whose sound allures the golden Morpheus[9]
In silence of the night to visit us,
My turret stands, and there, God knows, I play
With Venus' swans and sparrows[1] all the day.
A dwarfish beldame° bears me company, old hag
That hops about the chamber where I lie
And spends the night, that might be better spent,
In vain discourse and apish° merriment. silly
Come thither." As she spake this, her tongue tripped,
For unawares "Come thither" from her slipped;
And suddenly her former color changed
And here and there her eyes through anger ranged.
And like a planet, moving several° ways,[2] different
At one self° instant, she, poor soul, assays° one and the same / tries
Loving, not to love at all, and every part
Strove to resist the motions of her heart;
And hands so pure, so innocent, nay, such
As might have made heaven stoop to have a touch,
Did she uphold to Venus, and again
Vowed spotless chastity, but all in vain.
Cupid beat down her prayers with his wings;
Her vows above the empty air he flings.
All deep enraged, his sinewy° bow he bent, strong
And shot a shaft that burning from him went,
Wherewith she, strooken, looked so dolefully
As made Love sigh to see his tyranny.
And as she wept, her tears to pearl he turned,
And wound them on his arm, and for her mourned.
Then towards the palace of the Destinies,° the Fates
Laden with languishment and grief, he flies,
And to those stern nymphs humbly made request
Both might enjoy each other and be blessed.
But with a ghastly dreadful countenance,
Threatening a thousand deaths at every glance,
They answered Love, nor would vouchsafe° so much grant
As one poor word, their hate to him was such.
Harken a while, and I will tell you why:
Heaven's winged herald, Jove-born Mercury,
The selfsame day that he asleep had laid
Enchanted Argus,[3] spied a country maid

[9] God of sleep. "Golden slumbers" was a common expression.

[1] Venus was often portrayed in a chariot drawn by swans, and sparrows were associated with her because of their traditional lechery.

[2] In Ptolemaic astronomy each planet moved in its own orbit or sphere but was also carried along in the motion of the surrounding spheres.

[3] Mercury (or Hermes), the messenger god with winged feet, put to sleep Argus, the hundred-eyed monster whom Juno had placed as a guard over Io, with whom her husband, Jupiter, was in love.

Whose careless hair, instead of pearl t' adorn it,
Glistered with dew, as one that seemed to scorn it;[4]
Her breath as fragrant as the morning rose,
Her mind pure, and her tongue untaught to glose.° deceive
Yet proud she was, for lofty pride that dwells
In towered courts is oft in shepherds' cells,° huts
And too-too well the fair vermilion knew,
And silver tincture of her cheeks, that drew
The love of every swain. On her, this god
Enamored was, and with his snaky rod[5]
Did charm her nimble feet and made her stay;
The while upon a hillock down he lay,
And sweetly on his pipe began to play,
And with smooth speech, her fancy to assay,° test
Till in his twining arms he locked her fast,
And then he wooed with kisses, and at last,
As shepherds do, her on the ground he laid,
And tumbling in the grass, he often strayed
Beyond the bounds of shame, in being bold
To eye those parts which no eye should behold;
And, like an insolent commanding lover,
Boasting his parentage, would needs discover
The way to new Elysium; but she,
Whose only dower was her chastity,
Having striven in vain, was now about to cry
And crave the help of shepherds that were nigh.
Herewith he stayed his fury,° and began passion
To give her leave to rise. Away she ran;
After went Mercury, who used such cunning
As she, to hear his tale, left off her running.
Maids are not won by brutish force and might,
But speeches full of pleasure and delight.
And knowing Hermes courted her, was glad
That she such loveliness and beauty had
As could provoke his liking, yet was mute,
And neither would deny nor grant his suit.
Still vowed he love; she, wanting° no excuse lacking
To feed him with delays, as women use,° as women usually do
Or thirsting after immortality
(All women are ambitious naturally),
Imposed upon her lover such a task
As he ought not perform, nor yet she ask.
A draft of flowing nectar she requested,
Wherewith the king of gods and men is feasted.
He, ready to accomplish what she willed,
Stole some from Hebe (Hebe Jove's cup filled)
And gave it to his simple rustic love,
Which being known (as what is hid from Jove?)
He inly stormed and waxed more furious
Than for the fire filched by Prometheus,
And thrusts him down from heaven. He, wandering here,

[4] I.e., pearl or other jewelry.

[5] The caduceus (now the symbol of medicine).

In mournful terms,° with sad and heavy cheer,° condition / countenance
Complained to Cupid. Cupid, for his sake,
To be revenged on Jove did undertake;
And those on whom heaven, earth, and hell relies
(I mean the adamantine[6] Destinies)
He wounds with love and forced them equally
To dote upon deceitful Mercury.
They offered him the deadly fatal knife
That shears the slender threads of human life;[7]
At his fair feathered feet the engines° laid contrivances
Which th' earth from ugly Chaos' den upweighed.[8]
These he regarded not, but did entreat
That Jove, usurper of his father's seat,
Might presently° be banished into hell immediately
And aged Saturn in Olympus dwell.
They granted what he craved,° and once again requested
Saturn and Ops began their golden reign.
Murder, rape, war, lust, and treachery
Were with Jove closed in Stygian empery.° realm
But long this blessed time continued not;
As soon as he his wished purpose got,
He, reckless of his promise, did despise
The love of th' everlasting Destinies.
They seeing it, both Love and him abhorred,
And Jupiter unto his place restored.[9]
And but that Learning, in despite of Fate,
Will mount aloft and enter heaven gate,
And to the seat of Jove itself advance,
Hermes had slept in hell with Ignorance.
Yet as a punishment they added this,
That he and Poverty should always kiss.[1]
And to this day is every scholar poor;
Gross gold from them runs headlong to the boor.° ignorant clod
Likewise the angry sisters, thus deluded,
To venge themselves on Hermes, have concluded
That Midas' brood[2] shall sit in Honor's chair,
To which the Muses' sons are only heir.
And fruitful wits° that inaspiring[3] are minds
Shall discontent run into regions far;

---

[6] Of extreme hardness (so called because the Destinies' decrees were irrevocable).

[7] According to classical mythology, the Fates spun and cut the thread that measures each human life.

[8] The Fates also controlled the supports that had held up ("upweighed") the earth since it arose out of Chaos, the yawning abyss from which all things came.

[9] The story in lines 451—64 may be summarized as follows: Mercury scorns the gifts offered by the Fates but asks instead that Jove be dethroned (Jove had overthrown his father, Saturn, who ruled heaven during the Golden Age). Mercury persuades the Fates to reverse this revolution, so Saturn and his wife, Ops, return to Olympus and Jove is thrust down into "Stygian empery" (line 458), or Hades. During the Golden Age there was no murder, rape, war, lust, or treachery; these came in with Jove, so when he is sent to Hades they go with him. But this second Golden Age did not last long, because once he got what he wanted, Mercury forgot the Destinies and they restored Jove.

[1] Marlowe invents the myth that Mercury, the god of learning, would have slept in hell with Ignorance were it not that Learning is so divine that it always mounts up, even to heaven, the "seat of Jove." But it was not beyond the Fates' power to make Learning and Poverty go together, which they decreed in revenge for Mercury's neglect.

[2] The rich, because everything Midas touched turned to gold; also the stupid, because Midas, judging a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, preferred the latter, against all sensible opinion.

[3] Not ambitious for riches or power.

And few great lords in virtuous deeds shall joy,
But be surprised with every garish toy,° trifle
And still° enrich the lofty servile clown° ever / ignorant person
Who, with encroaching guile, keeps learning down.
Then muse not° Cupid's suit no better sped, i.e., don't be surprised
Seeing in their loves the Fates were injured.
  By this, sad Hero, with love unacquainted,
Viewing Leander's face, fell down and fainted.
He kissed her and breathed life into her lips,
Wherewith, as one displeased, away she trips.
Yet as she went, full often looked behind,
And many poor excuses did she find
To linger by the way, and once she stayed
And would have turned again, but was afraid
In offering parley to be counted light.° immodest
So on she goes, and in her idle flight
Her painted fan of curled plumes let fall,
Thinking to train° Leander therewithal. entice
He, being a novice, knew not what she meant,
But stayed, and after her a letter sent,
Which joyful Hero answered in such sort
As he had hope to scale the beauteous fort
Wherein the liberal Graces[4] locked their wealth,
And therefore to her tower he got by stealth.
Wide open stood the door; he need not climb,
And she herself before the pointed° time appointed
Had spread the board,° with roses strewed the room, set the table
And oft looked out, and mused° he did not come. -wondered
At last he came; O who can tell the greeting
These greedy lovers had at their first meeting?
He asked, she gave, and nothing was denied;
Both to each other quickly were affied.° engaged
Look how° their hands, so were their hearts united, just as
And what he did, she willingly requited.
(Sweet are the kisses, the embracements sweet,
When like desires and affections meet,
For from the earth to heaven is Cupid raised
Where fancy is in equal balance peised.°) weighed
Yet she this rashness suddenly repented
And turned aside and to herself lamented,
As if her name and honor had been wronged
By being possessed of him for whom she longed.
Ay, and she wished, albeit not from her heart,
That he would leave her turret and depart.
The mirthful god of amorous pleasure smiled
To see how he this captive nymph beguiled,° deceived
For hitherto he did but fan the fire
And kept it down that it might mount the higher.
Now waxed she jealous° lest his love abated, possessively fearful
Fearing her own thoughts made her to be hated.
Therefore unto him hastily she goes

[4] Three goddesses, embodying aspects of beauty.

And, like light Salmacis,[5] her body throws
Upon his bosom where, with yielding eyes,
She offers up herself a sacrifice
To slake his anger, if he were displeased.
O what god would not therewith be appeased?
Like Aesop's cock,[6] this jewel he enjoyed,
And as a brother with his sister toyed,
Supposing nothing else was to be done,
Now he her favor and good will had won.
But know you not that creatures wanting sense° lacking intelligence
By nature have a mutual appetence,[7]
And wanting organs to advance a step,
Moved by love's force, unto each other leap?
Much more in subjects having intellect
Some hidden influence breeds like effect.
Albeit Leander, rude° in love and raw, untutored
Long dallying with Hero, nothing saw
That might delight him more, yet he suspected
Some amorous rites or other were neglected.
Therefore unto his body, hers he clung;
She, fearing on the rushes[8] to be flung,
Strived with redoubled strength; the more she strived,
The more a gentle, pleasing heat revived,
Which taught him all that elder lovers know.
And now the same gan so to scorch and glow,
As, in plain terms, yet cunningly,° he craved° it. skillfully / asked for (Love always makes those eloquent that have it.)
She, with a kind of granting, put him by it,
And, ever as he thought himself most nigh it,
Like to the tree of Tantalus,[9] she fled,
And, seeming lavish, saved her maidenhead.
Ne'er king more sought to keep his diadem
Than Hero this inestimable gem.
Above our life we love a steadfast friend;
Yet, when a token of great worth we send,
We often kiss it, often look thereon,
And stay the messenger that would be gone.
No marvel then, though Hero would not yield
So soon to part from that she dearly held.
Jewels being lost are found again, this never;
'Tis lost but once, and once lost, lost forever.
Now had the Morn espied her lover's steeds,[1]
Whereat she starts, puts on her purple weeds,° clothes
And, red for anger that he stayed so long,
All headlong throws herself the clouds among.
And now Leander, fearing to be missed,
Embraced her suddenly, took leave, and kissed;
Long was he taking leave, and loath to go,

[5] An amorous nymph in Ovid's Metamor-phoses.

[6] In Aesop's fable, a cock, scratching in the barnyard, uncovers a jewel but prefers a barleycorn to it.

[7] Attraction, as iron to a magnet.

[8] Reeds used as carpeting in Elizabethan homes.

[9] Tantalus was punished in Hades by constantly reaching for fruit from a tree that eluded him and by trying to drink water that also escaped him.

[1] The horses that pull the chariot of the sun.

And kissed again, as lovers use° to do. are accustomed,
Sad Hero wrung him by the hand and wept,
Saying, "Let your vows and promises be kept."
Then, standing at the door, she turned about,
As loath to see Leander going out.
And now the sun that through th' horizon peeps,
As pitying these lovers, downward creeps,
So that in silence of the cloudy night,
Though it was morning, did he take his flight.
But what the secret trusty night concealed,
Leander's amorous habit° soon revealed. dress
With Cupid's myrtle[2] was his bonnet° crowned; hat
About his arms the purple riband° wound ribbon
Wherewith she wreathed her largely spreading hair;
Nor could the youth abstain but he must wear
The sacred ring wherewith she was endowed
When first religious chastity she vowed;
Which made his love through Sestos to be known,
And thence unto Abydos sooner blown
Than he could sail, for incorporeal Fame,
Whose weight consists in nothing but her name,
Is swifter than the wind, whose tardy plumes
Are reeking water and dull earthly fumes.[3]
Home when he came, he seemed not to be there,
But like exiled air thrust from his sphere,
Set in a foreign place, and straight from thence,
Alcides-like,[4] by mighty violence
He would have chased away the swelling main
That him from her unjustly did detain.
Like as the sun in a diameter[5]
Fires and inflames objects removed far,
And heateth kindly, shining lat'rally,[6]
So beauty sweetly quickens° when 'tis nigh, gives life
But being separated and removed,
Burns where it cherished, murders where it loved.
Therefore, even as an index to a book,
So to his mind was young Leander's look.
O none but gods have power their love to hide:
Affection by the count'nance is descried.° revealed
The light of hidden fire itself discovers,
And love that is concealed betrays° poor lovers. gives away
His secret flame apparently° was seen; openly
Leander's father knew where he had been,
And for the same mildly rebuked his son,
Thinking to quench the sparkles new begun.
But love, resisted once, grows passionate,
And nothing more than counsel lovers hate.
For as a hot, proud horse highly disdains

[2] A plant sacred to Venus or Cupid, symbolic of love.

[3] I.e., fame is as incorporeal as mist or smoke.

[4] Like Hercules, with brute force.

[5] I.e., shining straight down at noon.

[6] I.e., when it is lower in the sky. The idea is that the sun, paradoxically, causes harm only when it appears to be farthest away (at the zenith). Beauty, Marlowe goes on to claim, works the same way.

To have his head controlled, but breaks the reins,
Spits forth the ringled° bit, and with his hooves with rings at the ends
Checks° the submissive ground; so he that loves, stamps
The more he is restrained, the worse he fares.
What is it now but mad Leander dares?[7]
"O Hero, Hero!" thus he cried full oft,
And then he got him to a rock aloft,
Where, having spied her tower, long stared he on t
And prayed the narrow toiling Hellespont
To part in twain, that he might come and go;
But still the rising billows answered "No!"
With that he stripped him to the ivory skin,
And crying, "Love, I come!" leapt lively in.
Whereat the sapphire-visaged god° grew proud,[8] Neptune, god of the sea
And made his capering Triton[9] sound aloud;
Imagining that Ganimed,[1] displeased,
Had left the heavens, therefore on him seized.
Leander strived; the waves about him wound
And pulled him to the bottom, where the ground
Was strewed with pearl, and in low coral groves
Sweet singing mermaids sported with their loves
On heaps of heavy gold and took great pleasure
To spurn in careless sort° the shipwrack treasure; manner
For here the stately azure palace stood
Where kingly Neptune and his train abode.
The lusty god embraced him, called him love,
And swore he never should return to Jove.
But when he knew it was not Ganimed,
For under water he was almost dead,
He heaved him up, and looking on his face,
Beat down the bold waves with his triple mace,[2]
Which mounted up, intending to have kissed him,
And fell in drops like tears because they missed him.
Leander being up, began to swim,
And, looking back, saw Neptune follow him;
Whereat aghast, the poor soul gan to cry,
"O let me visit Hero ere I die!"
The god put Helle's bracelet[3] on his arm,
And swore the sea should never do him harm.
He clapped his plump cheeks, with his tresses played,
And, smiling wantonly, his love bewrayed.° revealed
He watched his arms, and as they opened wide,
At every stroke betwixt them he would slide
And steal a kiss, and then run out and dance
And, as he turned, cast many a lustful glance
And throw him gaudy toys to please his eye,
And dive into the water and there pry

[7] I.e., what is there now Leander dares not do?

[8] The primary sense is probably "became sexually aroused."

[9] A subordinate sea god who blew on a conch shell.

[1] Ganymede, a beautiful boy taken by Jove to be his cupbearer.

[2] The three-pronged fork carried by Neptune.

[3] Helle was the daughter of King Athamas of Thebes. To escape a cruel stepmother, she fled on a winged, golden-fleeced ram but fell off into the Hellespont, which was named for her. Marlowe apparently invented the detail of the bracelet.

Upon his breast, his thighs, and every limb,
And up again and close beside him swim,
And talk of love. Leander made reply,
"You are deceived; I am no woman, I."
Thereat smiled Neptune, and then told a tale
How that a shepherd, sitting in a vale,
Played with a boy so lovely fair and kind,
As for his love both earth and heaven pined;
That of the cooling river durst not drink,
Lest water nymphs should pull him from the brink;
And when he sported in the fragrant lawns,
Goat-footed satyrs and up-staring fawns[4]
Would steal him thence. Ere half this tale was done
"Ay me!" Leander cried, "th' enamored sun
That now should shine on Thetis' glassy bower[5]
Descends upon my radiant Hero's tower.
O that these tardy arms of mine were wings!"
And as he spake, upon the waves he springs.
Neptune was angry that he gave no ear,
And in his heart revenging malice bare.
He flung at him his mace, but as it went
He called it in, for love made him repent.
The mace returning back, his own hand hit,
As meaning to be venged for darting it.
When this fresh bleeding wound Leander viewed,
His color went and came, as if he rued° regretted
The grief° which Neptune felt. In gentle breasts pain
Relenting thoughts, remorse, and pity rests;
And who have hard hearts and obdurate minds
But vicious, harebrained, and illit'rate hinds?° rustics
The god, seeing him with pity to be moved,
Thereon concluded that he was beloved.
(Love is too full of faith, too credulous,
With folly and false hope deluding us.)
Wherefore Leander's fancy to surprise,° i.e., to capture his love
To the rich ocean for gifts he flies.
'Tis wisdom to give much; a gift prevails
When deep persuading oratory fails.
By this° Leander, being near the land, by this time
Cast down his weary feet and felt the sand.
Breathless albeit he were, he rested not Till to the solitary tower he got,
And knocked and called; at which celestial noise
The longing heart of Hero much more joys
Than nymphs and shepherds when the timbrel° rings, tambourine
Or crooked[6] dolphin when the sailor sings.
She stayed not for her robes, but straight arose
And, drunk with gladness, to the door she goes;
Where, seeing a naked man, she screeched for fear

---

[4] Woodland spirits, who prophesied by looking up to the heavens.

[5] I.e., the sea; Thetis was a sea nymph, mother of the hero Achilles.

[6] "Crooked" because of the undulating path of the dolphin in the water. The musician Arion was saved from drowning by a dolphin charmed by his music.

(Such sights as this to tender maids are rare)
And ran into the dark herself to hide.
Rich jewels in the dark are soonest spied.
Unto her was he led, or rather drawn
By those white limbs which sparkled through the lawn.° fine linen
The nearer that he came, the more she fled,
And, seeking refuge, slipped into her bed.
Whereon Leander sitting, thus began,
Through numbing cold, all feeble, faint, and wan:
"If not for love, yet, love, for pity's sake
Me in thy bed and maiden bosom take;
At least vouchsafe° these arms some little room, grant
Who, hoping to embrace thee, cheerly° swum. gladly
This head was beat with many a churlish billow,
And therefore let it rest upon thy pillow."
Herewith affrighted Hero shrunk away
And in her lukewarm place Leander lay;
Whose lively heat, like fire from heaven fet,° fetched
Would animate gross clay, and higher set
The drooping thoughts of base declining souls
Than dreary° Mars° carousing nectar bowls. bloody/god of-war
His hands he cast upon her like a snare;
She, overcome with shame and sallow fear,
Like chaste Diana when Actaeon[7] spied her,
Being suddenly betrayed, dived down to hide her,
And as her silver body downward went,
With both her hands she made the bed a tent,
And in her own mind thought herself secure,
O'ercast with dim and darksome coverture.
And now she lets him whisper in her ear,
Flatter, entreat, promise, protest, and swear;
Yet ever as he greedily assayed° tried
To touch those dainties, she the Harpy[8] played,
And every limb did, as a soldier stout,
Defend the fort and keep the foeman out.
For though the rising ivory mount he scaled,
Which is with azure circling lines empaled,° surrounded
Much like a globe (a globe may I term this,
By which love sails to regions full of bliss),
Yet there with Sisyphus[9] he toiled in vain,
Till gentle parley did the truce obtain.[1]
Wherein Leander on her quivering breast,
Breathless spoke something, and sighed out the rest;
Which so prevailed, as he, with small ado,
Enclosed her in his arms and kissed her, too.

[7] A hunter who happened on Diana bathing. She turned him into a stag, and he was killed by his own hounds.

[8] A monster, half-bird, half-woman, who snatches away banquets in Virgil's Aeneid and Shakespeare's Tempest.

[9] Condemned in Hades endlessly to roll a stone uphill.

[1] In both the authoritative early printings of the poem (1598), the lines here numbered 775—84 follow at this point (that is, they precede the lines here numbered 763—74). Like almost all modern editors, though, we have adopted the rearrangement first made in 1910 by Tucker Brooke, in his edition of Marlowe's Works. The original order, Brooke thought, did not make good sense; he hypothesized that two sheets of Marlowe's manuscript had been accidentally reversed by the time (five years after his death) the poem was printed. Students may, though, want to read the passage both ways and make up their own minds as to which order is preferable.

And every kiss to her was as a charm,
And to Leander as a fresh alarm,° call to battle
So that the truce was broke, and she, alas,
Poor silly° maiden, at his mercy was. innocent
Love is not full of pity, as men say,
But deaf and cruel, where he means to prey.
Even as a bird which in our hands we wring
Forth plungeth and oft flutters with her wing,
She trembling strove; this strife of hers, like that
Which made the world,[2] another world begat
Of unknown joy. Treason was in her thought,
And cunningly to yield herself she sought.
Seeming not won, yet won she was, at length.
(In such wars women use but half their strength.)
Leander now, like Theban Hercules,
Entered the orchard of th' Hesperides,
Whose fruit none rightly can describe but he
That pulls or shakes it from the golden tree.[3]
And now she wished this night were never done,
And sighed to think upon th' approaching sun,
For much it grieved her that the bright daylight
Should know the pleasure of this blessed night,
And them like Mars and Erycine[4] displayed,
Both in each other's arms chained as they laid.
Again she knew not how to frame her look
Or speak to him who in a moment took
That which so long so charily° she kept; carefully
And fain° by stealth away she would have crept gladly
And to some corner secretly have gone,
Leaving Leander in the bed alone.
But as her naked feet were whipping out,
He on the sudden clinged her so about
That mermaid-like unto the floor she slid:
One half appeared, the other half was hid.
Thus near the bed she blushing stood upright;
And from her countenance behold ye might
A kind of twilight break, which through the hair,
As from an orient° cloud, glims° here and there, bright /gleams
And round about the chamber this false morn
Brought forth the day before the day was born.
So Hero's ruddy cheek Hero betrayed,
And her all naked to his sight displayed,
Whence his admiring eyes more pleasure took
Than Dis[5] on heaps of gold fixing his look.
By this Apollo's golden harp began
To sound forth music to the Ocean,
Which watchful Hesperus[6] no sooner heard
But he the day's bright-bearing car prepared,

[4] A name for Venus, who was caught in bed with Mars by her husband, Vulcan, who cast a fine chain net over them.

[5] Pluto, god of the underworld and of wealth.

[6] The evening star; one would expect Lucifer, the morning star.

And ran before, as harbinger of light,
And with his flaring beams mocked ugly Night
Till she, o'ercome with anguish, shame, and rage,
Danged° down to hell her loathsome carriage. hurled
Desunt nonnulla.° something is lacking

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love[1]

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove° test, experience
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies,° bouquets (also of poems)
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle° dress
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

Doctor FailStllS Marlowe's major dramas, Tamburlaine, The Jew of Malta, and Doctor Faustus, all portray heroes who passionately seek power—the power of rule, the power of money, and the power of knowledge, respectively. Each of the heroes is an overreacher, striving to get beyond the conventional boundaries established to contain the human will.

[1] This pastoral lyric of invitation is one of the most famous of Elizabethan songs, and a few lines from it are sung in Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor. Many poets have written replies to it, the best known of which is by Sir Walter Ralegh (p. 917). Go to Norton Literature Online for a recitation of Marlowe's poem.

Unlike Tamburlaine, whose aim and goal is "the sweet fruition of an earthly crown," and Barabas, the Jew of Malta, who lusts for "infinite riches in a little room," Faustus seeks the mastery and voluptuous pleasure that come from forbidden knowledge. To achieve his goal Faustus must make—or chooses to make—a bargain with Lucifer. This is an old folklore motif, but it would have been taken seriously in a time when belief in the reality of devils was almost universal. The story's power over its original audience is vividly suggested by the numerous accounts of uncanny events at performances of the play: strange noises in the theater or extra devils who suddenly appeared among the actors on stage, causing panic.

In the opening soliloquy, Marlowe's Faustus bids farewell to each of his studies-logic, medicine, law, and divinity—as something he has used up. He turns instead to black magic, but the devil exacts a fearful price in exchange: the eternal damnation of Faustus's soul. Faustus aspires to be more than a man: "A sound magician is a mighty god," he declares. His fall is caused by the same pride and ambition that caused the fall of the angels in heaven and of humankind in the Garden of Eden. But it is characteristic of Marlowe that he makes this aspiration nonetheless magnificent.

The immediate source of the play is a German narrative called, in its English translation, The History of the Damnable Life and Deserved Death of Doctor John Faustus. That source supplies Marlowe's drama with the scenes of horseplay and low practical joking that contrast so markedly with the passages of huge ambition. It is quite possible that these comic scenes are the work of a collaborator; but no other Elizabethan could have written the first scene (with its brilliant representation of the insatiable aspiring mind of the hero), the ecstatic address to Helen of Troy, or the searing scene of Faustus's last hour. And though compared with these celebrated passages the comic scenes often seem crude, they too contribute to the overarching vision of Faustus's fate: the half-trivial, half-daring exploits, the alternating states of bliss and despair, the questions that are not answered and the answers that bring no real satisfaction, the heroic wanderings that lead nowhere.

Marlowe's play exists in two very different forms: the A text (1604) and the much longer B text (1616), which probably incorporates additions by other hands and which has also been revised to conform to the severe censorship statutes of 1606. We use Roma Gill's edition, based on the A text. Following the play are parallel versions of a key scene that will enable the reader to compare the two texts.

[Enter CHORUS.][2]

CHORUS Not marching now in fields of Thrasimene,
Where Mars[3] did mate° the Carthaginians, join with
Nor sporting in the dalliance of love,
In courts of kings where state° is overturned, political power
Nor in the pomp of proud audacious deeds,
Intends our Muse to vaunt his heavenly verse:
Only this (Gentlemen) we must perform,
The form of Faustus' fortunes good or bad.
To patient judgments we appeal our plaud,° applause
And speak for Faustus in his infancy:
Now is he born, his parents base of stock,
In Germany, within a town called Rhodes;
Of riper years to Wittenberg[4] he went,
Whereas° his kinsmen chiefly brought him up. where
So soon he profits in divinity,° theology
The fruitful plot of scholarism graced,
That shortly he was graced with doctor's name,[5]
Excelling all, whose sweet delight disputes[6]

---

[2] A single actor who recited a prologue to an act or a whole play, and occasionally delivered an epilogue.
[3] God of war. The battle of Lake Trasimene (217 B.C.E.) was one of the Carthaginian leader Hannibal's great victories.
[4] The famous university where Martin Luther studied, as did Shakespeare's Hamlet and Horatio. "Rhodes": Roda, or Stadtroda, in Germany.
[5] The lines play on two senses of graced: he so (1) adorned the place ("plot") of scholarship—i.e., the university—that shortly he was (2) honored with a doctor's degree.
[6] Referring to formal disputations, academic exercises that took the place of examinations.

In heavenly matters of theology.
Till, swollen with cunning,° of a self-conceit, knowledge
His waxen wings did mount above his reach,
And melting heavens conspired his overthrow.[7]
For falling to a devilish exercise,
And glutted more with learning's golden gifts,
He surfeits upon cursed necromancy:° black magic
Nothing so sweet as magic is to him,
Which he prefers before his chiefest bliss.[8]
And this the man[9] that in his study sits. [Exit.]

SCENE 1

[Enter FAUSTUS in his study.]

FAUSTUS Settle thy studies, Faustus, and begin
To sound the depth of that thou wilt profess:
Having commenced, be a divine in show,[1]
Yet level° at the end of every art, aim
And live and die in Aristotle's works.
Sweet Analytics, 'tis thou hast ravished me:
Bene disserere est finis logices.[2]
Is to dispute well logic's chiefest end?
Affords this art no greater miracle?
Then read no more, thou hast attained the end;
A greater subject fitteth Faustus' wit.° intellect
Bid on kai me on farewell;[3] Galen come:
Seeing, uhi desinit philosophus, ihi incipit medicus.[4]
Be a physician, Faustus, heap up gold,
And be eternized for some wondrous cure.
Summum bonum medicinae sanitas:[5]
The end of physic° is our body's health. medicine
Why Faustus, hast thou not attained that end?
Is not thy common talk found aphorisms?[6]
Are not thy bills° hung up as monuments, prescriptions
Whereby whole cities have escaped the plague,
And thousand desperate maladies been eased?
Yet art thou still but Faustus, and a man.
Couldst thou make men to live eternally,
Or, being dead, raise them to life again,
Then this profession were to be esteemed.
Physic farewell! Where is Justinian?[7]
Si una eademque res legatur duohus,
Alter rem alter valorem rei, etc.[8]
A pretty case of paltry legacies:
Exhereditare filium non potest pater nisi . . .[9]

---

[7] In Greek myth, Icarus flew too near the sun on wings of feathers and wax made by his father, Daedalus; the wax melted, and he fell into the sea and drowned.

[8] The salvation of his soul.

[9] Apparently a cue for the Chorus to draw aside the curtain to the enclosed space at the rear of the stage.

[1] In external appearance. "Commenced"; graduated, i.e., received the doctor's degree.

[2] "To carry on a disputation well is the end [or purpose] of logic" (Latin). Analytics: the title of two treatises on logic by Aristotle.

[3] The Greek phrase means "being and not being"; i.e., philosophy.

[4] "Where the philosopher leaves off the physician begins" (Latin). Galen: the ancient authority on medicine (2nd century C.E.).

[5] The Latin is translated in the following line.

[6] I.e., generally accepted wisdom.

[7] Roman emperor and authority on law (483—565 C.E.).

[8] "If something is bequeathed to two persons, one shall have the thing itself, the other something of equal value."

[9] "A father cannot disinherit his son unless . . ."

Such is the subject of the Institute,
And universal body of the law:
This study fits a mercenary drudge
Who aims at nothing but external trash!
Too servile and illiberal for me.
When all is done, divinity is best:
Jerome's Bible,[1] Faustus, view it well:
Stipendium peccati mors est:[2] ha! Stipendium, etc.
The reward of sin is death? That's hard.
Si pecasse negamus, fallimur, et nulla est in nobis Veritas.[3]
If we say that we have no sin,
We deceive ourselves, and there's no truth in us.
Why then belike° we must sin, in all likelihood
And so consequently die.
Ay, we must die an everlasting death.
What doctrine call you this? Che sara, sara
What will be, shall be! Divinity, adieu!
These metaphysics° of magicians, occult lore
And necromantic books are heavenly!
Lines, circles, schemes, letters, and characters!
Ay, these are those that Faustus most desires.
O what a world of profit and delight,
Of power, of honor, of omnipotence
Is promised to the studious artisan![4]
All things that move between the quiet° poles unmoving
Shall be at my command: emperors and kings
Are but obeyed in their several° provinces, separate
Nor can they raise the wind, or rend the clouds;
But his dominion that exceeds in this
Stretcheth as far as doth the mind of man:
A sound magician is a mighty god.
Here Faustus, try thy brains to gain a deity.
[Enter WAGNER.]
Wagner, commend me to my dearest friends,
The German Valdes and Cornelius,
Request them earnestly to visit me.
WAGNER I will, sir. [Exit.]
FAUSTUS Their conference will be a greater help to me
Than all my labors, plod I ne'er so fast.
[Enter the GOOD ANGEL and the EVIL ANGEL.]
GOOD ANGEL O Faustus, lay that damned book aside,
And gaze not on it, lest it tempt thy soul,
And heap God's heavy wrath upon thy head:
Read, read the Scriptures; that is blasphemy.
EVIL ANGEL GO forward, Faustus, in that famous art,
Wherein all nature's treasury is contained:
Be thou on earth as Jove[5] is in the sky,
Lord and commander of these elements. [Exeunt.]

---

[1] The Latin translation, or "Vulgate," of St. Jerome (ca. 340-420 C.E.).

[2] Romans 6.23. But Faustus reads only half of the Scripture verse: "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

[3] 1 John 1.8 (translated in the following two lines).

[4] A practitioner of an art; here, necromancy.

[5] God—a common substitution in Elizabethan drama.

FAUSTUS How am I glutted with conceit° of this! filled with the idea
Shall I make spirits fetch me what I please,
Resolve me of all ambiguities,
Perform what desperate enterprise I will?
I'll have them fly to India[6] for gold,
Ransack the ocean for orient pearl,
And search all corners of the new-found world
For pleasant fruits and princely delicates.
I'll have them read me strange philosophy,
And tell the secrets of all foreign kings;
I'll have them wall all Germany with brass,
And make swift Rhine circle fair Wittenberg;[7]
I'll have them fill the public schools[8] with silk,
Wherewith the students shall be bravely° clad. splendidly
I'll levy soldiers with the coin they bring,
And chase the Prince of Parma[9] from our land,
And reign sole king of all our provinces.
Yea, stranger engines for the brunt of war
Than was the fiery keel at Antwerp's bridge,[1]
I'll make my servile spirits to invent.
Come German Valdes and Cornelius,
And make me blest with your sage conference.
[Enter VALDES and CORNELIUS.]
Valdes, sweet Valdes, and Cornelius,
Know that your words have won me at the last
To practise magic and concealed arts;
Yet not your words only, but mine own fantasy,° imagination
That will receive no object[2] for my head,
But ruminates on necromantic skill.
Philosophy is odious and obscure,
Both law and physic are for petty wits;
Divinity is basest of the three,
Unpleasant, harsh, contemptible, and vile.
'Tis magic, magic that hath ravished me.
Then, gentle friends, aid me in this attempt,
And I, that have with concise syllogisms
Graveled° the pastors of the German church, confounded
And made the flowering pride of Wittenberg
Swarm to my problems,[3] as the infernal spirits
On sweet Musaeus when he came to hell,
Will be as cunning as Agrippa was,
Whose shadows made all Europe honor him.[4]
VALDES Faustus, these books, thy wit,° and our experience intellect
Shall make all nations to canonize us.
As Indian Moors[5] obey their Spanish lords,

---

[6] "India" could refer to the West Indies, America, or Ophir (in the east).
[7] Wittenberg is in fact on the Elbe River.
[8] The university lecture rooms.
[9] The duke of Parma was the Spanish governor-general of the Low Countries, 1579—92.
[1] A reference to the burning ship sent by the Protestant Netherlanders in 1585 against the barrier on the river Scheldt that Parma had built as a part of the blockade of Antwerp.
[2] That will pay no attention to physical reality.
[3] Questions posed for public academic disputation.
[4] Cornelius Agrippa, German author of The Vanity and Uncertainty of Arts and Sciences (1530), was popularly supposed to have had the power of calling up the "shadows" or shades of the dead. Musaeus was a mythical singer, son of Orpheus; it was, however, Orpheus who charmed the denizens of hell with his music.
[5] Dark-skinned native Americans.

So shall the spirits of every element
Be always serviceable to us three.
Like lions shall they guard us when we please,
Like Almaine rutters° with their horsemen's staves, German horsemen
Or Lapland giants trotting by our sides;
Sometimes like women, or unwedded maids,
Shadowing° more beauty in their airy brows harboring
Than in the white breasts of the Queen of Love.
From Venice shall they drag huge argosies,
And from America the golden fleece
That yearly stuffs old Philip's° treasury, Philip II, king of Spain
If learned Faustus will be resolute.
FAUSTUS Valdes, as resolute am I in this
As thou to live, therefore object it not.[6]
CORNELIUS The miracles that magic will perform
Will make thee vow to study nothing else.
He that is grounded in astrology,
Enriched with tongues,° well seen° in minerals, languages / expert
Hath all the principles magic doth require:
Then doubt not, Faustus, but to be renowned
And more frequented for this mystery° craft
Than heretofore the Delphian oracle.[7]
The spirits tell me they can dry the sea,
And fetch the treasure of all foreign wrecks,
Ay, all the wealth that our forefathers hid Within the massy° entrails of the earth. massive
Then tell me, Faustus, what shall we three want?° lack FAUSTUS Nothing, Cornelius. O this cheers my soul!
Come, show me some demonstrations magical,
That I may conjure in some lusty° grove, pleasant
And have these joys in full possession.
VALDES Then haste thee to some solitary grove,
And bear wise Bacon's and Abanus'[8] works,
The Hebrew Psalter, and New Testament;
And whatsoever else is requisite
We will inform thee ere our conference cease.
CORNELIUS Valdes, first let him know the words of art,
And then, all other ceremonies learned,
Faustus may try his cunning by himself.
VALDES First, I'll instruct thee in the rudiments,
And then wilt thou be perfecter° than I. more accomplished
FAUSTUS Then come and dine with me, and after meat
We'll canvass every quiddity° thereof: essential feature
For ere I sleep, I'll try what I can do.
This night I'll conjure,° though I die therefore. call up spirits
[Exeunt.]

SCENE 2

[Enter two SCHOLARS.]

1 SCHOLAR I wonder what's become of Faustus, that was wont to make our schools ring with sic probo.[9]

---

[6] I.e., do not make an issue of my resolve.
[7] The oracle of Apollo at Delphi in Greece.
[8] Roger Bacon, the 13th-century friar and scientist popularly thought to be a magician, and Pietro dAbano, 13th-century alchemist.
[9] Thus I prove; a phrase in scholastic disputation.

2 SCHOLAR That shall we know; for see, here comes his boy.[1]

[Enter WAGNER.]

SCHOLAR How now sirra, where's thy master?

WAGNER God in heaven knows.

2 SCHOLAR Why, dost not thou know?

WAGNER Yes I know, but that follows not.

1 SCHOLAR GO to sirra, leave your jesting, and tell us where he is.

WAGNER That follows not necessary by force of argument, that you, being licentiates,[2] should stand upon't; therefore acknowledge your error, and be attentive.

2 SCHOLAR Why, didst thou not say thou knew'st?

WAGNER Have you any witness on't?

1 SCHOLAR Yes sirra, I heard you.

WAGNER Ask my fellow if I be a thief.

2 SCHOLAR Well, you will not tell us.

WAGNER Yes sir, I will tell you; yet if you were not dunces you would never ask me such a question. For is not he corpus naturale? And is not that mobile?[3] Then wherefore should you ask me such a question? But that I am by nature phlegmatic,[4] slow to wrath, and prone to lechery—to love I would say—it were not for you to come within forty foot of the place of execution,[5] although I do not doubt to see you both hanged the next sessions. Thus having triumphed over you, I will set my countenance like a precisian,[6] and begin to speak thus: Truly my dear brethren, my master is within at dinner with Valdes and Cornelius, as this wine, if it could speak, it would inform your worships. And so the Lord bless you, preserve you, and keep you, my dear brethren, my dear brethren. [Exit.]

1 SCHOLAR Nay then, I fear he is fallen into that damned art, for which they two are infamous through the world.

2 SCHOLAR Were he a stranger, and not allied to me, yet should I grieve for him. But come, let us go and inform the Rector,[7] and see if he by his grave counsel can reclaim him.

1 SCHOLAR Ay, but I fear me nothing can reclaim him.

2 SCHOLAR Yet let us try what we can do. [Exeunt.]

SCENE 3

[Enter FAUSTUS to conjure.]

FAUSTUS NOW that the gloomy shadow of the earth,
Longing to view Orion's drizzling look,[8]
Leaps from th'antarctic world unto the sky,
And dims the welkin° with her pitchy breath, sky
Faustus, begin thine incantations,
And try if devils will obey thy hest,° command
Seeing thou hast prayed and sacrificed to them.
Within this circle[9] is Jehovah's name,

---

[1] Poor student acting as servant to earn his living.

[2] Graduate students.

[3] Corpus naturale et mobile ("matter natural and movable") was a scholastic definition of the subject matter of physics. Wagner is here parodying the language of learning at the university.

[4] Dominated by the phlegm, one of the four humors of medieval and Renaissance medicine and psychology.

[5] The dining room.

[6] Puritan. The rest of his speech is in the style of the Puritans. "Sessions": sittings of a court.

[7] The head of a German university.

[8] The constellation Orion appears at the beginning of winter. The phrase is a reminiscence of Virgil.

[9] The magic circle drawn on the ground, within which the magician would be safe from the spirits he conjured.

Forward and backward anagrammatized;
Th'abbreviated names of holy saints,
Figures of every adjunct to the heavens,
And characters of signs and erring stars,[1]
By which the spirits are enforced to rise.
Then fear not Faustus, but be resolute,
And try the uttermost magic can perform.
Sint mihi dei Acherontis propitii! Valeat numen triplex Jehovae! Ignei, aerii, aquatici, terreni spiritus salvetel Orientis princeps, Belzebub inferni ardentis monarcha, et Demogorgon, propitiamus vos ut appareat et surgat Mephastophilis. Quid tu moraris? Per Jehovam, Gehennam, et consecratam aquam quam nunc spargo, signumque crucis quod nunc facio, et per vota nostra, ipse nunc surgat nobis dicatus Mephastophilis.[2]
[Enter a DEVIL.]
I charge thee to return and change thy shape,
Thou art too ugly to attend on me;
Go and return an old Franciscan friar,
That holy shape becomes a devil best. [Exit DEVIL.]
I see there's virtue° in my heavenly words! power
Who would not be proficient in this art?
How pliant is this Mephastophilis,
Full of obedience and humility,
Such is the force of magic and my spells.
Now Faustus, thou art conjurer laureate° pre-eminent
That canst command great Mephastophilis.
Quin redis, Mephastophilis, fratris imagine![3]
[Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS.]
MEPHASTOPHILIS Now Faustus, what would'st thou have me do?
FAUSTUS I charge thee wait upon me whilst I live,
To do whatever Faustus shall command,
Be it to make the moon drop from her sphere,
Or the ocean to overwhelm the world.
MEPHASTOPHILIS I am a servant to great Lucifer,
And may not follow thee without his leave;
No more than he commands must we perform.
FAUSTUS Did not he charge thee to appear to me?
MEPHASTOPHILIS No, I came now hither of mine own accord.
FAUSTUS Did not my conjuring speeches raise thee? Speak!
MEPHASTOPHILIS That was the cause, but yet per accidens,[4]
For when we hear one rack[5] the name of God,
Abjure the Scriptures, and his savior Christ,
We fly in hope to get his glorious soul;
Nor will we come unless he use such means
Whereby he is in danger to be damned:

[1] The moving planets. "Adjunct": heavenly body, thought to be joined to the solid firmament of the sky. "Characters of signs": signs of the zodiac and the planets.

[2] Faustus's Latin conjures the devils: "May the gods of the lower regions favor me! Farewell to the Trinity! Hail, spirits of fire, air, water, and earth! Prince of the East, Belzebub, monarch of burning hell, and Demogorgon, we pray to you that Mephastophilis may appear and rise. What are you waiting for? By Jehovah, Gehenna, and the holy water that I now sprinkle, and the sign of the cross that I now make, and by our vows, may Mephastophilis himself now rise to serve us." "Beelzebub" ("Lord of Flies"): an ancient Phoenician deity; in Matthew 12.24, he is called "the prince of the devils." "Demogorgon": in Renaissance versions of classical mythology, a mysterious primeval god.

[3] "Return, Mephastophilis, in the shape of a friar."

[4] The immediate, not ultimate, cause.

[5] Torture (by anagrammatizing).

Therefore the shortest cut for conjuring
Is stoutly to abjure° the Trinity, repudiate
And pray devoutly to the prince of hell.
FAUSTUS So Faustus hath already done, and holds this principle:
There is no chief but only Belzebub,
To whom Faustus doth dedicate himself.
This word damnation terrifies not him,
For he confounds hell in Elysium:
His ghost be with the old philosophers.[6]
But leaving these vain trifles of men's souls,
Tell me, what is that Lucifer thy lord?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Arch-regent and commander of all spirits.
FAUSTUS Was not that Lucifer an angel once?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Yes Faustus, and most dearly loved of God.
FAUSTUS How comes it then that he is prince of devils?
MEPHASTOPHILIS O, by aspiring pride and insolence,
For which God threw him from the face of heaven.
FAUSTUS And what are you that live with Lucifer?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Unhappy spirits that fell with Lucifer,
Conspired against our God with Lucifer,
And are forever damned with Lucifer.
FAUSTUS Where are you damned?
MEPHASTOPHILIS In hell.
FAUSTUS How comes it then that thou art out of hell?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Why this is hell, nor am I out of it.
Think'st thou that I, who saw the face of God,
And tasted the eternal joys of heaven,
Am not tormented with ten thousand hells
In being deprived of everlasting bliss?[7]
O Faustus, leave these frivolous demands,° questions
Which strike a terror to my fainting soul.
FAUSTUS What, is great Mephastophilis so passionate
For being deprived of the joys of heaven?
Learn thou of Faustus manly fortitude,
And scorn those joys thou never shalt possess.
Go bear these tidings to great Lucifer,
Seeing Faustus hath incurred eternal death
By desperate thoughts against Jove's deity:
Say, he surrenders up to him his soul
So he will spare him four and twenty years,
Letting him live in all voluptuousness,
Having thee ever to attend on me,
To give me whatsoever I shall ask,
To tell me whatsoever I demand,
To slay mine enemies, and aid my friends,
And always be obedient to my will.
Go, and return to mighty Lucifer,
And meet me in my study at midnight
And then resolve me of thy master's mind.[8]
MEPHASTOPHILIS I will, Faustus. [Exit.]

---

[6] Faustus considers hell to be the Elysium of the classical philosophers, not the Christian hell of torment.

[7] This is the punishment of loss of God's presence, which is supposed to be the greatest torment of hell.

[8] I.e., give me his decision.

FAUSTUS Had I as many souls as there be stars,
I'd give them all for Mephastophilis.
By him I'll be great emperor of the world,
And make a bridge through the moving air
To pass the ocean with a band of men;
I'll join the hills that bind the Afric shore,
And make that land continent to° Spain, connected to
And both contributory to my crown,
The emperor[9] shall not live but by my leave,
Nor any potentate of Germany.
Now that I have obtained what I desire,
I'll live in speculation° of this art contemplation
Till Mephastophilis return again. [Exit.]

SCENE 4

[Enter WAGNER and the CLOWN.[1]]

WAGNER Sirra boy, come hither.

CLOWN How, boy? Zounds, boy! I hope you have seen many boys with such pickadevants as I have. Boy, quotha![2]

WAGNER Tell me sirra, hast thou any comings in?[3]

CLOWN Ay, and goings out too; you may see else.[4]

WAGNER Alas poor slave, see how poverty jesteth in his nakedness! The villain is bare, and out of service,[5] and so hungry that I know he would give his soul to the devil for a shoulder of mutton, though it were blood raw.

CLOWN How, my soul to the devil for a shoulder of mutton though 'twere blood raw? Not so good friend; by'rlady,[6] I had need have it well roasted, and good sauce to it, if I pay so dear.

WAGNER Well, wilt thou serve me, and I'll make thee go like qui mihi discipidus?[7]

CLOWN How, in verse?

WAGNER No sirra; in beaten silk and stavesacre.[8]

CLOWN How, how, knavesacre?[9] Ay I thought that was all the land his father left him! Do ye hear, I would be sorry to rob you of your living.

WAGNER Sirra, I say in stavesacre.

CLOWN Oho, oho, stavesacre! Why then belike, if I were your man, I should be full of vermin.

WAGNER So thou shalt, whether thou be'st with me or no. But sirra, leave your jesting, and bind your self presently unto me for seven years, or I'll turn all the lice about thee into familiars,[1] and they shall tear thee in pieces.

CLOWN Do you hear, sir? You may save that labor: they are too familiar with me already—zounds, they are as bold with my flesh as if they had paid for my meat and drink.

[9] The Holy Roman Emperor.

[1] Not a court jester (as in some of Shakespeare's plays) but an older stock character, a rustic buffoon.

[2] Says he. The point of the clown's retort is that he is a man and wears a beard. "Zounds": an oath, meaning "God's wounds." "Pickadevants": small, pointed beards.

[3] Income, but the clown then puns on the literal meaning.

[4] I.e., if you don't believe me.

[5] Out of a job.

[6] An oath: "by Our Lady."

[7] "You who are my pupil" (the opening phrase of a poem on how students should behave, from Lily's Latin Grammar, ca. 1509). Wagner means "like a proper servant of a learned man."

[8] A preparation from delphinium seeds, used for killing vermin.

[9] Wordplay, here and below.

[1] Familiar spirits, demons. "Bind your self": i.e., as apprentice. "Presently": immediately.

WAGNER Well, do you hear, sirra? Hold, take these guilders.[2]

CLOWN Gridirons; what be they?

WAGNER Why, French crowns.[3]

CLOWN 'Mass, but for the name of French crowns a man were as good have as many English counters![4] And what should I do with these?

WAGNER Why, now, sirra, thou art at an hour's warning whensoever or wheresoever the devil shall fetch thee.

CLOWN No, no, here take your gridirons again.

WAGNER Truly I'll none of them.

CLOWN Truly but you shall.

WAGNER Bear witness I gave them him.

CLOWN Bear witness I give them you again.

WAGNER Well, I will cause two devils presently to fetch thee away. Baliol[5] and Belcher!

CLOWN Let your Baliol and your Belcher come here, and I'll knock[6] them, they were never so knocked since they were devils! Say I should kill one of them, what would folks say? "Do ye see yonder tall fellow in the round slop?[7] He has killed the devil!" So I should be called "Killdevil" all the parish over.

[Enter two DEVILS, and the CLOWN runs up and down crying.]

WAGNER Baliol and Belcher, spirits, away! [Exeunt DEVILS.]

CLOWN What, are they gone? A vengeance on them! They have vile long nails. There was a he devil and a she devil. I'll tell you how you shall know them: all he devils has horns, and all she devils has clefts and cloven feet.

WAGNER Well sirra, follow me.

CLOWN But do you hear? If I should serve you, would you teach me to raise up Banios and Belcheos?

WAGNER I will teach thee to turn thyself to anything, to a dog, or a cat, or a mouse, or a rat, or anything.

CLOWN HOW! A Christian fellow to a dog, or a cat, a mouse, or a rat? No, no sir, if you turn me into anything, let it be in the likeness of a little pretty frisking flea, that I may be here, and there, and everywhere. O I'll tickle the pretty wenches' plackets! I'll be amongst them, i'faith.[8]

WAGNER Well sirra, come.

CLOWN But, do you hear, Wagner . . . ?

WAGNER HOW? Baliol and Belcher!

CLOWN O Lord I pray, sir, let Banio and Belcher go sleep.

WAGNER Villain, call me Master Wagner; and let thy left eye be diametarily fixed upon my right heel, with quasi vestigias nostras insistere.[9] [Exit.]

CLOWN God forgive me, he speaks Dutch fustian![1] Well, I'll follow him, I'll serve him; that's flat. [Exit.]

SCENE 5

[Enter FAUSTUS in his study.]

FAUSTUS NOW Faustus, must thou needs be damned,

---

[2] Coins.

[3] French crowns, legal tender in England at this period, were easily counterfeited.

[4] Worthless tokens. "'Mass": by the Mass.

[5] Probably a corruption of Belial.

[6] Beat.

[7] Baggy pants. "Tall": fine.

[8] In faith. "Plackets": slits in garments—but with an obvious sexual allusion.

[9] A pedantic way of saying "Follow my footsteps." "Diametarily": diametrically.

[1] Gibberish.

And canst thou not be saved.
What boots° it then to think of God or heaven? avails
Away with such vain fancies, and despair,
Despair in God, and trust in Belzebub.
Now go not backward: no, Faustus, be resolute;
Why waverest thou? O, something soundeth in mine ears:
"Abjure this magic, turn to God again."
Ay, and Faustus will turn to God again.
To God? He loves thee not:
The god thou servest is thine own appetite,
Wherein is fixed the love of Belzebub.
To him I'll build an altar and a church,
And offer lukewarm blood of newborn babes.
[Enter GOOD ANGEL and EVIL.]
GOOD ANGEL Sweet Faustus, leave that execrable° art. accursed
FAUSTUS Contrition, prayer, repentance: what of them?
GOOD ANGEL O they are means to bring thee unto heaven.
EVIL ANGEL Rather illusions, fruits of lunacy,
That makes men foolish that do trust them most.
GOOD ANGEL Sweet Faustus, think of heaven, and heavenly things.
EVIL ANGEL NO Faustus, think of honor and of wealth. [Exeunt.]
FAUSTUS Of wealth!
Why, the signory° of Emden[2] shall be mine, lordship
When Mephastophilis shall stand by me.
What god can hurt thee, Faustus? Thou art safe,
Cast no more doubts. Come, Mephastophilis,
And bring glad tidings from great Lucifer.
Is't not midnight? Come, Mephastophilis:
Vent, vent, Mephastophile![3]
[Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS.]
Now tell, what says Lucifer thy lord?
MEPHASTOPHILIS That I shall wait on Faustus whilst he lives,
So° he will buy my service with his soul. provided that
FAUSTUS Already Faustus hath hazarded that for thee.
MEPHASTOPHILIS But Faustus, thou must bequeath it solemnly,
And write a deed of gift with thine own blood,
For that security° craves great Lucifer. guarantee
If thou deny it, I will back to hell.
FAUSTUS Stay, Mephastophilis, and tell me,
What good will my soul do thy lord?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Enlarge his kingdom.
FAUSTUS Is that the reason he tempts us thus?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris.[4]
FAUSTUS Have you any pain that tortures others?
MEPHASTOPHILIS AS great as have the human souls of men.
But tell me Faustus, shall I have thy soul?
And I will be thy slave and wait on thee,
And give thee more than thou hast wit to ask.
FAUSTUS Ay Mephastophilis, I give it thee.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Then stab thine arm courageously,
And bind thy soul, that at some certain day

A wealthy German trade center.
"Come, come, Mephastophilis!"

4. "Misery loves company."

Great Lucifer may claim it as his own,
And then be thou as great as Lucifer.
FAUSTUS LO Mephastophilis, for love of thee,
I cut my arm, and with my proper° blood own
Assure my soul to be great Lucifer's,
Chief lord and regent of perpetual night.
View here the blood that trickles from mine arm,
And let it be propitious for my wish.
MEPHASTOPHILIS But Faustus, thou must write it
In manner of a deed of gift.
FAUSTUS Ay, so I will; but, Mephastophilis,
My blood congeals and I can write no more.
MEPHASTOPHILIS I'll fetch thee fire to dissolve it straight. [Exit.]
FAUSTUS What might the staying of my blood portend?
Is it unwilling I should write this bill?° contract
Why streams it not, that I may write afresh:
"Faustus gives to thee his soul"? Ah, there it stayed!
Why should'st thou not? Is not thy soul thine own?
Then write again: "Faustus gives to thee his soul."
[Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS with a chafer° of coals.] a portable grate
MEPHASTOPHILIS Here's fire, come Faustus, set it on.
FAUSTUS SO, now the blood begins to clear again.
Now will I make an end immediately.
MEPHASTOPHILIS O what will not I do to obtain his soul!
FAUSTUS Consummatum est,[5] this bill is ended,
And Faustus hath bequeathed his soul to Lucifer.
But what is this inscription on mine arm?
Homo fuge.° Whither should I fly? O man, fly
If unto God, he'll throw me down to hell;
My senses are deceived, here's nothing writ;
I see it plain, here in this place is writ,
Homo fugel Yet shall not Faustus fly.
MEPHASTOPHILIS I'll fetch him somewhat to delight his mind. [Exit.]
[Enter with DEVILS, giving crowns and rich apparel to FAUSTUS, and dance, and then depart.]
FAUSTUS Speak, Mephastophilis, what means this show?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Nothing, Faustus, but to delight thy mind withal,
And to show thee what magic can perform.
FAUSTUS But may I raise up spirits when I please?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Ay, Faustus, and do greater things than these.
FAUSTUS Then there's enough for a thousand souls!
Here, Mephastophilis, receive this scroll,
A deed of gift of body and of soul:
But yet conditionally, that thou perform
All articles prescribed between us both.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Faustus, I swear by hell and Lucifer
To effect all promises between us made.
FAUSTUS Then hear me read them. On these conditions following:
First, that Faustus may he a spirit[6] inform and substance.
Secondly, that Mephastophilis shall be his servant, and at his command.

---

[5] "It is finished": a blasphemy, because these are the words of Christ on the Cross (John 19.30).

[6] I.e., have the supernatural powers of a spirit.

Thirdly, that Mephastophilis shall do for him, and bring him whatsoever.

Fourthly, that he shall be in his chamber or house invisible.

Lastly, that he shall appear to the said John Faustus at all times, in what form or shape soever he please.

I, John Faustus of Wittenberg, doctor, by these presents,[7] do give both body and soul to Lucifer, Prince of the East, and his minister Mephastophilis; and furthermore grant unto them that, four and twenty years being expired, the articles above-written inviolate, full power to fetch or carry the said John Faustus, body and soul, flesh, blood, or goods, into their habitation wheresoever.

By me John Faustus.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Speak, Faustus: do you deliver this as your deed?
FAUSTUS Ay, take it; and the devil give thee good on't.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Now, Faustus, ask what thou wilt.
FAUSTUS First will I question with thee about hell:
Tell me, where is the place that men call hell?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Under the heavens.
FAUSTUS Ay, but whereabouts?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Within the bowels of these elements,
Where we are tortured and remain for ever.
Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscribed
In one self place; for where we are is hell,
And where hell is, there must we ever be.
And to conclude, when all the world dissolves,
And every creature shall be purified,
All places shall be hell that is not heaven.
FAUSTUS Come, I think hell's a fable.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Ay, think so still, till experience change thy mind.
FAUSTUS Why? think'st thou then that Faustus shall be damned?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Ay, of necessity, for here's the scroll
Wherein thou hast given thy soul to Lucifer.
FAUSTUS Ay, and body too; but what of that?
Think'st thou that Faustus is so fond° to imagine foolish
That after this life there is any pain?
Tush, these are trifles and mere old wives' tales.
MEPHASTOPHILIS But Faustus, I am an instance to prove the contrary;
For I am damned, and am now in hell.

FAUSTUS How, now in hell? Nay, and this be hell, I'll willingly be damned here! What? walking, disputing, etc. . . . But leaving off this, let me have a wife, the fairest maid in Germany, for I am wanton and lascivious, and cannot live without a wife.

MEPHASTOPHILIS How, a wife? I prithee Faustus, talk not of a wife.[8]

FAUSTUS Nay sweet Mephastophilis, fetch me one, for I will have one.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Well, thou wilt have one; sit there till I come.
I'll fetch thee a wife in the devil's name. [Exit.]

[Enter with a DEVIL dressed like a woman, with fireworks.]

MEPHASTOPHILIS Tell, Faustus, how dost thou like thy wife?
FAUSTUS A plague on her for a hot whore!
MEPHASTOPHILIS Tut, Faustus, marriage is but a ceremonial toy;

[7] Legal articles.
[8] Mephastophilis cannot produce a wife for Faustus because marriage is a sacrament.

If thou lovest me, think no more of it.
I'll cull thee out the fairest courtesans
And bring them every morning to thy bed:
She whom thine eye shall like, thy heart shall have,
Be she as chaste as was Penelope,
As wise as Saba,[9] or as beautiful
As was bright Lucifer before his fall.
Hold, take this book, peruse it thoroughly:
The iterating° of these lines brings gold; repeating
The framing° of this circle on the ground drawing
Brings whirlwinds, tempests, thunder and lightning.
Pronounce this thrice devoutly to thyself,
And men in armor shall appear to thee,
Ready to execute what thou desirest.

FAUSTUS Thanks, Mephastophilis, yet fain would I have a book wherein I might behold all spells and incantations, that I might raise up spirits when I please.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Here they are in this book. [There turn to them.]

FAUSTUS Now would I have a book where I might see all characters and planets of the heavens, that I might know their motions and dispositions.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Here they are too. [Turn to them.]

FAUSTUS Nay, let me have one book more, and then I have done, wherein I might see all plants, herbs, and trees that grow upon the earth.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Here they be.

FAUSTUS O thou art deceived!

MEPHASTOPHILIS Tut, I warrant thee. [Turn to them.]

FAUSTUS When I behold the heavens, then I repent,
And curse thee, wicked Mephastophilis,
Because thou hast deprived me of those joys.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Why Faustus,
Think'st thou that heaven is such a glorious thing?
I tell thee 'tis not half so fair as thou,
Or any man that breathes on earth.

FAUSTUS How prov'st thou that?

MEPHASTOPHILIS It was made for man, therefore is man more excellent.

FAUSTUS If it were made for man,'twas made for me:
I will renounce this magic, and repent.

[Enter GOOD ANGEL and EVIL ANGEL.]

GOOD ANGEL Faustus, repent, yet° God will pity thee. still

EVIL ANGEL Thou art a spirit,° God cannot pity thee. evil spirit, devil

FAUSTUS Who buzzeth in mine ears I am a spirit?
Be I a devil, yet God may pity me.
Ay, God will pity me if I repent.

EVIL ANGEL Ay, but Faustus never shall repent. [Exeunt.]

FAUSTUS My heart's so hardened[1] I cannot repent!
Scarce can I name salvation, faith, or heaven,
But fearful echoes thunders in mine ears,
"Faustus, thou are damned"; then swords and knives,

[1] Hardness of heart is the desperate spiritual state of the reprobate who will suffer eternal damnation.

Poison, guns, halters,° and envenomed steel — ropes for hanging
Are laid before me to dispatch myself:
And long ere this I should have slain myself,
Had not sweet pleasure conquered deep despair.
Have I not made blind Homer sing to me
Of Alexander's[2] love, and Oenon's death?
And hath not he that built the walls of Thebes
With ravishing sound of his melodious harp,[3]
Made music with my Mephastophilis?
Why should I die then, or basely despair?
I am resolved! Faustus shall ne'er repent.
Come, Mephastophilis, let us dispute again,
And argue of divine astrology.
Tell me, are there many heavens above the moon?
Are all celestial bodies but one globe,
As is the substance of this centric earth?[4]

MEPHASTOPHILIS As are the elements, such are the spheres,
Mutually folded in each other's orb.
And, Faustus, all jointly move upon one axletree
Whose termine° is termed the world's wide pole, — end
Nor are the names of Saturn, Mars, or Jupiter
Feigned, but are erring stars.[5]

FAUSTUS But tell me, have they all one motion, both situ et tempore'?[6]

MEPHASTOPHILIS All jointly move from east to west in four-and-twenty hours upon the poles of the world, but differ in their motion upon the poles of the zodiac.[7]

FAUSTUS Tush, these slender trifles Wagner can decide!
Hath Mephastophilis no greater skill?
Who knows not the double motion of the planets?
The first is finished in a natural day, the second thus: as Saturn in thirty years; Jupiter in twelve; Mars in four; the Sun, Venus, and Mercury in a year; the Moon in twenty-eight days. Tush, these are freshmen's suppositions. But tell me, hath every sphere a dominion or intelligentia?[8]

MEPHASTOPHILIS Ay.

FAUSTUS HOW many heavens or spheres are there?

MEPHASTOPHILIS Nine: the seven planets, the firmament, and the empyreal heaven.[9]

FAUSTUS Well, resolve me then in this question: why have we not conjunctions, oppositions,[1] aspects, eclipses, all at one time, but in some years we have more, in some less?

MEPHASTOPHILIS Per inaequalem motum respectu totius.[2]

2. Alexander is another name for Paris, the lover of Oenone; later he deserted her and abducted Helen, causing the Trojan War. Oenone refused to heal the wounds Paris received in battle, and when he died of them, she killed herself in remorse.

3. The legendary musician Amphion, whose harp caused stones, of themselves, to form the walls of Thebes.

4. Faustus asks whether all the apparently different heavenly bodies form really "one globe" like the earth. Mephastophilis answers that like the elements, which are separate but combined, the heavenly bodies are separate but their spheres are enfolded and they move on one axletree.

5. It is appropriate to give individual names to Saturn, Mars, Jupiter, and the other planets—which are called wandering, or "erring" stars. The fixed stars were in the eighth sphere (the firmament, or crystalline sphere).

6. "In position and in time."

7. The common axletree on which all the spheres revolve.

8. An angel, or intelligence, thought to be the source of motion in each sphere.

9. The ninth sphere was the immovable empyrean.

1. "Oppositions": when two planets are most remote. "Conjunctions": the apparent joinings of two planets.

2. "Because of their unequal movements in respect of the whole."

FAUSTUS Well, I am answered. Tell me who made the world?
MEPHASTOPHILIS I will not.
FAUSTUS Sweet Mephastophilis, tell me.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Move⁰ me not, for I will not tell thee. urge
FAUSTUS Villain, have I not bound thee to tell me anything?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Ay, that is not against our kingdom; but this is.
Think thou on hell, Faustus, for thou art damned.
FAUSTUS Think, Faustus, upon God, that made the world.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Remember this. [Exit.]
FAUSTUS Ay, go accursed spirit, to ugly hell,
Tis thou hast damned distressed Faustus' soul:
Is't not too late?
[Enter GOOD ANGEL and EVIL.]
EVIL ANGEL TOO late.
GOOD ANGEL Never too late, if Faustus will repent.
EVIL ANGEL If thou repent, devils shall tear thee in pieces.
GOOD ANGEL Repent, and they shall never raze⁰ thy skin. graze
[Exeunt.]
FAUSTUS Ah Christ my Savior! seek to save
Distressed Faustus' soul!
[Enter LUCIFER, BELZEBUB, and MEPHASTOPHILIS.]
LUCIFER Christ cannot save thy soul, for he is just.
There's none but I have interest in the same.
FAUSTUS O who art thou that look'st so terrible?
LUCIFER I am Lucifer, and this is my companion prince in hell.
FAUSTUS O Faustus, they are come to fetch away thy soul!
LUCIFER We come to tell thee thou dost injure us.
Thou talk'st of Christ, contrary to thy promise.
Thou should'st not think of God; think of the devil,
And his dam[3] too.
FAUSTUS Nor will I henceforth: pardon me in this,
And Faustus vows never to look to heaven,
Never to name God, or to pray to him,
To burn his Scriptures, slay his ministers,
And make my spirits pull his churches down.
LUCIFER DO SO, and we will highly gratify thee. Faustus, we are come from hell to show thee some pastime; sit down, and thou shalt see all the Seven Deadly Sins[4] appear in their proper shapes.
FAUSTUS That sight will be as pleasing unto me as Paradise was to Adam, the first day of his creation.
LUCIFER Talk not of Paradise, nor creation, but mark this show; talk of the devil and nothing else. Come away.
[Enter the SEVEN DEADLY SINS.]
Now Faustus, examine them of their several names and dispositions.
FAUSTUS What art thou, the first?
PRIDE I am Pride: I disdain to have any parents. I am like to Ovid's flea,' I can creep into every corner of a wench: sometimes like a periwig, I sit upon her brow; or like a fan of feathers, I kiss her lips. Indeed I do—what do I not! But fie, what a scent is here? I'll not speak another word, except the ground were perfumed and covered with cloth of arras.[6]

FAUSTUS What art thou, the second?

COVETOUSNESS I am Covetousness, begotten of an old churl in an old leathern bag; and might I have my wish, I would desire that this house, and all the people in it, were turned to gold, that I might lock you up in my good chest. O my sweet gold!

FAUSTUS What art thou, the third?

WRATH I am Wrath. I had neither father nor mother: I leaped out of a lion's mouth when I was scarce half an hour old, and ever since I have run up and down the world, with this case of rapiers, wounding myself when I had nobody to fight withal. I was born in hell—and look to it, for some of you shall be my father.

FAUSTUS What art thou, the fourth?

ENVY I am Envy, begotten of a chimney-sweeper and an oyster-wife. I cannot read, and therefore wish all books were burnt; I am lean with seeing others eat—O that there would come a famine through all the world, that all might die, and I live alone; then thou should'st see how fat I would be! But must thou sit and I stand? Come down, with a vengeance!

FAUSTUS Away, envious rascal! What art thou, the fifth?

GLUTTONY Who, I sir? I am Gluttony. My parents are all dead, and the devil a penny they have left me but a bare pension, and that is thirty meals a day and ten bevers[7]—a small trifle to suffice nature. O, I come of a royal parentage: my grandfather was a gammon[8] of bacon, my grandmother a hogshead of claret wine; my godfathers were these: Peter Pickled-Herring, and Martin Martlemas-Beef.[9] O but my godmother! She was a jolly gentlewoman, and well-beloved in every good town and city; her name was Mistress Margery March-Beer.[1] Now, Faustus, thou hast heard all my progeny;[2] wilt thou bid me to supper?

FAUSTUS No, I'll see thee hanged; thou wilt eat up all my victuals.

GLUTTONY Then the devil choke thee!

FAUSTUS Choke thyself, Glutton. What art thou, the sixth?

SLOTH I am Sloth; I was begotten on a sunny bank, where I have lain ever since—and you have done me great injury to bring me from thence. Let me be carried thither again by Gluttony and Lechery. I'll not speak another word for a king's ransom.

FAUSTUS What are you, Mistress Minx, the seventh and last?

LECHERY Who, I sir? I am one that loves an inch of raw mutton better than an ell of fried stockfish;[3] and the first letter of my name begins with Lechery.

LUCIFER Away! To hell, to hell! [Exeunt the SINS.]
Now Faustus, how dost thou like this?

FAUSTUS O this feeds my soul!

LUCIFER Tut, Faustus, in hell is all manner of delight.

FAUSTUS O might I see hell, and return again, how happy were I then!

LUCIFER Thou shalt; I will send for thee at midnight. In meantime, take this book, peruse it thoroughly, and thou shalt turn thyself into what shape thou wilt.

FAUSTUS Great thanks, mighty Lucifer; this will I keep as chary[4] as my life.

LUCIFER Farewell, Faustus; and think on the devil.

FAUSTUS Farewell, great Lucifer; come, Mephastophilis.

[Exeunt OMNES.]

SCENE 6

[Enter ROBIN the ostler[5] with a hook in his hand.]

ROBIN O this is admirable! here I ha' stolen one of Doctor Faustus' conjuring books, and i'faith I mean to search some circles[6] for my own use: now will I make all the maidens in our parish dance at my pleasure stark naked before me, and so by that means I shall see more than ere I felt or saw yet.

[Enter RAFE calling ROBIN.]

RAFE Robin, prithee come away, there's a gentleman tarries to have his horse, and he would have his things rubbed and made clean. He keeps such a chafing[7] with my mistress about it, and she has sent me to look thee out. Prithee, come away,

ROBIN Keep out, keep out; or else you are blown up, you are dismembered, Rafe. Keep out, for I am about a roaring[8] piece of work.

RAFE Come, what dost thou with that same book? Thou canst not read!

ROBIN Yes, my master and mistress shall find that I can read—he for his forehead,[9] she for her private study. She's born to bear with me,[1] or else my art fails.

RAFE Why Robin, what book is that?

ROBIN What book? Why the most intolerable[2] book for conjuring that ere was invented by any brimstone devil.

RAFE Canst thou conjure with it?

ROBIN I can do all these things easily with it: first, I can make thee drunk with 'ipocrase[3] at any tavern in Europe for nothing, that's one of my conjuring works.

RAFE Our master parson says that's nothing.

ROBIN True, Rafe! And more, Rafe, if thou hast any mind to Nan Spit, our kitchen maid, then turn her and wind her to thy own use, as often as thou wilt, and at midnight.

RAFE O brave Robin! Shall I have Nan Spit, and to mine own use? On that condition I'll feed thy devil with horsebread as long as he lives, of free cost.[4]

ROBIN NO more, sweet Rafe; let's go and make clean our boots which lie foul upon our hands, and then to our conjuring in the devil's name. [Exeunt.]

CHORUS 2

[Enter WAGNER solus.]

WAGNER Learned Faustus,
To know the secrets of astronomy

[7] Scolding.
[8] Dangerous.

[2] Irresistible.

[4] Free of charge. "Horsebread": fodder.

Did mount himself to scale Olympus'[5] top.
Being seated in a chariot burning bright,
Drawn by the strength of yoked dragons' necks.
He now is gone to prove cosmography,[6]
And, as I guess, will first arrive at Rome
To see the pope, and manner of his court,
And take some part of holy Peter's feast,[7]
That to this day is highly solemnized. [Exit WAGNER.]

SCENE 7

[Enter FAUSTUS and MEPHASTOPHILIS.]

FAUSTUS Having now, my good Mephastophilis,
Passed with delight the stately town of Trier,[8]
Environed round with airy mountain tops,
With walls of flint, and deep entrenched lakes,° moats
Not to be won by any conquering prince;
From Paris next, coasting° the realm of France, traversing
We saw the river Main fall into Rhine,
Whose banks are set with groves of fruitful vines;
Then up to Naples, rich Campania,
With buildings fair and gorgeous to the eye,
The streets straight forth, and paved with finest brick,
Quarters the town in four equivalents;
There saw we learned Maro's[9] golden tomb,
The way° he cut, an English mile in length, tunnel
Thorough° a rock of stone in one night's space. through
From thence to Venice, Padua, and the rest,
In midst of which a sumptuous temple° stands St. Mark's in Venice
That threats the stars with her aspiring top.
Thus hitherto hath Faustus spent his time.
But tell me now, what resting place is this?
Hast thou, as erst° I did command, earlier
Conducted me within the walls of Rome?

MEPHASTOPHILIS Faustus, I have; and because we will not be unprovided, I have taken up his holiness' privy chamber for our use.

FAUSTUS I hope his holiness will bid us welcome.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Tut,'tis no matter, man, we'll be bold with his good cheer.[1]
And now, my Faustus, that thou may'st perceive
What Rome containeth to delight thee with,
Know that this city stands upon seven hills
That underprop the groundwork of the same;
Just through the midst runs flowing Tiber's stream,
With winding banks, that cut it in two parts;
Over the which four stately bridges lean,
That makes safe passage to each part of Rome.
Upon the bridge called Ponte Angelo

Erected is a castle passing strong,[2]
Within whose walls such store of ordnance are
And double cannons, framed of carved brass,
As match the days within one complete year—
Besides the gates and high pyramides° obelisks

FAUSTUS Now by the kingdoms of infernal rule,
Of Styx, Acheron, and the fiery lake
Of ever-burning Phlegethon,[3] I swear
That I do long to see the monuments
And situation of bright-splendent Rome.
Come therefore, let's away.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Nay, Faustus, stay. I know you'd fain see the pope,
And take some part of holy Peter's feast,
Where thou shalt see a troop of bald-pate friars,
Whose summum bonum[4] is in belly-cheer.

FAUSTUS Well, I am content to compass[5] then some sport,
And by their folly make us merriment.
Then charm me that I may be invisible, to do what I please unseen of any whilst I stay in Rome.

MEPHASTOPHILIS [casts a spell on him]. So Faustus, now do what thou wilt, thou shalt not be discerned.

[Sound a sennet;[6] enter the POPE and the CARDINAL OF LORRAINE to the banquet, with FRIARS attending.]

POPE My lord of Lorraine, will't please you draw near.

FAUSTUS Fall to; and the devil choke you and[7] you spare.

POPE How now, who's that which spake? Friars, look about.

1 FRIAR Here's nobody, if it like[8] your holiness.

POPE My lord, here is a dainty dish was sent to me from the bishop of Milan.

FAUSTUS I thank you, sir. [Snatch it.]

POPE How now, who's that which snatched the meat from me? Will no man look? My lord, this dish was sent me from the cardinal of Florence.

FAUSTUS You say true? I'll have't. [Snatch it.]

POPE What, again! My lord, I'll drink to your grace.

FAUSTUS I'll pledge[9] your grace. [Snatch the cup.]

LORRAINE My lord, it may be some ghost newly crept out of purgatory come to beg a pardon of your holiness.

POPE It may be so; friars; prepare a dirge[1] to lay the fury of this ghost. Once again my lord, fall to. [The POPE crosseth himself.]

FAUSTUS What, are you crossing of your self? Well, use that trick no more, I would advise you.

[Cross again.]

FAUSTUS Well, there's the second time; aware the third! I give you fair warning.

[Cross again, and FAUSTUS hits him a box of the ear, and they all run away.]

[2] Surpassingly. Actually the castle is on the bank, not the bridge.

[3] Classical names for rivers of the underworld.

[4] The greatest good; often refers to God.

[5] Take part in.

[6] A set of notes on the trumpet or cornet.

[7] If. "Fall to": start eating.

[8] Please.

[9] Toast.

[1] A requiem mass. But what actually follows is a litany of curses.

FAUSTUS Come on, Mephastophilis, what shall we do?

MEPHASTOPHILIS Nay, I know not; we shall be cursed with bell, book, and candle.[2]

FAUSTUS How! Bell, book, and candle; candle, book, and bell,
Forward and backward, to curse Faustus to hell.
Anon you shall hear a hog grunt, a calf bleat, and an ass bray,
Because it is St. Peter's holy day.

[Enter all the FRIARS to sing the Dirge.]

1 FRIAR Come brethren, let's about our business with good devotion.

[Sing this.]

Cursed be he that stole away His Holiness' meat from the table.
Maledicat Dominus.[3]
Cursed be he that struck His Holiness a blow on the face.
Maledicat Dominus.
Cursed be he that took Friar Sandelo a blow on the pate.
Maledicat Dominus.
Cursed be he that disturbeth our holy dirge.
Maledicat Dominus.
Cursed be he that took away His Holiness' wine.
Maledicat dominus.
Et omnes sancti.[4] Amen.

[Beat the FRIARS, and fling fireworks among them, and so Exeunt.]

SCENE 8

[Enter ROBIN and RAFE with a silver goblet.]

ROBIN Come, Rafe, did not I tell thee we were forever made by this Doctor Faustus' book? Ecce signum![5] Here's a simple purchase for horsekeepers: our horses shall eat no hay as long as this lasts.

[Enter the VINTNER.]

RAFE But Robin, here comes the vintner.

ROBIN Hush, I'll gull him supernaturally! Drawer,[6] I hope all is paid; God be with you. Come, Rafe.

VINTNER Soft, sir, a word with you. I must yet have a goblet paid from you ere you go.

ROBIN I, a goblet, Rafe? I, a goblet? I scorn you: and you are but a &c.[7] . . . I, a goblet? Search me.

VINTNER I mean so, sir, with your favor. [Searches ROBIN.]

ROBIN How say you now?

VINTNER I must say somewhat to your fellow; you, sir!

RAFE Me, sir? Me, sir? Search your fill. Now sir, you may be ashamed to burden honest men with a matter of truth.

VINTNER [searches RAFE] Well, tone of you hath this goblet about you.

ROBIN You lie, drawer; 'tis afore me. Sirra you, I'll teach ye to impeach[8] honest men: [to RAFE] stand by. [to the VINTNER] I'll scour you for a goblet—stand aside, you were best—I charge you in the name of Belzebub—look to the goblet, Rafe!

VINTNER What mean you, sirra?

ROBIN I'll tell you what I mean: [he reads] Sanctobulorum Periphras-

[2] The traditional paraphernalia for cursing and excommunication.
[3] "May the Lord curse him."
[4] "And all the saints (also curse him)."
[5] "Behold the proof."
[6] Wine-drawer. "Gull": trick.
[7] The actor might ad lib abuse at this point.
[8] Accuse.

ticon—nay, I'll tickle you, vintner—look to the goblet, Rafe—Polypragmos Belseborams framanto pacostiphos tostis Mephastophilis, &c—[9]

[Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS: sets squibs[1] at their backs: they run about.]

VINTNER O nomine Domine![2] What mean'st thou, Robin? Thou hast no goblet.

RAFE Peccatum peccatorum![3] Here's thy goblet, good vintner.

ROBIN Misericordia pro nobis![4] What shall I do? Good devil, forgive me now, and I'll never rob thy library more.

[Enter to them MEPHASTOPHILIS.]

MEPHASTOPHILIS Vanish, villains, th'one like an ape, another like a bear, the third an ass, for doing this enterprise. [Exit VINTNER.]

Monarch of hell, under whose black survey
Great potentates do kneel with awful fear;
Upon whose altars thousand souls do lie;
How am I vexed with these villains' charms!
From Constantinople am I hither come,
Only for pleasure of these damned slaves.

ROBIN HOW, from Constantinople? You have had a great journey! Will you take sixpence in your purse to pay for your supper, and be gone?

MEPHASTOPHILIS Well, villains, for your presumption, I transform thee into an ape, and thee into a dog; and so begone! [Exit.]

ROBIN HOW, into an ape? That's brave: I'll have fine sport with the boys; I'll get nuts and apples enow.[5]

RAFE And I must be a dog.

ROBIN I'faith, thy head will never be out of the potage[6] pot.

[Exeunt.]

CHORUS 3

[Enter CHORUS.[7]]

CHORUS When Faustus had with pleasure ta'en the view
Of rarest things, and royal courts of kings,
He stayed his course, and so returned home;
Where such as bare his absence but with grief—
I mean his friends and nearest companions—
Did gratulate his safety with kind words.
And in their conference of what befell,
Touching his journey through the world and air,
They put forth questions of astrology,
Which Faustus answered with such learned skill,
As they admired and wondered at his wit.
Now is his fame spread forth in every land:
Amongst the rest the emperor is one,
Carolus the Fifth,[8] at whose palace now
Faustus is feasted 'mongst his noblemen.

---

[9] Dog-Latin, as Robin attempts to conjure from Faustus's book.

[1] Firecrackers. Evidently Mephastophilis is on stage only long enough to set off the firecrackers and is not seen by Robin, Rafe, or the vintner. He then reenters at line 32.

[2] "In the name of the Lord"; the Latin invocations are used in swearing.

[3] "Sin of sins!"

[4] "Have mercy on us!"

[5] Enough. "Brave": splendid.

[6] Porridge.

[7] I.e., Wagner.

[8] The Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (reigned 1519-56).

What there he did in trial° of his art demonstration
I leave untold: your eyes shall see performed. [Exit.]

SCENE 9

[Enter EMPEROR, FAUSTUS, and a KNIGHT, with Attendants.]

EMPEROR Master Doctor Faustus, I have heard strange report of thy knowledge in the black art, how that none in my empire, nor in the whole world, can compare with thee for the rare effects of magic. They say thou hast a familiar spirit, by whom thou canst accomplish what thou list! This therefore is my request: that thou let me see some proof of thy skill, that mine eyes may be witnesses to confirm what mine ears have heard reported. And here I swear to thee, by the honor of mine imperial crown, that whatever thou dost, thou shalt be in no ways prejudiced or endamaged, KNIGHT [aside] Ffaith, he looks much like a conjuror.

FAUSTUS My gracious sovereign, though I must confess myself far inferior to the report men have published, and nothing answerable to the honor of your imperial majesty, yet for that love and duty binds me thereunto, I am content to do whatsoever your majesty shall command me.

EMPEROR Then Doctor Faustus, mark what I shall say. As I was sometime solitary set within my closet,[9] sundry thoughts arose about the honor of mine ancestors—how they had won by prowess such exploits, got such riches, subdued so many kingdoms, as we that do succeed, or they that shall hereafter possess our throne, shall (I fear me) never attain to that degree of high renown and great authority. Amongst which kings is Alexander the Great,[1] chief spectacle of the world's pre-eminence:
The bright shining of whose glorious acts
Lightens the world with his reflecting beams;
As when I hear but motion° made of him, mention
It grieves my soul I never saw the man.
If therefore thou, by cunning of thine art,
Canst raise this man from hollow vaults below,
Where lies entombed this famous conqueror,
And bring with him his beauteous paramour,[2]
Both in their right shapes, gesture, and attire
They used to wear during their time of life,
Thou shalt both satisfy my just desire
And give me cause to praise thee whilst I live.

FAUSTUS My gracious lord, I am ready to accomplish your request, so far forth as by art and power of my spirit I am able to perform.

KNIGHT [aside] I'faith, that's just nothing at all.

FAUSTUS But, if it like your grace, it is not in my ability to present before your eyes the true substantial bodies of those two deceased princes, which long since are consumed to dust.

KNIGHT [aside] Ay, marry,[3] master doctor, now there's a sign of grace in you, when you will confess the truth.

FAUSTUS But such spirits as can lively resemble Alexander and his paramour shall appear before your grace, in that manner that they best lived in, in their most flourishing estate: which I doubt not shall sufficiently content your imperial majesty.

---

[9] Private chamber.

[1] The emperor traces his ancestry to the world conqueror (356—323 B.C.E.).

[2] Probably Roxana, Alexander's wife.

[3] To be sure,

EMPEROR GO to, master doctor, let me see them presently.[4]

KNIGHT DO you hear, master doctor? You bring Alexander and his paramour before the emperor!

FAUSTUS How then, sir?

KNIGHT I'faith, that's as true as Diana turned me to a stag.

FAUSTUS NO sir; but when Actaeon died, he left the horns[5] for you! Mephastophilis, begone! [Exit MEPHASTOPHILIS.]

KNIGHT Nay, and[6] you go to conjuring I'll be gone. [Exit KNIGHT.]

FAUSTUS I'll meet with[7] you anon for interrupting me so. Here they are, my gracious lord.

[Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS with ALEXANDER and his PARAMOUR.]

EMPEROR Master doctor, I heard this lady, while she lived, had a wart or mole in her neck; how shall I know whether it be so or no?

FAUSTUS Your highness may boldly go and see.

[The EMPEROR examines the lady's neck.]

EMPEROR Sure, these are no spirits, but the true substantial bodies of those two deceased princes.

[Exit ALEXANDER (and his PARAMOUR).]

FAUSTUS Will't please your highness now to send for the knight that was so pleasant with me here of late?

EMPEROR One of you call him forth.

[Enter the KNIGHT with a pair of horns on his head.]

EMPEROR HOW now, sir knight? Why, I had thought thou hadst been a bachelor, but now I see thoil hast a wife that not only gives thee horns but makes thee wear them! Feel on thy head.

KNIGHT Thou damned wretch and execrable° dog, detestable
Bred in the concave of some monstrous rock,
How dar'st thou thus abuse a gentleman?
Villain, I say, undo what thou hast done.

FAUSTUS O not so fast, sir, there's no haste but good. Are you remembered[8] how you crossed me in my conference with the emperor? I think I have met with you for it.

EMPEROR Good master doctor, at my entreaty release him; he hath done penance sufficient.

FAUSTUS My gracious lord, not so much for the injury he offered me here in your presence as to delight you with some mirth, hath Faustus worthily requited this injurious knight; which being all I desire, I am content to release him of his horns. And, sir knight, hereafter speak well of scholars: Mephastophilis, transform him straight.[9] Now, my good lord, having done my duty, I humbly take my leave.

EMPEROR Farewell, master doctor; yet ere you go, expect from me a bounteous reward.

[Exit EMPEROR (and his ATTENDANTS).]

FAUSTUS NOW, Mephastophilis, the restless course
That time doth run with calm and silent foot,

[4] Immediately.

[5] Horns were traditionally a sign of the cuckolded husband (cf. Scene 6. lines 14—15). "Actaeon": the hunter of classical legend who happened to see the goddess Diana bathing. For punishment he was changed into a stag; he was then chased and killed by his own hounds.

[6] If.

[7] Be revenged on.

[8] Have you forgotten. "No haste but good": a proverb: no point hurrying, unless it's to good effect.

[9] Immediately.

Shortening my days and thread of vital life,
Calls for the payment of my latest years;
Therefore, sweet Mephastophilis, let us make haste to Wittenberg.

MEPHASTOPHILIS What, will you go on horseback or on foot?

FAUSTUS Nay, till I am past this fair and pleasant green, I'll walk on foot.

SCENE 10

[Enter a HORSE-COURSER.[1]]

HORSE-COURSER I have been all this day seeking one Master Fustian: 'mass,[2] see where he is! God save you, master doctor.

FAUSTUS What, horse-courser: you are well met.

HORSE-COURSER DO you hear, sir; I have brought you forty dollars[3] for your horse.

FAUSTUS I cannot sell him so: if thou lik'st him for fifty, take him.

HORSE-COURSER Alas sir, I have no more. I pray you speak for me.

MEPHASTOPHILIS I pray you let him have him; he is an honest fellow, and he has a great charge[4]—neither wife nor child,

FAUSTUS Well, come, give me your money; my boy will deliver him to you. But I must tell you one thing before you have him: ride him not into the water at any hand.

HORSE-COURSER Why sir, will he not drink of all waters?

FAUSTUS O yes, he will drink of all waters, but ride him not into the water. Ride him over hedge or ditch, or where thou wilt, but not into the water.

HORSE-COURSER Well sir. Now am I made man forever: I'll not leave my horse for forty! If he had but the quality of hey ding ding, hey ding ding,[5] I'd make a brave living on him! He has a buttock as slick as an eel. Well, God by,[6] sir; your boy will deliver him me. But hark ye sir, if my horse be sick, or ill at ease, if I bring his water[7] to you, you'll tell me what it is?

[Exit HORSE-COURSER.]

FAUSTUS Away, you villain! What, dost think I am a horse-doctor?
What art thou, Faustus, but a man condemned to die?
Thy fatal time doth draw to final end.
Despair doth drive distrust unto my thoughts:
Confound these passions with a quiet sleep.
Tush, Christ did call the thief upon the cross;[8]
Then rest thee, Faustus, quiet in conceit.° in mind

[Sleep in his chair.]

[Enter HORSE-COURSER all wet, crying.]

HORSE-COURSER Alas, alas, Doctor Fustian, quoth 'a: 'mass, Doctor Lopus[9] was never such a doctor! H'as given me a purgation, h'as purged me of forty dollars! I shall never see them more. But yet, like an ass as I was, I would not be ruled by him; for he bade me I should ride him into no water. Now I, thinking my horse had had some rare quality that he would not have had me known of, I, like a vent'rous youth, rid him into the deep pond at the town's end. I was no sooner in the middle of the pond, but my horse vanished away, and I sat upon a bottle[1] of hay, never so near drowning in my life! But I'll seek out my doctor, and have my forty dollars again, or I'll make it the dearest[2] horse. O, yonder is his snipper-snapper! Do you hear, you hey-pass,[3] where's your master?

[1] Horse trader, traditionally a sharp bargainer or cheat.

[2] By the Mass. "Fustian": the horse-courser's mispronunciation of Faustus's name.

[3] Common German coins.

[4] Burden.

[5] I.e., he wishes his horse were a stallion, not a gelding, so he could put him to stud.

[6] Good-bye (contracted from "God be with you").

[7] Urine.

[8] In Luke 23.39—43 one of the two thieves crucified with Jesus is promised paradise.

[9] In February 1594 Roderigo Lopez, the queen's personal physician, was executed for plotting to poison her. Obviously Marlowe, who died in 1593, did not write the line.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Why, sir, what would you? You cannot speak with him.

HORSE-COURSER But I will speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Why, he's fast asleep; come some other time.

HORSE-COURSER I'll speak with him now, or I'll break his glass-windows[4] about his ears.

MEPHASTOPHILIS I tell thee, he has not slept this eight nights.

HORSE-COURSER And he have not slept this eight weeks I'll speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS See where he is, fast asleep.

HORSE-COURSER Ay, this is he; God save ye master doctor, master doctor, master Doctor Fustian, forty dollars, forty dollars for a bottle of hay.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Why, thou seest he hears thee not.

HORSE-COURSER SO ho ho; so ho ho.[5] [Halloo in his ear.] No, will you not wake? I'll make you wake ere I go. [Pull him by the leg, and pull it away.] Alas, I am undone! What shall I do?

FAUSTUS O my leg, my leg! Help, Mephastophilis! Call the officers! My leg, my leg!

MEPHASTOPHILIS Come villain, to the constable.

HORSE-COURSER O Lord, sir! Let me go, and I'll give you forty dollars more.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Where be they?

HORSE-COURSER I have none about me: come to my ostry[6] and I'll give them you.

MEPHASTOPHILIS Begone quickly!

[HORSE-COURSER runs away.]

FAUSTUS What, is he gone? Farewell he: Faustus has his leg again, and the horse-courser—I take it—a bottle of hay for his labor! Well, this trick shall cost him forty dollars more.

[Enter WAGNER.]

How now, Wagner, what's the news with thee?

WAGNER Sir, the duke of Vanholt doth earnestly entreat your company.

FAUSTUS The duke of Vanholt! An honorable gentleman, to whom I must be no niggard of my cunning. Come, Mephastophilis, let's away to him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE 11

[FAUSTUS and MEPHASTOPHILIS return to the stage. Enter to them the DUKE and the DUCHESS; the DUKE speaks.]

DUKE Believe me, master doctor, this merriment hath much pleased me.

FAUSTUS My gracious lord, I am glad it contents you so well: but it may be, madam, you take no delight in this; I have heard that great-bellied women do long for some dainties or other—what is it, madam? Tell me, and you shall have it.

[1] Bundle.

[2] Most expensive.

[3] A conjurer's phrase. "Snipper-snapper": insignificant youth, whipper-snapper.

[4] Spectacles.

[5] The huntsman's cry, when he sights the quarry.

[6] Hostelry, inn.

DUCHESS Thanks, good master doctor; and for I see your courteous intent to pleasure me, I will not hide from you the thing my heart desires. And were it now summer, as it is January and the dead of winter, I would desire no better meat than a dish of ripe grapes.

FAUSTUS Alas madam, that's nothing! Mephastophilis, begone! [Exit MEPHASTOPHILIS.] Were it a greater thing than this, so it would content you, you should have it. [Enter MEPHASTOPHILIS with the grapes.] Here they be, madam; will't please you taste on them?

DUKE Believe me, master doctor, this makes me wonder above the rest: that being in the dead time of winter, and in the month of January, how you should come by these grapes?

FAUSTUS If it like your grace, the year is divided into two circles over the whole world, that when it is here winter with us, in the contrary circle it is summer with them, as in India, Saba,[7] and farther countries in the east; and by means of a swift spirit that I have, I had them brought hither, as ye see. How do you like them, madam; be they good?

DUCHESS Believe me, master doctor, they be the best grapes that ere I tasted in my life before.

FAUSTUS I am glad they content you so, madam.

DUKE Come madam, let us in, where you must well reward this learned man for the great kindness he hath showed to you.

DUCHESS And so I will, my lord; and whilst I live, rest beholding for this courtesy.

FAUSTUS I humbly thank your grace.

DUKE Come, master doctor, follow us, and receive your reward.
[Exeunt.]

CHORUS 4

[Enter WAGNER solus.]

WAGNER I think my master means to die shortly,
For he hath given to me all his goods!
And yet methinks, if that death were near,
He would not banquet, and carouse, and swill
Amongst the students, as even now he doth,
Who are at supper with such belly-cheer
As Wagner ne'er beheld in all his life.
See where they come: belike the feast is ended. [Exit.]

SCENE 12

[Enter FAUSTUS (and MEPHASTOPHILIS), with two or three SCHOLARS.]

1 SCHOLAR Master Doctor Faustus, since our conference about fair ladies, which was the beautifulest in all the world, we have determined with ourselves that Helen of Greece was the admirablest lady that ever lived. Therefore, master doctor, if you will do us that favor as to let us see that peerless dame of Greece, whom all the world

---

The biblical kingdom of Sheba, in southwestern Arabia.

admires for majesty, we should think ourselves much beholding unto you.
FAUSTUS Gentlemen, for that I know your friendship is unfeigned,
And Faustus' custom is not to deny
The just requests of those that wish him well,
You shall behold that peerless dame of Greece,
No otherways for pomp and majesty
Than when Sir Paris crossed the seas with her
And brought the spoils to rich Dardania.[0] Troy
Be silent then, for danger is in words.
[Music sounds, and HELEN passeth over the stage.]
2 SCHOLAR Too simple is my wit to tell her praise,
Whom all the world admires for majesty.
3 SCHOLAR NO marvel though the angry Greeks pursued
With ten years' war the rape of such a queen,
Whose heavenly beauty passeth all compare.
1 SCHOLAR Since we have seen the pride of Nature's works
And only paragon of excellence,
Let us depart; and for this glorious deed
Happy and blest be Faustus evermore.
FAUSTUS Gentlemen farewell; the same I wish to you.
[Exeunt SCHOLARS.]
[Enter an OLD MAN.]
OLD MAN Ah Doctor Faustus, that I might prevail
To guide thy steps unto the way of life,
By which sweet path thou may st attain the goal
That shall conduct thee to celestial rest.
Break heart, drop blood, and mingle it with tears,
Tears falling from repentant heaviness
Of thy most vile and loathsome filthiness,
The stench whereof corrupts the inward soul
With such flagitious[0] crimes of heinous sins, villainous
As no commiseration may expel
But mercy, Faustus, of thy savior sweet,
Whose blood alone must wash away thy guilt.
FAUSTUS Where art thou, Faustus? Wretch, what hast thou done!
Damned art thou, Faustus, damned; despair and die!
Hell calls for right, and with a roaring voice
Says, "Faustus, come: thine hour is come!"
[MEPHASTOPHILIS gives him a dagger, j
And Faustus will come to do thee right.
OLD MAN Ah stay, good Faustus, stay thy desperate steps!
I see an angel hovers o'er thy head
And with a vial full of precious grace
Offers to pour the same into thy soul!
Then call for mercy, and avoid despair.
FAUSTUS Ah my sweet friend, I feel thy words
To comfort my distressed soul;
Leave me awhile to ponder on my sins.
OLD MAN I go, sweet Faustus; but with heavy cheer,[0] heavy hean
Fearing the ruin of thy hopeless soul. [Exit.]
FAUSTUS Accursed Faustus, where is mercy now?
I do repent, and yet I do despair:
Hell strives with grace for conquest in my breast!

What shall I do to shun the snares of death?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Thou traitor, Faustus: I arrest thy soul
For disobedience to my sovereign lord.
Revolt,[8] or I'll in piecemeal tear thy flesh.
FAUSTUS Sweet Mephastophilis, entreat thy lord
To pardon my unjust presumption;
And with my blood again I will confirm
My former vow I made to Lucifer.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Do it then quickly, with unfeigned heart,
Lest greater danger do attend thy drift.° intent
FAUSTUS Torment, sweet friend, that base and crooked age
That durst dissuade me from thy Lucifer,
With greatest torments that our hell affords.
MEPHASTOPHILIS His faith is great, I cannot touch his soul,
But what I may afflict his body with
I will attempt—which is but little worth.
FAUSTUS One thing, good servant, let me crave of thee,
To glut the longing of my heart's desire:
That I might have unto° my paramour for
That heavenly Helen which I saw of late,
Whose sweet embracings may extinguish clean
These thoughts that do dissuade me from my vow:
And keep mine oath I made to Lucifer.
MEPHASTOPHILIS Faustus, this, or what else thou shalt desire,
Shall be performed in twinkling of an eye.
[Enter HELEN.]
FAUSTUS Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless[9] towers of Ilium?° Troy
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss:
Her lips sucks forth my soul, see where it flies!
Come Helen, come, give me my soul again.
Here will I dwell, for heaven be in these lips,
And all is dross that is not Helena!
[Enter OLD MAN.]
I will be Paris, and for love of thee,
Instead of Troy shall Wittenberg be sacked;
And I will combat with weak Menelaus,° Helen's husband
And wear thy colors on my plumed crest:
Yea, I will wound Achilles in the heel,[1]
And then return to Helen for a kiss.
O thou art fairer than the evening air,
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars,
Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter
When he appeared to hapless Semele;[2]
More lovely than the monarch of the sky
In wanton Arethusa's azured arms;[3]
And none but thou shalt be my paramour.
[Exeunt (FAUSTUS and HELEN).]

---

[8] Turn back (to your allegiance to Lucifer).

[9] Immeasurably high; matchless.

[1] Achilles could only be wounded in his heel—where he was shot by Paris.

[2] A Theban girl, loved by Jupiter and destroyed by the fire of his lightning when he appeared to her in his full splendor.

[3] Arethusa was the nymph of a fountain, as well as the fountain itself; she excited the passion of the river god Alpheus, who was by some accounts related to the sun.

OLD MAN Accursed Faustus, miserable man,
That from thy soul exclud'st the grace of heaven
And fliest the throne of His tribunal seat!
[Enter the DEVILS.]
Satan begins to sift me with his pride,[4]
As in this furnace God shall try my faith.
My faith, vile hell, shall triumph over thee!
Ambitious fiends, see how the heavens smiles
At your repulse, and laughs your state° to scorn. royal power
Hence hell, for hence I fly unto my God.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE 13

[Enter FAUSTUS with the SCHOLARS.]

FAUSTUS Ah, gentlemen!

1 SCHOLAR What ails Faustus?

FAUSTUS Ah, my sweet chamber-fellow, had I lived with thee, then had I lived still; but now I die eternally. Look, comes he not, comes he not?

2 SCHOLAR What means Faustus?

3 SCHOLAR Belike he is grown into some sickness by being oversolitary.

1 SCHOLAR If it be so, we'll have physicians to cure him; 'tis but a surfeit:[5] never fear, man.

FAUSTUS A surfeit of deadly sin, that hath damned both body and soul.

2 SCHOLAR Yet Faustus, look up to heaven; remember God's mercies are infinite.

FAUSTUS But Faustus' offense can ne'er be pardoned! The serpent that tempted Eve may be saved, but not Faustus. Ah gentlemen, hear me with patience, and tremble not at my speeches, though my heart pants and quivers to remember that I have been a student here these thirty years—O would I had never seen Wittenberg, never read book—and what wonders I have done, all Wittenberg can witness—yea, all the world; for which Faustus hath lost both Germany and the world—yea, heaven itself—heaven, the seat of God, the throne of the blessed, the kingdom of joy; and must remain in hell forever—hell, ah, hell forever! Sweet friends, what shall become of Faustus, being in hell forever?

3 SCHOLAR Yet Faustus, call on God.

FAUSTUS On God, whom Faustus hath abjured? On God, whom Faustus hath blasphemed? Ah my God—I would weep, but the devil draws in my tears! gush forth blood, instead of tears—yea, life and soul! O, he stays my tongue! I would lift up my hands, but see, they hold them, they hold them!

ALL Who, Faustus?

FAUSTUS Lucifer and Mephastophilis! Ah gentlemen, I gave them my soul for my cunning.

ALL God forbid!

FAUSTUS God forbade it indeed, but Faustus hath done it: for the vain pleasure of four-and-twenty years hath Faustus lost eternal joy and felicity. I writ them a bill[6] with mine own blood, the date is expired, the time will come, and he will fetch me.

[4] To test me with his strength.

[5] Indigestion caused by overeating.

1 SCHOLAR Why did not Faustus tell us of this before, that divines might have prayed for thee?

FAUSTUS Oft have I thought to have done so, but the devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I named God, to fetch both body and soul, if I once gave ear to divinity; and now 'tis too late. Gentlemen, away, lest you perish with me!

2 SCHOLAR O what shall we do to save Faustus?

3 SCHOLAR God will strengthen me. I will stay with Faustus.

1 SCHOLAR Tempt not God, sweet friend, but let us into the next room, and there pray for him.

FAUSTUS Ay, pray for me, pray for me; and what noise soever ye hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.

2 SCHOLAR Pray thou, and we will pray, that God may have mercy upon thee.

FAUSTUS Gentlemen, farewell. If I live till morning, I'll visit you; if not, Faustus is gone to hell.

ALL Faustus, farewell. [Exeunt SCHOLARS.]

[The clock strikes eleven.]

FAUSTUS Ah Faustus,
Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,
And then thou must be damned perpetually.
Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven,
That time may cease, and midnight never come.
Fair Nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make Perpetual day, or let this hour be but
A year, a month, a week, a natural day,
That Faustus may repent and save his soul.
O lente, lente currite noctis equi\~
The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,
The devil will come, and Faustus must be damned.
O I'll leap up to my God! Who pulls me down?
See, see where Christ's blood streams in the firmament![0]
One drop would save my soul, half a drop: ah my Christ—
Ah, rend not my heart for naming of my Christ;
Yet will I call on him—O spare me, Lucifer!
Where is it now? 'Tis gone: and see where God
Stretcheth out his arm, and bends his ireful brows!
Mountains and hills, come, come and fall on me,
And hide me from the heavy wrath of God.
No, no?
Then will I headlong run into the earth:
Earth, gape! O no, it will not harbor me.
You stars that reigned at my nativity,
Whose influence hath allotted death and hell,
Now draw up Faustus like a foggy mist
Into the entrails of yon laboring cloud,
That when you vomit forth into the air
My limbs may issue from your smoky mouths,

Document.
"Slowly, slowly run, O horses of the night"; adapted from a line in Ovid's Amores.

So that my soul may but ascend to heaven.[8]
[The watch strikes.]
Ah, half the hour is past: 'twill all be past anon.
O God, if thou wilt not have mercy on my soul,
Yet for Christ's sake, whose blood hath ransomed me,
Impose some end to my incessant pain:
Let Faustus live in hell a thousand years,
A hundred thousand, and at last be saved.
O no end is limited to damned souls!
Why wert thou not a creature wanting° soul? lacking
Or why is this immortal that thou hast?
Ah, Pythagoras' metempsychosis[9]—were that true,
This soul should fly from me, and I be changed
Unto some brutish beast:
All beasts are happy, for when they die,
Their souls are soon dissolved in elements;
But mine must live still° to be plagued in hell. always
Cursed be the parents that engendered me:
No, Faustus, curse thy self, curse Lucifer,
That hath deprived thee of the joys of heaven.
[The clock striketh twelve.]
O it strikes, it strikes! Now body, turn to air,
Or Lucifer will bear thee quick° to hell. alive
[Thunder and lightning.]
O soul, be changed into little water drops,
And fall into the ocean, ne'er be found,
My God, my God, look not so fierce on me!
[Enter DEVILS.]
Adders and serpents, let me breathe awhile!
Ugly hell gape not! Come not, Lucifer!
I'll burn my books—ah, Mephastophilis!
[Exeunt with him.]

Epilogue

[Enter CHORUS.]
Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough,[1]
That sometime grew within this learned man.
Faustus is gone! Regard his hellish fall,
Whose fiendful fortune° may exhort the wise devilish fate
Only to wonder at[2] unlawful things:
Whose deepness doth entice such forward wits° aspiring minds
To practice more than heavenly power permits.
[Exit.]

Terminat hora diem, terminat author opus.[3]

The Two Texts of Doctor Faustus The following excerpts enable readers to compare a sample passage (from Scene 12) of the A text (1604) with the corresponding passage of the B text (1616). (On the two texts, see above, p. 1023.) Here the differences in tone and content in the two versions of the Old Man's speech may signal different attitudes toward the finality of Faustus's damnation.

Doctor Faustus, A Text

[Enter an OLD MAN.]
OLD MAN Ah Doctor Faustus, that I might prevail
To guide thy steps unto the way of life,
By which sweet path thou may'st attain the goal
That shall conduct thee to celestial rest.
Break heart, drop blood, and mingle it with tears,
Tears falling from repentant heaviness
Of thy most vile and loathsome filthiness,
The stench whereof corrupts the inward soul
With such flagitious° crimes of heinous sins villainous
As no commiseration may expel
But mercy, Faustus, of thy savior sweet,
Whose blood alone must wash away thy guilt.
FAUSTUS Where art thou, Faustus? Wretch, what hast thou done!
Damned art thou, Faustus, damned; despair and die!
Hell calls for right, and with a roaring voice
Says, "Faustus, come: thine hour is come!"
[MEPHASTOPHILIS gives him a dagger.]
And Faustus will come to do thee right.
OLD MAN Ah stay, good Faustus, stay thy desperate steps!
I see an angel hovers o'er thy head
And with a vial full of precious grace
Offers to pour the same into thy soul!
Then call for mercy, and avoid despair.
FAUSTUS Ah my sweet friend, I feel thy words
To comfort my distressed soul;
Leave me awhile to ponder on my sins.
OLD MAN I go, sweet Faustus; but with heavy cheer,° heavy heart
Fearing the ruin of thy hopeless soul. [Exit.]
FAUSTUS Accursed Faustus, where is mercy now?
I do repent, and yet I do despair:
Hell strives with grace for conquest in my breast!
What shall I do to shun the snares of death?
MEPHASTOPHILIS Thou traitor, Faustus: I arrest thy soul
For disobedience to my sovereign lord.
Revolt,[1] or I'll in piecemeal tear thy flesh.

Doctor Faustus, B Text

[Enter an OLD MAN.]

OLD MAN O gentle Faustus, leave this damned art,
This magic that will charm thy soul to hell
And quite bereave thee of salvation.
Though thou hast now offended like a man,
Do not persever° in it like a devil. persevere
Yet, yet, thou hast an amiable° soul, worthy of (divine) love
If sin by custom grow not into nature.
Then, Faustus, will repentance come too late;
Then thou art banished from the sight of heaven.
No mortal can express the pains of hell.
It may be this my exhortation
Seems harsh and all unpleasant; let it not,
For, gentle son, I speak it not in wrath
Or envy of° thee, but in tender love ill will toward
And pity of thy future misery.
And so have hope that this my kind rebuke,
Checking° thy body, may amend thy soul. rebuking

FAUSTUS Where art thou, Faustus? Wretch, what hast thou done?
Hell claims his right, and with a roaring voice
Says, "Faustus, come; thine hour is almost come";
And Faustus now will come to do thee right.
[MEPHOSTOPHILIS gives him a dagger.]

OLD MAN O stay, good Faustus, stay thy desperate steps.
I see an angel hover o'er thy head,
And with a vial full of precious grace
Offers to pour the same into thy soul.
Then call for mercy and avoid despair.

FAUSTUS O friend, I feel thy words
To comfort my distressed soul.
Leave me a while to ponder on my sins.

OLD MAN Faustus, I leave thee, but with grief of heart,
Fearing the enemy of thy hapless soul. [Exit.]

FAUSTUS Accursed Faustus, wretch, what hast thou done?
I do repent, and yet I do despair.
Hell strives with grace for conquest in my breast.
What shall I do to shun the snares of death?

MEPHOSTOPHILIS Thou traitor, Faustus, I arrest thy soul
For disobedience to my sovereign lord.
Revolt,[1] or I'll in piecemeal tear thy flesh.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE
1564-1616

William Shakespeare was born in the small market town of Stratford-on-Avon in April (probably April 23) 1564. His father, a successful glovemaker, landowner, moneylender, and dealer in agricultural commodities, was elected to several important posts in local government but later suffered financial and social reverses, possibly as a result of adherence to the Catholic faith. Shakespeare almost certainly attended the free Stratford grammar school, where he could have acquired a reasonably impressive education, including a respectable knowledge of Latin, but he did not proceed to Oxford or Cambridge. There are legends about Shakespeare's youth but no documented facts. Some scholars are tempted to associate him with "William Shakeshafte," a young actor attached to a recusant Catholic circle in Lancashire around 1581; one of Shakespeare's former Stratford schoolmasters belonged to this circle. But the first unambiguous record we have of his life after his christening is that of his marriage in 1582, at age eighteen, to Anne Hathaway, eight years his senior. A daughter, Susanna, was born six months later, in 1583, and twins, Hamnet and Judith, in 1585. We possess no information about his activities for the next seven years, but by 1592 he was in London as an actor and apparently already well known as a playwright, for a rival dramatist, Bobert Greene, refers to him resentfully in A Groatsuwrth of Wit as "an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers."

At this time, there were several companies of professional actors in London and in the provinces. What connection Shakespeare had with one or more of them before 1592 is conjectural, but we do know of his long and fruitful connection with the most successful troupe, the Lord Chamberlain's Men, who later, when James I came to the throne, became the King's Men. Shakespeare not only acted with this company but eventually became a leading shareholder and the principal playwright. Then as now, making a living in the professional theater was not easy: competition among the repertoire companies was stiff, civic officials and religious moralists regarded playacting as a sinful, time-wasting nuisance and tried to ban it altogether, government officials exercised censorship over the contents of the plays, and periodic outbreaks of bubonic plague led to temporary closing of the London theaters. But Shakespeare's company, which included some of the most famous actors of the day, nonetheless thrived and in 1599 began to perform in the Globe, a fine, open-air theater that the company built for itself on the south bank of the Thames. The company also performed frequently at court and, after 1608, at Blackfriars, an indoor London theater. Already by 1597 Shakespeare had so prospered that he was able to purchase New Place, a handsome house in Stratford; he could now call himself a gentleman, as his father had (probably with the financial assistance of his successful playwright son) been granted a coat of arms the previous year. Shakespeare's wife and daughters (his son, Hamnet, having died in 1596) resided in Stratford, while the playwright, living in rented rooms in London, pursued his career. Shortly after writing The Tempest (ca. 1611), he retired from direct involvement in the theater and returned to Stratford. In March 1616, he signed his will; he died a month later, leaving the bulk of his estate to his daughter Susanna. To his wife of thirty-four years, he left "my second best bed."

Shakespeare began his career as a playwright, probably in the early 1590s, by writing comedies and history plays. The earliest of these histories, generally based on accounts of English kings written by Raphael Holinshed and other sixteenth-century chroniclers, seem theatrically vital but crude, as does an early attempt at tragedy, Titus Andronicus. But Shakespeare quickly moved on to create by the later 1590s a sequence of profoundly searching and ambitious history plays—Richard II, the first and second parts of Henry IV, and Henry V—which together explore the death throes of feudal England and the birth of the modern nation-state ruled by a charismatic monarch. In the same years he wrote a succession of romantic comedies (The Merchant of Venice, The Merry' Wives of Windsor, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, Twelfth Night) whose poetic richness and emotional complexity remain unmatched.

Twelfth Night was probably written in the same year as Hamlet (ca. 1601), which initiated an outpouring of great tragic dramas: Othello, King Lear, Macheth, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus. These plays, written from 1601 to 1607, seem to mark a major shift in sensibility, an existential and metaphysical darkening that many readers think must have originated in personal anguish. Whatever the truth of this speculation—and we have no direct, personal testimony either to support or to undermine it—there appears to have occurred in the same period a shift as well in Shakespeare's comic sensibility. The comedies written between 1601 and 1604, Troilus and Cressida, All's Well That Ends Well, and Measure for Measure, are sufficiently different from the earlier comedies—more biting in tone, more uneasy with comic conventions, more ruthlessly questioning of the values of the characters and the resolutions of the plots—to have led some modern scholars to classify them as "problem plays" or "dark comedies." Another group of plays, among the last that Shakespeare wrote, seem similarly to define a distinct category. Pericles, Cymheline, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest, written between 1608 and 1611, when Shakespeare had developed a remarkably fluid, dream-like sense of plot and a poetic style that could veer, apparently effortlessly, from the tortured to the ineffably sweet, are now commonly known as the "romances." These plays share an interest in the moral and emotional life less of the adolescents who dominate the earlier comedies than of their parents. The "romances" are deeply concerned with patterns of loss and recovery, suffering and redemption, despair and renewal. They have seemed to many critics to constitute a self-conscious conclusion to a career that opened with histories and comedies and passed through the dark and tormented tragedies.

Shakespeare himself apparently had no interest in preserving for posterity the sum of his writings, let alone in clarifying the chronology of his works or in specifying which plays he wrote alone and which with collaborators. He wrote plays for performance by his company, and his scripts existed in his own handwritten manuscripts or in scribal copies, in playhouse prompt books, and probably in pirated texts based on shorthand reports of a performance or on reconstructions from memory by an actor or spectator. None of these manuscript versions has survived. Eighteen of his plays were published during his lifetime in the small-format, inexpensive books called quartos; to these were added eighteen other plays, never before printed, in the large, expensive folio volume of Mr. William Shakespeares Comedies, Histories, Tragedies (1623), published seven years after his death. This First Folio, edited by two of his friends and fellow actors, John Heminges and Henry Condell, is prefaced by a poem of Ben Jonson's, in which Shakespeare is hailed, presciently, as "not of an age, but for all time."

That Shakespeare is "for all time" does not mean that he did not also belong to his own age. It is possible to see where Shakespeare adapted the techniques of his contemporaries and where, crucially, he differed from them. Shakespeare rarely invented the plots of his dramas, preferring to work, often quite closely, with stories he found ready-made in histories, novellas, narrative poems, or other plays. The religious mystery plays and the allegorical morality plays still popular during his childhood taught him that dramas worth seeing must get at something central to the human condition, that they should embody as well as narrate the crucial actions, and that they could reach not only a coterie of the educated elite but also the great mass of ordinary people. From these and other theatrical models, Shakespeare learned how to construct plays around the struggle for the soul of a protagonist, how to create theatrically compelling and subversive figures of wickedness, and how to focus attention on his characters' psychological, moral, and spiritual lives, as well as on their outward behavior.

The authors of the morality plays thought that they could enhance the broad impact they sought to achieve by stripping their characters of all incidental distinguishing traits and getting to their essences. They thought that their audiences would thereby not be distracted by the irrelevant details of individual identities. Shakespeare grasped that the spectacle of human destiny was in fact vastly more compelling when it was attached not to generalized abstractions but to particular people, people whom he realized with an unprecedented intensity of individuation: not Youth but Viola, not Everyman but Lear. No other writer of his time was able to create and enter into the interior worlds of so many characters, conveying again and again a sense of unique and irreducible selfhood. In the plays of Shakespeare's brilliant contemporary Marlowe, the protagonist overwhelms virtually all of the other characters; in Shakespeare, by contrast, even relatively minor characters—Maria in Twelfth Night, for example, or the fool in King Lear—make astonishingly powerful claims on the audience's attention. The Romantic critic William Hazlitt observed that Shakespeare had the power to multiply himself marvelously. His plays convey the sense of an inexhaustible imaginative generosity.

Shakespeare was singularly alert to the fantastic vitality of the English language. His immense vocabulary bears witness to an uncanny ability to absorb terms from a wide range of pursuits and to transform them into intimate registers of thought and feeling. He had a seemingly boundless capacity to generate metaphors, and he was virtually addicted to word play. Double-meanings, verbal echoes, and submerged associations ripple through every passage, deepening the reader's enjoyment and understanding, though sometimes at the expense of a single clear sense. The eighteenth-century critic Samuel Johnson complained with some justice that the quibble, the pun, was "the fatal Cleopatra for which Shakespeare lost the world and was content to lose it." For the power that continually discharges itself throughout his plays and poems, at once constituting and unsettling everything it touches, is the polymorphous power of language.

Anachronism is rarely a concern for Shakespeare. His ancient Romans throw their caps into the air and use Christian oaths: to this extent he pulled everything he touched into his contemporary existence. But at the same time he was not a social realist; other writers in this period are better at conveying the precise details of the daily lives of shoemakers, alchemists, and judges. The settings of his plays—"Illyria" in Twelfth Night, for example, or ancient Britain in King Lear—were for Shakespeare not realistic representations of particular historical times and places but rather imaginative displacements into alternative worlds that remain strangely familiar.

Though on occasion he depicts ghosts, demons, and other supernatural figures, the universe Shakespeare conjures up seems resolutely human-centered and secular: the torments and joys that most deeply matter are found in this world, not in the next. Attempts to claim him for one or another religious system have proven unconvincing, as have attempts to assign him a specific political label. Activists and ideologues of all political stripes have viewed him as an ally: he has been admiringly quoted by kings and by revolutionaries, by fascists, liberal democrats, socialists, republicans, and communists. At once an agent of civility and an agent of subversion, Shakespeare seems to have been able to view society simultaneously as an insider and as an outsider. His plays can be interpreted and performed—with deep conviction and compelling power—in utterly contradictory ways. The centuries-long accumulation of these interpretations and performances, far from exhausting Shakespeare's aesthetic appeal, seems only to have enhanced its perennial freshness.*

Sonnets In Elizabethan England aristocratic patronage, with the money, protection, and prestige it alone could provide, was probably a professional writer's most important asset. This patronage, or at least Shakespeare's quest for it, is most visible in his dedication in 1593 and 1594 of his narrative poems, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, to the wealthy young nobleman Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. What return the poet got for his exquisite offerings is unknown. We do know that among wits and gallants the narrative poems won Shakespeare a fine reputation as an immensely stylish and accomplished poet. This reputation was enhanced as well by manuscript circulation of his sonnets, which were mentioned admiringly in print more than ten years before they were published in 1609 (apparently without his personal supervision and perhaps without his consent).

See the color insert in this volume for the "Chandos" portrait of Shakespeare and a portrait of Henry Wriothesley, third earl of Southampton and possibly the dedicatee of Shakespeare's Sonnets.

Shakespeare's sonnets are quite unlike the other sonnet sequences of his day, notably in his almost unprecedented choice of a beautiful young man (rather than a lady) as the principal object of praise, love, and idealizing devotion and in his portrait of a dark, sensuous, and sexually promiscuous mistress (rather than the usual chaste and aloof blond beauty). Nor are the moods confined to what the Renaissance thought were those of the despairing Petrarchan lover: they include delight, pride, melancholy, shame, disgust, and fear. Shakespeare's sequence suggests a story, although the details are vague, and there is even doubt whether the sonnets as published are in an order established by the poet himself. Certain motifs are evident: an introductory series (1 to 17) celebrates the beauty of a young man and urges him to marry and beget children who will bear his image. The subsequent long sequence (18 to 126), passionately focused on the beloved young man, develops as a dominant motif the transience and destructive power of time, countered only by the force of love and the permanence of poetry. The remaining sonnets focus chiefly on the so-called Dark Lady as an alluring but degrading object of desire. Some sonnets (like 144) intimate a love triangle involving the speaker, the male friend, and the woman; others take note of a rival poet (sometimes identified as George Chapman or Christopher Marlowe). The biographical background of the sonnets has inspired a mountain of speculation, but very little of it has any factual support.

Though there are many variations, Shakespeare's most frequent rhyme scheme in the sonnets is abab cdcd efef gg. This so-called Shakespearean pattern often (though not always) calls attention to three distinct quatrains (each of which may develop a separate metaphor), followed by a closing couplet that may either confirm or pull sharply against what has gone before. Startling shifts in direction may occur in lines other than the closing ones; consider, for example, the twists and turns in the opening lines of sonnet 138: "When my love swears that she is made of truth, /1 do believe her, though I know she lies." Shakespeare's sonnets as a whole are strikingly intense, conveying a sense of high psychological and moral stakes. They are also remarkably dense, written with a daunting energy, concentration, and compression. Often the main idea of the poem may be grasped quickly, but the precise movement of thought and feeling, the links among the shifting images, the syntax, tone, and rhetorical structure prove immensely challenging. These are poems that famously reward rereading.

[1] This odd dedication bears the initials of the publisher, Thomas Thorpe. The W. H. addressed here may or may not be the male friend addressed in sonnets 1 to 126. Leading candidates for that role are Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, the dedicatee of Venus and Adonis (1593) and The

From fairest creatures we desire increase,
That thereby beauty's rose might never die,
But as the riper should by time decease,
His tender heir might bear his memory;
But thou, contracted[2] to thine own bright eyes,
Feed'st thy light's flame with self-substantial[3] fuel
Making a famine where abundance lies,
Thyself thy foe, to thy sweet self too cruel.
Thou that art now the world's fresh ornament
And only[4] herald to the gaudy spring,
Within thine own bud buriest thy content[5]
And, tender churl,[6] mak'st waste in niggarding.° hoarding
Pity the world, or else this glutton be,
To eat the world's due,[7] by the grave and thee.

Look in thy glass° and tell the face thou viewest mirror
Now is the time that face should form another,
Whose fresh repair if now thou not renewest,
Thou dost beguile° the world, unbless some mother. cheat
For where is she so fair whose uneared° womb unplowed
Disdains the tillage of thy husbandry?
Or who is he so fond° will be the tomb foolish
Of his self-love, to stop posterity?
Thou art thy mother's glass, and she in thee
Calls back the lovely April of her prime;
So thou through windows of thine age shalt see,
Despite of wrinkles, this thy golden time.
But if thou live rememb'red not to be,
Die single, and thine image dies with thee.

When I do count the clock that tells the time
And see the brave° day sunk in hideous night, splendid
When I behold the violet past prime
And sable curls all silvered o'er with white,
When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
Which erst° from heat did canopy the herd formerly
And summer's green all girded up in sheaves
Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard:
Then of thy beauty do I question make° speculate

Rape of Lucrece (1594), and William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, a dedicatee of the First Folio. But there is no hard evidence to support these or other suggested identifications of the male friend or of the so-called Dark Lady; these sonnet personages may or may not have had real-life counterparts.

Since all the sonnets save two were first published in 1609, we do not repeat the date after each one. Numbers 138 and 144 were first published in 1599, in a verse miscellany called The Passionate Pilgrim.

[2] Betrothed, also withdrawn into.

[3] Of your own substance.

[4] Principal, with overtones of single, solitary.

[5] What you contain (potential for fatherhood), also what would content you (marriage and fatherhood).

[6] Gentle boor (an oxymoron).

[7] I.e., by willfully dying without issue.

That thou among the wastes of time must go,
Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake,
And die as fast as they see others grow,
And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defense
Save breed, to brave[8] him when he takes thee hence.

When I consider every thing that grows
Holds[0] in perfection but a little moment; remains
That this huge stage presenteth nought but shows
Whereon the stars in secret influence comment;[9]
When I perceive that men as plants increase,
Cheered and checked[1] even by the selfsame sky,
Vaunt[2] in their youthful sap, at height decrease,
And wear their brave state out of memory;[3]
Then the conceit[0] of this inconstant stay conception
Sets you most rich in youth before my sight,
Where wasteful Time debateth[4] with Decay
To change your day of youth to sullied[0] night, soiled, blackened
And all in war with Time for love of you,
As he takes from you, I ingraft[5] you new.

18

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Hough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date;
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance or nature's changing course untrimmed.[6]
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st;[0] ownest
Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st:[0] are grafted
So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this,[7] and this gives life to thee.

19

Devouring Time, blunt thou the lion's paws,
And make the earth devour her own sweet brood;
Pluck the keen teeth from the fierce tiger's jaws,
And burn the long-lived phoenix in her blood;[8]

Make glad and sorry seasons as thou fleet'st,
And do whate'er thou wilt, swift-footed Time,
To the wide world and all her fading sweets,
But I forbid thee one most heinous crime:
O carve not with thy hours my love's fair brow,
Nor draw no lines there with thine antique[9] pen;
Him in thy course untainted[1] do allow,
For beauty's pattern to succeeding men.
Yet do thy worst, old Time: despite thy wrong,
My love shall in my verse ever live young.

A woman's face with Nature's own hand painted[2]
Hast thou, the master mistress of my passion;[3]
A woman's gentle heart but not acquainted
With shifting change as is false women's fashion;
An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling,° roving
Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth;
A man in hue all hues[4] in his controlling,
Which steals men's eyes and women's souls amazeth.
And for a woman wert thou first created,
Till Nature as she wrought thee fell a-doting,[5]
And by addition me of thee defeated,
By adding one thing to my purpose nothing.
But since she pricked[6] thee out for women's pleasure,
Mine be thy love, and thy love's use their treasure.[7]

23

As an unperfect actor on the stage
Who with his fear is put besides° his part, forgets
Or some fierce thing replete with too much rage
Whose strength's abundance weakens his own heart,
So I, for fear of trust,° forget to say lack of confidence
The perfect ceremony of love's rite.[8]
And in mine own love's strength seem to decay,
O'er-charged° with burden of mine own love's might. overweighed
O let my books be then the eloquence
And dumb presagers° of my speaking breast, mute presenters
Who plead for love, and look for recompense
More than that tongue that more hath more expressed.[9]
O learn to read what silent love hath writ;
To hear with eyes belongs to love's fine wit.° intelligence

---

[9] (1) Old, (2) fantastic (antic).

[1] (1) Undefiled, (2) untouched by a weapon (a term from jousting).

[2] I.e., not made up with cosmetics.

[3] (1) Strong feeling, (2) poem.

[4] "Hue" probably means appearance or form. In the first edition, "hues" is spelled "Hews," which some have taken as indicating a pun on a proper name. It has also been suggested that "man in" is a copyist's or compositor's misreading of "maiden."

[5] (1) Crazy, (2) infatuated.

[6] Marked, with obvious sexual pun.

[7] (1) Sexual enjoyment, (2) interest (as in usury).

[8] The first edition has "right," suggesting love's due as well as love's ritual ("rite").

[9] More than that (rival) speaker who has more often said more.

When, in disgrace° with Fortune and men's eyes, disfavor
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless° cries, futile
And look upon myself and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him with friends possessed,[1]
Desiring this man's art° and that man's scope,° skill / ability
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply I think on thee, and then my state[2]
(Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth) sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

30

When to the sessions[3] of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail° my dear time's waste: bewail anew
Then can I drown an eye (unused to flow)
For precious friends hid in death's dateless° night, endless
And weep afresh love's long since canceled woe,
And moan th' expense° of many a vanished sight: loss
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,° former
And heavily from woe to woe tell° o'er count
The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored and sorrows end.

33

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,° sunlight
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
Anon° permit the basest° clouds to ride (but) soon / darkest
With ugly rack° on his celestial face, cloudy mask
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace.
Even so my sun one early morn did shine
With all triumphant splendor on my brow;
But out, alack,° he was but one hour mine; alas
The region° cloud hath masked him from me now

---

[1] I.e., I wish I had one man's looks, another man's friends.

[2] Condition, state of mind; but in line 14 there is a pun on state meaning chair of state, throne.

[3] Sittings of court. "Summon up" (next line) continues the metaphor.

Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth:
Suns of the world may stain° when heaven's sun staineth. darken

35

No more be grieved at that which thou hast done:
Roses have thorns, and silver fountains mud.
Clouds and eclipses stain° both moon and sun, dim
And loathsome canker° lives in sweetest bud. rose worm
All men make faults, and even I in this,
Authorizing thy trespass with compare,° comparisons
Myself corrupting, salving thy amiss,° palliating your offense
Excusing thy sins more than thy sins are;
For to thy sensual fault I bring in sense°—
Thy adverse party is thy advocate—
And 'gainst myself a lawful plea commence.
Such civil war is in my love and hate,
That I an accessory needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me.

55

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
Rut you shall shine more bright in these contents
Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.[4]
When wasteful war shall statues overturn,
And broils° root out the work of masonry, battles
Nor Mars his° sword nor war's quick fire shall burn neither Mars's
The living record of your memory.
'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity[5]
Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.° Judgment Day
So, till the judgment that yourself arise,[6]
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

60

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end;
Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.[7]
Nativity, once in the main° of light, broad expanse
Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crowned,
Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And Time that gave doth now his gift confound.
Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth

---

[4] I.e., than in a stone tomb or effigy that time wears away and covers with dust. "Sluttish": slovenly.

[5] The enmity of oblivion, of being forgotten.

[6] Until you rise from the dead on Judgment Day.

[7] Toiling and following each other, all struggle to move forward.

And delves the parallels[8] in beauty's brow,
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow.
And yet to times in hope° my verse shall stand, future times
Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

62

Sin of self-love possesseth all mine eye,
And all my soul, and all my every part;
And for this sin there is no remedy,
It is so grounded inward in my heart.
Methinks no face so gracious° is as mine, pleasing
No shape so true,° no truth of such account, perfect
And for myself mine own worth do define
As° I all other° in all worths surmount. as if / others
But when my glass° shows me myself indeed, mirror
Beated and chapped with tanned antiquity,
Mine own self-love quite contrary° I read; differently
Self so self-loving were iniquity.
'Tis thee, my self,° that for° myself I praise, you, my other self / as
Painting my age with beauty of thy days.

65

Since[9] brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea,
But sad mortality o'ersways their power,
How with this rage° shall beauty hold a plea, destructive power
Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
O how shall summer's honey breath hold out
Against the wrackful° siege of batt'ring days, destructive
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but Time decays?
O fearful meditation! where, alack,
Shall Time's best jewel from Time's chest[1] lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?
Or who his spoil° of beauty can forbid? ravaging
O none, unless this miracle have might,
That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

71

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell[2]
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it; for I love you so,

---

[8] Digs the parallel furrows (wrinkles). "Transfix the flourish": remove the embellishment. To "flourish" is also to blossom.

[9] I.e., because there is neither.

[1] I.e., from being coffered up by Time.

[2] The bell was tolled to announce the death of a member of the parish—one stroke for each year of his or her life.

That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
Oh, if, I say, you look upon this verse
When I perhaps compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,° repeat
But let your love even with my life decay;
  Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
  And mock you with me after I am gone.

73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang
Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs,[3] where late° the sweet birds sang. lately
In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west;
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.[4]
  This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
  To love that well, which thou must leave ere long.

74

But be contented; when that fell[5] arrest
Without all bail shall carry me away,
My life hath in this line some interest,[6]
Which for memorial still° with thee shall stay. always
When thou reviewest this, thou dost review
The very part was° consecrate to thee. i.e., which was
The earth can have but earth, which is his due;
My spirit is thine, the better part of me.
So then thou hast but lost the dregs of life,
The prey of worms, my body being dead,
The coward conquest of a wretch's knife,[7]
Too base of° thee to be remembered. by
  The worth of that is that which it contains,[8]
  And that is this, and this with thee remains.

80

O, how I faint° when I of you do write, get discouraged
Knowing a better spirit[9] doth use your name,
And in the praise thereof spends all his might,

---

[3] The part of a church where divine service was sung.

[4] Choked by the ashes of that which once nourished its flame.

[5] Cruel. Hamlet says, "this fell sergeant / Death is strict in his arrest" (5.2.278—79).

[6] Share, participation. "In this line": i.e., poetry.

[7] Death's weapon (like Time's scythe).

[8] I.e., the only value of the body is that it contains the spirit.

[9] A rival poet. See the headnote.

To make me tongue-tied, speaking of your fame!
But since your worth, wide as the ocean is,
The humble as° the proudest sail doth bear, as well as
My saucy bark,° inferior far to his, impudent boat
On your broad main° doth willfully° appear. waters / boldly
Your shallowest help will hold me up afloat
Whilst he upon your soundless° deep doth ride; bottomless
Or, being wrecked, I am a worthless boat,
He of tall building[1] and of goodly pride.° magnificence
Then if he thrive and I be cast away,
The worst was this: my love was my decay.

85

My tongue-tied milse in manners holds her still° tactfully says nothing
While comments of° your praise, richly compiled, commentaries in Reserve thy character° with golden quill hoard up -your features
And precious phrase by all the muses filed.° polished
I think good thoughts whilst other° write good words, others
And like unlettered clerk still cry "Amen"
To every hymn[2] that able spirit affords° offers
In polished form of well-refined pen.
Hearing you praised I say " 'Tis so,'tis true,"
And to the most° of praise add something more; highest
Rut that is in my thought,° whose love to you, i.e., is unspoken
Though words come hindmost, holds his rank before.° before all others
Then others for the breath of words respect,° regard
Me for my dumb thoughts, speaking in effect.° in reality

87

Farewell: thou art too dear[3] for my possessing,
And like enough thou know'st thy estimate.° value
The charter° of thy worth gives thee releasing; deed, contract for property
My bonds in thee are all determinate.° expired
For how do I hold thee but by thy granting,
And for that riches where is my deserving?
The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
And so my patent° back again is swerving. title
Thy self thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
Or me, to whom thou gav'st it, else mistaking;
So thy great gift, upon misprision growing,° based on error
Comes home again, on better judgment making.
Thus have I had thee as a dream doth flatter:
In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

93

So shall I live supposing thou art true,
Like a deceived husband; so love's face° appearance

---

[1] Tall, strong build.
[2] "Like . . . hymn": like an illiterate parish clerk reflexively approve ("cry 'Amen' " after) every poem ("hymn") of praise.
[3] (1) Expensive, (2) beloved,

May still seem love to me, though altered new—
Thy looks with me, thy heart in other place.
For there can live no hatred in thine eye;
Therefore in that I cannot know thy change.
In many's looks the false heart's history
Is writ in moods and frowns and wrinkles strange:[4]
But heaven in thy creation did decree
That in thy face sweet love should ever dwell;
Whate'er thy thoughts or thy heart's workings be,
Thy looks should nothing thence but sweetness tell.
How like Eve's apple doth thy beauty grow° become
If thy sweet virtue answer not thy show![5]

94

They that have power to hurt and will do none,
That do not do the thing they most do show,[6]
Who, moving others, are themselves as stone,
Unmoved, cold, and to temptation slow;
They rightly do inherit heaven's graces
And husband nature's riches from expense;[7]
They are the lords and owners of their faces,
Others but stewards of their excellence.
The summer's flower is to the summer sweet,
Though to itself it only live and die,
But if that flower with base infection meet,
The basest weed outbraves° his dignity: surpasses
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds;
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.

97

How like a winter hath my absence been
From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year!
What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen!
What old December's bareness everywhere!
And yet this time removed[8] was summer's time,
The teeming autumn, big with rich increase,
Bearing the wanton burthen of the prime,[9]
Like widowed wombs after their lords' decease;
Yet this abundant issue° seemed to me outgrowth
But hope of orphans and unfathered fruit;
For summer and his pleasures wait on thee,
And, thou away, the very birds are mute;
Or, if they sing, 'tis with so dull a cheer° such a dismal mood
That leaves look pale, dreading the winter's near.

---

[4] Unaccustomed. "Moods": moody expressions.

[5] Does not correspond to your appearance.

[6] Seem to do, or seem capable of doing.

[7] I.e., they do not squander nature's gifts.

[8] I.e., when I was absent.

[9] Spring, which has engendered the lavish crop ("wanton burthen") that autumn is now left to bear.

From you have I been absent in the spring,
When proud-pied[1] April, dressed in all his trim,
Hath put a spirit of youth in everything,
That heavy Saturn° laughed and leapt with him. of melancholy
Yet nor° the lays° of birds, nor the sweet smell neither / songs
Of different flowers in odor and in hue,
Could make me any summer's story tell,
Or from their proud lap pluck them where they grew;
Nor did I wonder at° the lily's white, admire
Nor praise the deep vermilion in the rose;
They were but sweet, but figures of delight,
Drawn after you, you pattern of all those.
   Yet seemed it winter still, and, you away,
   As with your shadow I with these did play.

105

Let not my love be called idolatry,
Nor my beloved as an idol show,
Since all alike my songs and praises be
To one, of one, still° such, and ever so. continually
Kind is my love today, tomorrow kind,
Still constant in a wondrous excellence.
Therefore my verse, to constancy confined,
One thing expressing, leaves out difference.° variety
"Fair, kind, and true" is all my argument,° theme
"Fair, kind, and true" varying to other words,
And in this change is my invention spent,[2]
Three themes in one, which wonderous scope affords.
   Fair, kind, and true have often lived alone,° separately
   Which three till now never kept seat° in one. d-welt permanently

106

When in the chronicle of wasted° time past
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,° persons
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme
In praise of ladies dead and lovely knights,
Then, in the blazon[3] of sweet beauty's best,
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
I see their antique pen would have expressed
Even such a beauty as you master now.
So all their praises are but prophecies
Of this our time, all you prefiguring;
And, for they looked but with divining eyes,[4]
They had not skill enough your worth to sing:
   For we, which now behold these present days,
   Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

---

[1] Magnificent in many colors.
[2] And in varying the words alone my inventiveness is expended.
[3] Catalog of excellencies.
[4] Because ("for") they were able only ("but") to foresee prophetically.

107

Not mine own fears, nor the prophetic soul
Of the wide world dreaming on things to come,[5]
Can yet the lease of my true love control,
Supposed as forfeit to a confined doom.[6]
The mortal moon hath her eclipse endured,
And the sad augurs mock their own presage;[7]
Incertainties now crown themselves assured,
And peace[8] proclaims olives of endless age.
Now with the drops of this most balmy time
My love looks fresh, and death to me subscribes,° submits
Since, spite of him, I'll live in this poor rhyme,
While he insults o'er dull and speechless tribes:
  And thou in this shalt find thy monument,
  When tyrants' crests and tombs of brass are spent.° wasted away

110

Alas, 'tis true I have gone here and there
And made myself a motley° to the view, fool, jester
Gored mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear,
Made old offenses of affections° new. passions
Most true it is that I have looked on truth
Askance and strangely;[9] but, by all above,
These blenches° gave my heart another youth, turnings aside
And worse essays[1] proved thee my best of love.
Now all is done, have what shall have no end:
Mine appetite I never more will grind° whet
On newer proof,° to try° an older friend, experiences / test
A god in love, to whom I am confined.
  Then give me welcome, next my heaven the best,[2]
  Even to thy pure and most most loving breast.

116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments;[3] love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove:
O, no, it is an ever-fixed mark,[4]
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;

---

[5] This sonnet refers to contemporary events and the prophecies, common in Elizabethan almanacs, of disaster.

[6] I.e., can yet put an end to my love, which I thought doomed to early forfeiture.

[7] The "mortal moon" is probably Queen Elizabeth; her "eclipse" could be either her death (March 1603) or, perhaps, her "climacteric" year, her sixty-third (thought meaningful because the product of two "significant" numbers, 7 and 9), which ended in September 1596. The sober astrologers ("sad augurs") now ridicule their own predictions ("presage") of catastrophe, because they turned out to be false.

[8] Perhaps referring to the peace treaty signed with Spain by Elizabeth's successor, James 1, or, if the sonnet refers to the time of Elizabeth's climacteric, to an earlier treaty between England and France.

[9] Obliquely or asquint, and coldly (like a stranger). "Gored" (line 3): wounded, pierced.

[1] Trials of worse relationships.

[2] I.e., the next best thing to the Christian heaven.

[3] From the Anglican marriage service: "If either of you do know any impediment why ye may not be lawfully joined together . . ."

[4] Seamark (cf. landmark).

It is the star to every wand'ring bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his highth[5] be taken.
Love's not Time's fool,° though rosy lips and cheeks plaything
Within his[6] bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.° brink of Judgment Day
  If this be error and upon me proved,
  I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

126

O thou, my lovely boy, who in thy power
Dost hold Time's fickle glass,[7] his sickle, hour;° hourglass
Who hast by waning grown and therein show'st° i.e., in contrast
Thy lovers withering as thy sweet self grow'st;
If Nature (sovereign mistress over wrack°) destruction
As thou goest onwards still will pluck thee back,
She keeps thee to this purpose, that her skill
May Time disgrace and wretched minutes kill.
Yet fear her, O thou minion° of her pleasure, darling
She may detain, but not still° keep, her treasure! always
  Her audit° (though delayed) answered must be, accounting
  And her quietus° is to render° thee. settlement / surrender

127

In the old age black was not counted fair,[8]
Or, if it were, it bore not beauty's name;
But now is black beauty's successive heir,[9]
And beauty slandered with a bastard shame;° declared illegitimate
For since each hand hath put on nature's power,
Fairing the foul with art's false borrowed face,° i.e., with cosmetics
Sweet beauty hath no name, no holy bower,[1]
But is profaned, if not lives in disgrace.
Therefore my mistress' brows are raven black,
Her eyes so suited,° and they mourners seem i.e., also black
At° such who, not born fair, no beauty lack,[2] for
Sland'ring creation with a false esteem:
  Yet so they mourn, becoming of° their woe, gracing
  That every tongue says beauty should look so.

128

How oft when thou, my music, music play'st
Upon that blessed wood[3] whose motion sounds
With thy sweet fingers when thou gently sway'st° govemest
The wiry concord that mine ear confounds,[4]

---

[5] The star's value is incalculable, although its "highth" (altitude) may be known and used for practical purposes.
[6] Time's (as also in line 11).
[7] Mirror, fickle because as the subject ages the mirror reflects a changed image.
[8] Beautiful, equated with blond hair and coloring. "Old": former. "Black": dark hair and coloring, equated with ugliness.
[9] Heir in line of succession.
[1] Shrine. The next line suggests that natural (unpainted) beauty is now discredited.
[2] I.e., nevertheless possess the appearance of beauty.
[3] Keys of the spinet or virginal.
[4] The harmony from the strings that overcomes my ear with delight.

Do I envy those jacks[5] that nimble leap
To kiss the tender inward of thy hand,
Whilst my poor lips, which should that harvest reap,
At the wood's boldness by thee blushing stand.
To be so tickled they would change their state
And situation[6] with those dancing chips,
O'er whom thy fingers walk with gentle gait,
Making dead wood more blessed than living lips.
  Since saucy jacks[7] so happy are in this,
  Give them thy fingers, me thy lips to kiss.

129

Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame
Is lust in action;[8] and till action, lust
Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude,° cruel, not to trust; brutal
Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight:° immediately
Past reason hunted; and no sooner had,
Past reason hated, as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad:
Mad in pursuit, and in possession so;
Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
A bliss in proof[9] and proved, a very° woe; true
Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.
  All this the world well knows; yet none knows well
  To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;[1]
Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;
If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head.
I have seen roses damasked,° red and white, variegated
But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
And in some perfumes is there more delight
Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.[2]
I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
I grant I never saw a goddess go;° walk
My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground.
  And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare° admirable; extraordinary
  As any she belied° with false compare. misrepresented

---

[5] The keys (actually, "jacks" are the plectra that pluck the strings when activated by the keys).

[6] Physical location. "State": place in the order of things.

[7] With a quibble on the sense "impertinent fellows."

[8] The word order here is inverted and slightly obscures the meaning. Lust, when put into action, expends "spirit" (life, vitality; also semen) in a "waste" (desert; also with a pun on waist) of shame.

[9] A bliss during the experience.

[1] An anti-Petrarchan sonnet. All of the details commonly attributed by other Elizabethan sonneteers to their ladies (for example, in Spenser's Amoretti 64, p. 904) are here denied to the poet's mistress.

[2] Not with our pejorative sense, but simply "emanates."

135

Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will,[3]
And Will to boot, and Will in overplus;
More than enough am I that vex thee still,° always
To thy sweet will making addition thus.
Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,
Not once vouchsafe° to hide my will in thine?
Shall will in others seem right gracious,
And in° my will no fair acceptance shine? in the case of
The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,
And in abundance addeth to his store,° plenty
So thou being rich in Will add to thy Will
One will of mine to make thy large Will more.
Let no unkind, no fair beseechers kill;[4]
Think all but one, and me in that one Will.

138

When my love swears that she is made of truth,
I do believe her, though I know she lies,[5]
That she might think me some untutored youth,
Unlearned in the world's false subtleties.
Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,[6]
Simply° I credit her false-speaking tongue: like a simpleton
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?° unfaithful
And wherefore say not I that I am old?
Oh, love's best habit° is in seeming trust, clothing, guise
And age in love loves not to have years told.° counted
Therefore I lie with her and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flattered be.

144

Two loves I have of comfort and despair,[7]
Which like two spirits do suggest me still:° tempt me constantly
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman colored ill.° dark
To win me soon to hell, my female evil
Tempteth my better angel from my side,
And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
Wooing his purity with her foul pride.[8]
And whether that my angel be turned fiend

---

[3] (1) Wishes, (2) carnal desire, (3) the male and female sexual organs, (4) a lover—Shakespeare?—named Will. This is one of several sonnets punning on the word.

[4] I.e., do not kill with unkindness any of your wooers.

[5] With the obvious sexual pun (as also in lines 13-14). "Made of truth": (1) is utterly honest, (2) is faithful.

[6] Shakespeare was thirty-five or younger when he wrote this sonnet (it first appeared in The Passionate Pilgrim, 1599).

[7] I have two beloveds, one bringing me comfort and the other despair.

[8] (1) Vanity, (2) sexuality.

Suspect I may, yet not directly tell;
But being both from me, both to each[9] friend,
I guess one angel in another's hell.
Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.[1]

146[2]

Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth,
Lord of[3] these rebel powers that thee array,[4]
Why dost thou pine within and suffer dearth,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge?[5] Is this thy body's end?° destiny; purpose
Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store;[6]
Buy terms divine in selling hours of dross;[7]
Within be fed, without be rich no more.
So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

147

My love is as a fever, longing still° continually
For that which longer nurseth[8] the disease,
Feeding on that which doth preserve the ill,° maintain the illness
Th' uncertain sickly appetite[9] to please.
My reason, the physician to my love,
Angry that his prescriptions are not kept,
Hath left me, and I desperate now approve
Desire is death, which physic did except.[1]
Past cure I am, now reason is past care,[2]
And frantic mad with evermore unrest;
My thoughts and my discourse as madmen's are,
At random from the truth, vainly expressed:[3]
For I have sworn thee fair, and thought thee bright,
Who art as black as hell, as dark as night.

152

In loving thee thou know'st I am forsworn,[4]
But thou art twice forsworn to me love swearing:

[9] Each other. "From": away from.

[1] I.e., until she infects him with venereal disease.

[2] Go to Norton Literature Online for a recitation of this poem.

[3] An emendation. The 1609 edition repeats the last three words of line 1. Other suggestions are "Thrall to," "Starved by," "Pressed by," and leaving the repetition but dropping "that thee" in line 2.

[4] The rebellious body that clothes you.

[5] (1) Your expense; (2) the thing you were responsible for (i.e., the body).

[6] Let "that" (i.e., the body) deteriorate to increase ("aggravate") the soul's riches ("thy store").

[7] Rubbish. "Terms": long periods.

[8] (1) Nourishes, (2) takes care of.

[9] (1) Desire for food, (2) lust.

[1] I.e., I learn by experience that desire, which rejected reason's medicine, is death.

[2] I.e., medical care (of me). The line is a version of the proverb "past cure, past care."

[3] Wide of the mark and senselessly uttered.

[4] I.e., am breaking loving vows to another.

In act thy bed-vow° broke, and new faith torn to husband (or lover)
In vowing new hate after new love bearing.[5]
But why of two oaths' breach do I accuse thee
When I break twenty? I am perjured most,
For all my vows are oaths but to misuse° thee, deceive; misrepresent
And all my honest faith in thee is lost.
For I have sworn deep oaths of thy deep kindness,
Oaths of thy love, thy truth, thy constancy,
And to enlighten thee gave eyes to blindness,[6]
Or made them swear against the thing they see.
  For I have sworn thee fair—more perjured eye° (punning on "I")
  To swear against the truth so foul a lie.

Twelfth Night

Women did not perform on the English public stage during Shakespeare's lifetime; all the great women's roles in Elizabethan and Jacobean plays, from Juliet and Lady Macbeth to the duchess of Malfi, were written to be performed by trained adolescent boys. These boy actors were evidently extraordinarily skillful, and the audiences were sufficiently immersed in the conventions both of theater and of social life in general to accept gesture, makeup, and above all dress as a convincing representation of femininity. Twelfth Night, or What You Will, written for Shakespeare's all-male company, plays brilliantly with these conventions. The comedy depends upon an actor's ability to transform himself, through costume, voice, and gesture, into a young noblewoman, Viola, who transforms herself, through costume, voice, and gesture, into a young man, Cesario. The play's delicious complications follow from the emotional tangles that these transformations engender, unsettling fixed categories of sexual identity and social class and allowing characters to explore emotional territory that a culture officially hostile to same-sex desire and cross-class marriage would ordinarily have ruled out of bounds. In Twelfth Night conventional expectations repeatedly give way to a different mode of perceiving the world.

Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night around 1601. He had already written such comedies as A Midsummer Night's Dream, Much Ado About Nothing, and As You Like It, with their playful, subtly ironic investigations of the ways in which heterosexual couples are produced out of the murkier crosscurrents of male and female friendships; as interesting, perhaps, he had probably just recently completed Hamlet, with its unprecedented exploration of mourning, betrayal, antic humor, and tragic isolation. Twelfth Night would prove to be, in the view of many critics, both the most nearly perfect and in some sense the last of the great festive comedies. Shakespeare returned to comedy later in his career but always with more insistent overtones of bitterness, loss, and grief. There are dark notes in Twelfth Night as well—the countess Olivia is in mourning for her brother, Viola thinks that her brother too is dead, Antonio believes that he has been betrayed by the man he loves, Duke Orsino threatens to kills Cesario—but these notes are swept up in a giddy, carnivalesque dance of illusion, disguise, folly, and clowning.

The complex tonal shifts of Shakespeare's comedy are conveyed in part by the pervasive music and in part by the constant oscillation between blank verse and prose. Generally, the characters in the main, romantic plot speak in the more elevated, aristocratic, and dignified register of verse, while the comic subplot proceeds in prose. Yet these formal distinctions between serious and comic, high and low, are frequently undermined, as when the wronged Malvolio in his final speech addresses Olivia in dignified verse or when the mercurial Viola shifts with the greatest ease between verse and prose.

[5] The object of the "new faith" followed by "new hate" could be either the speaker's young friend or the speaker himself.

[6] And to make you fair (or give you insight), I looked blindly on your failings (or pretended to see what I couldn't).

The play's subtitle, What You Will, underscores the celebratory spirit associated with Twelfth Night, the Feast of the Epiphany (January 6), that in Elizabethan England marked the culminating night of the traditional Christmas revels. In the time-honored festivities associated with the midwinter season, a rigidly hierarchical social order that ordinarily demanded deference, sobriety, and strict obedience to authority temporarily gave way to raucous rituals of inversion: young boys were crowned for a day as bishops and carried through the streets in mock religious processions, abstemiousness was toppled by bouts of heavy drinking and feasting, and the spirit of parody, folly, and misrule reigned briefly in places normally reserved for stern-faced moralists and sober judges. The fact that these festivities were associated with Christian holidays—the Epiphany marked the visit of the Three Kings to Bethlehem to worship the Christ child—did not altogether obscure the continuities with pagan winter rituals such as the Roman Saturnalia, with its comparably explosive release from everyday discipline into a disorderly realm of belly laughter and belly cheer. Puritans emphasized these continuities in launching a fierce attack on the Elizabethan festive calendar and its whole ethos, just as they attacked the theater for what they saw as its links with paganism, idleness, and sexual license. Elizabethan and Jacobean authorities in the church and the state had their own concerns about idleness and subversion, but they generally protected and patronized both festive ritual and theater on the ground that these provided a valuable release from tensions that might otherwise prove dangerous. Sobriety, piety, and discipline were no doubt admirable virtues, but most human beings were not saints. "Dost thou think because thou art virtuous," the drunken Sir Toby asks the censorious steward Malvolio, "there shall be no more cakes and ale?" (2.3.107—08).

Fittingly, the earliest firm record of a performance of Twelfth Night, as noted in the diary of John Manningham, was "at our feast" in the Middle Temple (one of London's law schools) in February 1602. Manningham noted cannily the comedy's resemblance to Shakespeare's earlier play on twins, The Comedy of Errors, as well as to the Boman playwright Plautus's Menaechmi and to an early-sixteenth-century Italian comedy, Gl'Ingannati (The Deceived). Shakespeare also drew upon an English story, Barnabe Riche's tale of Apollonitis and Silla in Riche His Farewell to the Military Profession (1581), which was in turn based on French and Italian sources. There is, however, little precedent, in Riche or in any of the known sources, for the aspect of Twelfth Night that Manningham found particularly memorable and that has continued to delight audiences: the gulling of Malvolio.

Malvolio (in Italian, "ill will") is explicitly linked to those among Shakespeare's contemporaries most hostile to the theater and to such holidays as Twelfth Night: "Sometimes," says the Lady Olivia's gentlewoman Maria, "he is a kind of puritan" (2.3.131). Shakespeare does not hide the cruelty of the treatment to which Malvolio is subjected—"He hath been most notoriously abused" (5.1.375), says Olivia—nor does he shrink from showing the audience other disagreeable qualities in Olivia's kinsman Sir Toby Belch and his companions. But while the close of the comedy seems to embrace these failings in a tolerant, amused aristocratic recognition of human folly, it can find no place for Malvolio's blend of puritanism and social-climbing.

Malvolio is scapegoated for indulging in a fantasy that colors several of the key relationships in Twelfth Night: the fantasy of winning the favor, and ultimately the hand, of the noble and wealthy aristocrats who reign over the social world of the play. The beautiful heiress Olivia, mistress of a great house, is a glittering prize that lures not only Malvolio but also the foolish Sir Andrew and the elegant, imperious Duke Orsino. In falling in love with the duke's graceful messenger (and, as she thinks she has done, in marrying him), Olivia seems to have made precisely the kind of match that had fueled Malvolio's social-climbing imagination. As it turns out, the match is not between unequals: "Be not amazed," the duke tells her when she realizes that she has married someone she scarcely knows. "Right noble is his blood" (5.1.263). The social order then has not been overturned: as in a carnival, when the disguises are removed, the revelers resume their "proper," socially and sexually approved positions.

Yet there is something irreducibly odd about the marriages with which Twelfth Night ends. Sir Toby has married the lady's maid Maria as a reward for devising the plot against Malvolio. Olivia has entered into a "contract of eternal bond of love" (5.1.153) with someone whose actual identity is only revealed to her after the marriage is sealed. The strangeness of the bond between virtual strangers is matched by the strangeness of Orsino's instantaneous decision to marry Cesario—as soon as "he" can become Viola by changing into women's clothes. Shakespeare conspicuously chooses not to stage this return to conventionality.

Part of the quirky delight of the play's conclusion depends upon the resilient hopefulness of its central character, Viola, a hopefulness that is linked to her improvisatory boldness, eloquent tongue, and keen wit. These qualities link her to the fool Feste, who does not have a major part in the comedy's plot, but who occupies a place at its imaginative center. Viola seems to acknowledge this place in paying handsome tribute to Feste's intelligence: "This fellow is wise enough to play the fool, / And to do that well craves a kind of wit" (3.1.59—60). His wit often takes the form of a perverse literalism that slyly calls attention to the play's repeated confounding of such simple binaries as male and female, outside and inside, role and reality. Feste is irresponsible, vulnerable, and dependent, but he also understands, as he teasingly shows Olivia, that it is foolish to bewail forever a loss that cannot be recovered. And he understands that it is important to take such pleasures as life offers and not to wait: "In delay there lies no plenty," he sings, "Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty. / Youth's a stuff will not endure" (2.3.48—50). There is in this wonderful song, as in all of his jests, a current of sadness. Feste knows, as the refrain of the last of his songs puts it, that "the rain it raineth every day" (5.1.388). His counsel is for "present mirth" and "present laughter" (2.3.46). This is, of course, the advice of a fool. But do the Malvolios of the world have anything wiser to suggest?

Enter SIR TOBY [Belch] and MARIA

SIR TOBY What a plague means my niece to take the death of her brother thus? I am sure care's an enemy to life.

MARIA By my troth, Sir Toby, you must come in earlier o' nights. Your cousin,[1] my lady, takes great exceptions to your ill hours.

SIR TOBY Why, let her except, before excepted.[2]

MARIA Ay, but you must confine yourself within the modest° limits of order. moderate

SIR TOBY Confine? I'll confine myself no finer[3] than I am. These clothes are good enough to drink in, and so be these boots too; an° they be not, let them hang themselves in their own straps.

[7] Outward appearance; conduct.
[8] Appearance (suggesting moral qualities).
[9] That perhaps may be fitting to my purpose. "Form": shape.
[1] Castrati (hence, "eunuchs") were prized as male sopranos; the disguise would have explained Viola's feminine voice. Viola (or perhaps Shakespeare) seems to have changed plans: she presents herself instead as a young page.
[2] In Turkish harems, eunuchs served as guards and were assisted by "mutes" (usually servants whose tongues had been cut out).

1.3 Location: The Countess Olma's house.
[1] Term used generally of kinsfolk. "Troth": faith.
[2] Playing on the legal jargon exceptis excipiendis, "with the previous stated exceptions." Sir Toby refuses to take Olivia's displeasure seriously.
[3] Suggesting both "a refined manner of dress" and "narrowly" (referring to his girth).

MARIA That quaffing and drinking will undo you. I heard my lady talk of it yesterday, and of a foolish knight that you brought in one night here to be her wooer.

SIR TOBY Who, Sir Andrew Aguecheek?

MARIA Ay, he.

SIR TOBY He's as tall a man as any's[4] in Illyria.

MARIA What's that to th' purpose?

SIR TOBY Why, he has three thousand ducats a year.

MARIA Ay, but he'll have but a year in all these ducats.[5] He's a very° fool, and a prodigal.

an absolute

SIR TOBY Fie that you'll say so! He plays o'th' viol-de-gamboys,[6] and speaks three or four languages word for word without book,° and hath all the good gifts of nature.

MARIA He hath indeed, almost natural,[7] for besides that he's a fool, he's a great quarreller, and but that he hath the gift° of a coward to allay the gust° he hath in quarrelling,'tis thought among the prudent he would quickly have the gift of a grave.

talent; present / gusto

SIR TOBY By this hand, they are scoundrels and substractors[8] that say so of him. Who are they?

MARIA They that add, moreover, he's drunk nightly in your company.

SIR TOBY With drinking healths to my niece. I'll drink to her as long as there is a passage in my throat and drink in Illyria. He's a coward and a coistreP that will not drink to my niece till his brains turn o'th' toe, like a parish top. What wench, Castiliano, vulgo,[9] for here comes Sir Andrew Agueface.

Enter SIR ANDREW [Aguecheek]

SIR ANDREW Sir Toby Belch! How now, Sir Toby Belch?

SIR TOBY Sweet Sir Andrew.

SIR ANDREW [to MARIA] Bless you, fair shrew.[1]

MARIA And you too, sir.

SIR TOBY Accost, Sir Andrew, accost.[2]

SIR ANDREW What's that?

SIR TOBY My niece's chambermaid.[3]

SIR ANDREW Good Mistress Accost, I desire better acquaintance.

MARIA My name is Mary, sir.

SIR ANDREW Good Mistress Mary Accost.

[4] Anv (man who) is. "Tall": brave; worthy. (Maria takes it in the modern sense of height.)

[5] I.e., he'll spend his fortune in a year.

[6] A facetious corruption of "viola da gamba," a bass viol held between the knees.

[7] Idiots and fools were called "naturals."

[8] Corruption of "detractors." (In reply, Maria puns on "substract" as "subtract.")

[9] Variously interpreted, but may mean "Speak of the devil," since Castilians were considered devilish, and vulgo refers to the common tongue. "Parish top": parishes kept large tops that were spun by whipping them, for the parishioners' amusement and exercise.

[1] Andrew possibly confuses "shrew" (ill-tempered woman) with "mouse," an endearment.

[2] Address (her); originally a naval term meaning "go alongside; greet."

[3] Lady-in-waiting; not a menial servant, but a gentlewoman in attendance on a great lady.

SIR TOBY You mistake, knight. "Accost" is front° her, board her, woo her, assail[4] her. confront

SIR ANDREW By my troth, I would not undertake[5] her in this company.° Is that the meaning of "accost"? i.e., the audience

MARIA Fare you well, gentlemen.

SIR TOBY An thou let part so,[6] Sir Andrew, would thou mightst never draw sword again.

SIR ANDREW An you part so, mistress, I would I might never draw sword again. Fair lady, do you think you have fools in hand?° to deal with

MARIA Sir, I have not you by th' hand.

SIR ANDREW Marry, but you shall have, and here's my hand.

MARIA [taking his hand] Now sir, thought is free.[7] I pray you, bring your hand to th' buttery-bar,[8] and let it drink.

SIR ANDREW Wherefore, sweetheart? What's your metaphor?

MARIA It's dry,[9] sir.

SIR ANDREW Why, I think so. I am not such an ass but I can keep my hand dry.[1] But what's your jest?

MARIA A dry jest,[2] sir.

SIR ANDREW Are you full of them?

MARIA Ay, sir, I have them at my fingers' ends.[3] Marry, now I let go your hand I am barren.° Exit empty of jokes

SIR TOBY O knight, thou lackest a cup of canary.[4] When did I see thee so put down?[5]

SIR ANDREW Never in your life, I think, unless you see canary put me down. Methinks sometimes I have no more wit than a Christian° or an ordinary man has; but I am a great eater of beef,[6] and I believe that does harm to my wit. an average man

SIR TOBY No question.

SIR ANDREW An I thought that, I'd forswear it. I'll ride home tomorrow, Sir Toby.

SIR TOBY Pourquoi,° my dear knight? why

SIR ANDREW What is "Pourquoi"? Do, or not do? I would I had bestowed that time in the tongues[7] that I have in fencing, dancing, and bear-baiting. O, had I but followed the arts!

SIR TOBY Then hadst thou° had an excellent head of hair. you would have

---

[4] Greet (also nautical). "Board": speak to; tackle.

[5] Take her on (with sexual implication).

[6] If you let her go without protest or without bidding her farewell.

[7] The customary retort to "Do you think I am a fool?" "Marry": indeed (originally, the name of the Virgin Mary used as an oath).

[8] Ledge on the half-door to a buttery or a wine cellar, on which drinks were served.

[9] Thirsty; but a dry hand was also thought to be a sign of impotence.

[1] Alluding to the proverb "Even fools have enough wit to come in out of the rain."

[2] A stupid joke (referring to Andrew's stupidity); an ironic quip; a joke about dryness.

[3] Always ready; or "by th'band" (line 62).

[4] A sweet wine, like sherry, originally from the Canary Islands.

[5] Defeated in repartee; "put down" with drink.

[6] Contemporary medicine held that beef dulled the intellect.

[7] Foreign languages; Toby takes him to mean "curling tongs."

SIR ANDREW Why, would that have mended[0] my hair?

SIR TOBY Past question, for thou seest it will not curl by nature.[8]

SIR ANDREW But it becomes me well enough, does't not?

SIR TOBY Excellent, it hangs like flax on a distaff,[9] and I hope to see a housewife[1] take thee between her legs and spin it off.[2]

SIR ANDREW Faith, I'll home tomorrow, Sir Toby. Your niece will not be seen, or if she be, it's four to one she'll none of me. The Count himself here hard by woos her.

SIR TOBY She'll none o'th' Count. She'll not match above her degree,[0] neither in estate,[3] years, nor wit, I have heard her swear't. Tut, there's life in't,[4] man.

SIR ANDREW I'll stay a month longer. I am a fellow o'th' strangest mind o'th' world. I delight in masques and revels sometimes altogether.

SIR TOBY Art thou good at these kickshawses,[5] knight?

SIR ANDREW As any man in Illyria, whatsoever he be, under the degree of my betters; and yet I will not compare with an old man.[6]

SIR TOBY What is thy excellence in a galliard,[7] knight?

SIR ANDREW Faith, I can cut a caper.[8]

SIR TOBY And I can cut the mutton to't.

SIR ANDREW And I think I have the back-trick[9] simply as strong as any man in Illyria.

SIR TOBY Wherefore are these things hid? Wherefore have these gifts a curtain[1] before 'em? Are they like to take dust, like Mistress Mall's[2] picture? Why dost thou not go to church in a galliard, and come home in a coranto?[3] My very walk should be a jig. I would not so much as make water but in a cinquepace.[4] What dost thou mean? Is it a world to hide virtues in? I did think by the excellent constitution of thy leg it was formed under the star of a galliard.[5]

SIR ANDREW Ay,'tis strong, and it does indifferent[0] well in a divers-colored stock.[0] Shall we set about some revels?

SIR TOBY What shall we do else—were we not born under Taurus?[6]

SIR ANDREW Taurus? That's sides and heart.

SIR TOBY No, sir, it is legs and thighs: let me see thee caper.

---

[8] To contrast with Andrew's "arts" (line 90).
[9] In spinning, flax would hang in long, thin, yellowish strings on the "distaff," a pole held between the knees.
[1] Housewives spun flax; the pronunciation, "hus-wife," also suggests the meaning "prostitute."
[2] Make him bald (as a result of venereal disease).
[3] Status; possessions.
[4] Proverbial: "While there's life, there's hope."
[5] Trifles; trivialities (from the French quelque chose).
[6] Expert (perhaps a backhanded compliment).
[7] A lively, complex dance, including the caper.
[8] Leap. (Toby puns on the pickled flower buds used in a sauce of mutton.)
[9] Probably a dance movement, a kick of the foot behind the body (also suggesting sexual prowess, with later reference to "mutton" as "prostitute").
[1] Used to protect paintings from dust.
[2] Like "Moll[y]," "Mall" was a nickname for "Mary."
[3] An even more rapid dance than the galliard.
[4] Galliard, or, more properly, the steps joining the figures of the dance; punning on "sink," as in "sewer."
[5] Astrological influences favorable to dancing.
[6] The astrological sign of the bull was usually thought to govern the neck and throat (appropriate to heavy drinkers).

Ha, higher! Ha ha, excellent. Exeunt

Enter VALENTINE, and VIOLA [as Cesario] in man's attire

VALENTINE If the Duke continue these favors towards you, Cesario, you are like to be much advanced. He hath known you but three days, and already you are no stranger.

VIOLA You either fear his humor° or my negligence, that you call in question the continuance of his love. Is he inconstant, sir, in his favors? moodiness

VALENTINE No, believe me.

Enter DUKE, CURIO, and attendants

VIOLA I thank you. Here comes the Count.
ORSINO Who saw Cesario, ho?
VIOLA On your attendance,° my lord, here. waiting at your service
ORSINO [to CURIO and attendants] Stand you a while aloof.° [To VIOLA] Cesario, aside
Thou know'st no less but all.° I have unclasped than everything
To thee the book even of my secret soul.
Therefore, good youth, address thy gait° unto her, go
Be not denied access, stand at her doors,
And tell them there thy fixed foot shall grow° take root
Till thou have audience.
VIOLA Sure, my noble lord,
If she be so abandoned to her sorrow
As it is spoke, she never will admit me.
ORSINO Be clamorous, and leap all civil bounds,[1]
Rather than make unprofited° return. unsuccessful
VIOLA Say I do speak with her, my lord, what then?
ORSINO O then unfold the passion of my love,
Surprise[2] her with discourse of my dear° faith. heartfelt
It shall become thee well to act my woes—
She will attend it better in thy youth
Than in a nuncio's° of more grave aspect.° messenger's / appearance
VIOLA I think not so, my lord.
ORSINO Dear lad, believe it;
For they shall yet° belie thy happy years thus far
That say thou art a man. Diana's lip
Is not more smooth and rubious;° thy small pipe° ruby red!voice
Is as the maiden's organ, shrill and sound,[3]
And all is semblative° a woman's part. like
I know thy constellation[4] is right apt
For this affair. [To CURIO and attendants] Some four or five attend him.
All if you will, for I myself am best

1.4 Location: Orsino's palace.
[1] All constraints of polite behavior.
[2] Capture by unexpected attack.
[3] High-pitched and uncracked.
[4] Nature and abilities (as supposedly determined by the stars).

When least in company. [To VIOLA*]* Prosper well in this
And thou shalt live as freely as thy lord,
To call his fortunes thine.

VIOLA I'll do my best
To woo your lady—[aside] yet a barful strife[5]—
Whoe'er I woo, myself would be his wife. Exeunt

1.5

Enter MARIA, and [FESTE,[1] the] clown

MARIA Nay, either tell me where thou hast been or I will not open my lips so wide as a bristle may enter in° way by of thy excuse. My lady will hang thee for thy absence.

FESTE Let her hang me. He that is well hanged in this world needs to fear no colors.[2]

MARIA Make that good.° explain that

FESTE He shall see none to fear.

MARIA A good lenten[3] answer. I can tell thee where that saying was born, of "I fear no colors."

FESTE Where, good Mistress Mary?

MARIA In the wars,[4] and that may you be bold to say in your foolery.

FESTE Well, God give them wisdom that have it; and those that are fools, let them use their talents.[5]

MARIA Yet you will be hanged for being so long absent, or to be turned away[6]—is not that as good as a hanging to you?

FESTE Many a good hanging prevents a bad marriage;[7] and for turning away, let summer bear it out.° make it endurable

MARIA You are resolute then?

FESTE Not so neither, but I am resolved on two points.° matters; laces

MARIA That if one break, the other will hold; or if both break, your gaskins° fall. wide breeches

FESTE Apt, in good faith, very apt. Well, go thy way. If Sir Toby would leave drinking thou wert as witty a piece of Eve's flesh[8] as any in Illyria.

MARIA Peace, you rogue, no more o' that. Here comes my lady. Make your excuse wisely, you were best.° [Exit] you had better

Enter Lady OLIVIA, with MALVOLIO [and attendants]

FESTE [aside] Wit,[9] an't° be thy will, put me into good fooling! if it Those wits that think they have thee do very oft prove fools, and I that am sure I lack thee may pass for a wise man. For what says Quinapalus?[1]—"Better a witty fool than a foolish wit." [To OLIVIA*]* God bless thee, lady.

5. An undertaking full of impediments.
1.5 Location: Olivia's house.
1. The name is used only once, at 2.4.1 1.
2. Proverbial for "fear nothing." "Colors": worldly deceptions, with puns on "collars" as "hangman's nooses" and "cholers" as "anger."
3. Thin or meager (like Lenten fare).
4. "Colors" in line 9 refers to military flags.
5. Alluding to the parable of the talents, Matthew 25. The comic implication is that a fool should strive to increase his measure of folly. Since "fool" and "fowl" had similar pronunciations, there may also be a play on "talents/talons."
6. Dismissed; also, perhaps, turned off or hanged.
7. Proverbial. "Hanging": execution; sexual prowess.
8. Woman. Feste may imply both that Maria and Toby would make a good match and that Maria is as witty as Toby is sober.
9. Intelligence, which is often contrasted with will.
1. Feste frequently invents his own authorities.

OLIVIA [to attendants] Take the fool away.

FESTE Do you not hear, fellows? Take away the lady.

OLIVIA Go to, you're a dry[2] fool. I'll no more of you.
Besides, you grow dishonest.° unreliable

FESTE Two faults, madonna,° that drink and good counsel my lady will amend, for give the dry fool drink, then is the fool not dry; bid the dishonest man mend° himself: if he reform mend, he is no longer dishonest; if he cannot, let the botcher° mend him. Anything that's mended is but tailor; cobbler patched. Virtue that transgresses is but patched with sin, and sin that amends is but patched with virtue. If that this simple syllogism will serve, so. If it will not, what remedy? As there is no true cuckold but calamity, so beauty's a flower.[3] The lady bade take away the fool, therefore I say again, take her away.

OLIVIA Sir, I bade them take away you.

FESTE Misprision[4] in the highest degree! Lady, "Cucullus non facit monachum"[5]—that's as much to say as I wear not motley[6] in my brain. Good madonna, give me leave to prove you a fool.

OLIVIA Can you do it?

FESTE Dexteriously,° good madonna. dexterously

OLIVIA Make your proof.

FESTE I must catechize[7] you for it, madonna. Good my mouse of virtue,° answer me. my good, virtuous mouse

OLIVIA Well, sir, for want of other idleness° I'll bide° your pastime / await proof.

FESTE Good madonna, why mournest thou?

OLIVIA Good fool, for my brother's death.

FESTE I think his soul is in hell, madonna.

OLIVIA I know his soul is in heaven, fool.

FESTE The more fool, madonna, to mourn for your brother's soul, being in heaven. Take away the fool, gentlemen.

OLIVIA What think you of this fool, Malvolio? Doth he not mend?[8]

MALVOLIO Yes, and shall do till the pangs of death shake him. Infirmity,° that decays the wise, doth ever make the (old) age better fool.[9]

FESTE God send you, sir, a speedy infirmity for the better increasing your folly. Sir Toby will be sworn that I am no fox, but he will not pass his word for twopence that you are no fool.

OLIVIA How say you to that, Malvolio?

MALVOLIO I marvel your ladyship takes delight in such a ordinary fool that has no more brain than a stone. Look you now, he's out of his guard° already. Unless you laugh defenseless and minister occasion[1] to him, he is gagged. I protest I take these wise men that crow so at these set° kind of artificial fools no better than the fools' zanies.° "straight men"

OLIVIA O, you are sick of° self-love, Malvolio, and taste with with a distempered[2] appetite. To be generous, guiltless, and of free° disposition is to take those things for bird- magnanimous bolts[3] that you deem cannon bullets. There is no slander in an allowed fool, though he do nothing but rail; nor no railing in a known discreet man, though he do nothing but reprove.

FESTE Now Mercury indue thee with leasing,[4] for thou speakest well of fools.

Enter MARIA

MARIA Madam, there is at the gate a young gentleman much desires to speak with you.

OLIVIA From the Count Orsino, is it?

MARIA I know not, madam. 'Tis a fair young man, and well attended.

OLIVIA Who of my people hold him in delay?

MARIA Sir Toby, madam, your kinsman.

OLIVIA Fetch him off, I pray you, he speaks nothing but madman.° Fie on him. Go you, Malvolio. If it be a suit madman's talk from the Count, I am sick, or not at home—what you will to dismiss it. Exit MALVOLIO
Now you see, sir, how your fooling grows old,° and people stale dislike it.

FESTE Thou hast spoke for us, madonna, as if thy eldest son should be a fool, whose skull Jove cram with brains, for—here he comes—

Enter SIR TOBY

one of thy kin has a most weak pia mater.[5]

OLIVIA By mine honor, half-drunk. What is he at the gate, cousin?° kinsman

SIR TOBY A gentleman.

OLIVIA A gentleman? What gentleman?

SIR TOBY 'Tis a gentleman here. [He belches] A plague o'
these pickle herring! [To FESTE] HOW now, sot?° fool; drunkard

FESTE Good Sir Toby.

OLIVIA Cousin, cousin, how have you come so early by this lethargy?

SIR TOBY Lechery? I defy lechery. There's one° at the gate.

OLIVIA Ay, marry, what is he?

SIR TOBY Let him be the devil an° he will, I care not. Give if me faith,[6] say I. Well, it's all one.° Exit it doesn't matter

[5] Brain; or literally, the membrane enclosing it.
[6] To defy the devil by faith alone.

OLIVIA What's a drunken man like, fool?

FESTE Like a drowned man, a fool, and a madman—one draught above heat[7] makes him a fool, the second mads him, and a third drowns him.

OLIVIA Go thou and seek the coroner, and let him sit o'° my coz,° for he's in the third degree of drink, he's drowned. Go look after him.

FESTE He is but mad yet, madonna, and the fool shall look to the madman. [Exit]

Enter MALVOLIO

MALVOLIO Madam, yon young fellow swears he will speak with you. I told him you were sick—he takes on him to understand so much, and therefore° comes to speak with you. I told him you were asleep—he seems to have a foreknowledge of that too, and therefore comes to speak with you. What is to be said to him, lady? He's fortified against any denial.

for that very reason

OLIVIA Tell him he shall not speak with me.

MALVOLIO He's been told so, and he says he'll stand at your door like a sheriff's post,[8] and be the supporter to a bench, but he'll speak with you.

OLIVIA What kind o' man is he?

MALVOLIO Why, of mankind.°

like any other

OLIVIA What manner of man?

MALVOLIO Of very ill manner: he'll speak with you, will you or no.

OLIVIA Of what personage° and years is he?

appearance

MALVOLIO Not yet old enough for a man, nor young enough for a boy; as a squash[9] is before 'tis a peascod, or a codling° when 'tis almost an apple. 'Tis with him in standing water° between boy and man. He is very well-favored,° and he speaks very shrewishly.° One would think his mother's milk were scarce out of him.

OLIVIA Give me my veil. Come, throw it o'er my face.
We'll once more hear Orsino's embassy.

Enter VIOLA [as Cesario]

VIOLA The honorable lady of the house, which is she?

OLIVIA Speak to me, I shall answer for her. Your will.

VIOLA Most radiant, exquisite, and unmatchable beauty.—I pray you, tell me if this be the lady of the house, for I never saw her. I would be loath to cast away° my speech, for besides that it is excellently well penned, I have taken great pains to con° it. Good beauties, let me sustain° no scorn; I am very 'countable,° even to the least sinister usage.[1]

OLIVIA Whence came you, sir?

VIOLA I can say little more than I have studied,[2] and that question's out of my part. Good gentle one, give me modest° assurance if you be the lady of the house, that I may proceed in my speech.

OLIVIA Are you a comedian?°

an actor

VIOLA No, my profound heart;[3] and yet—by the very fangs of malice I swear—I am not that° I play. Are you the lady of the house?

what

OLIVIA If I do not usurp[4] myself, I am.

VIOLA Most certain if you are she you do usurp yourself, for what is yours to bestow is not yours to reserve. But this is from my commission.° I will on with my speech in your praise, and then show you the heart of my message.

OLIVIA Come to what is important in't, I forgive you° the praise.

VIOLA Alas, I took great pains to study it, and 'tis poetical.

OLIVIA It is the more like to be feigned, I pray you keep it in. I heard you were saucy° at my gates, and allowed your approach rather to wonder at you than to hear you. If you be not mad, be gone. If you have reason,° be brief. Tis not that time of moon with me to make one in so skipping a dialogue.[5]

Enter ANTONIO and SEBASTIAN

ANTONIO Will you stay no longer, nor will° you not that I wish go with you?

SEBASTIAN By your patience, no. My stars shine darkly[1] over me. The malignancy of my fate[2] might perhaps distemper° yours, therefore I shall crave of you your leave infect that I may bear my evils alone. It were a bad recompense for your love to lay any of them on you.

ANTONIO Let me yet know of you whither you are bound.

SEBASTIAN No, sooth,° sir. My determinate° voyage is truly / destined mere extravagancy.° But I perceive in you so excellent a idle wandering touch of modesty° that you will not extort from me what politeness
I am willing to keep in. Therefore it charges me in manners[3] the rather to express° myself. You must know of me reveal then, Antonio, my name is Sebastian, which I called Roderigo. My father was that Sebastian of Messaline[4] whom I know you have heard of. He left behind him myself and a sister, both born in an° hour. If the heavens had been within the same pleased, would we had so ended. But you, sir, altered that, for some hour before you took me from the breach° surf
of the sea was my sister drowned.

ANTONIO Alas the day!

SEBASTIAN A lady, sir, though it was said she much resembled me, was yet of many accounted beautiful. But though I could not with such estimable° wonder over-far appreciative believe that, yet thus far I will boldly publish° her: she proclaim bore a mind that envy° could not but call fair. She is malice drowned already, sir, with salt water, though I seem to drown her remembrance again with more.

ANTONIO Pardon me, sir, your bad entertainment.[5]

SEBASTIAN O good Antonio, forgive me your trouble.

ANTONIO If you will not murder me[6] for my love, let me be your servant.

SEBASTIAN If you will not undo what you have done—that is, kill him whom you have recovered°—desire it not. Fare rescued ye well at once. My bosom is full of kindness,° and I am tender emotion yet° so near the manners of my mother[7] that upon the still least occasion more mine eyes will tell tales of me.° I am betray my feelings bound to the Count Orsino's court. Farewell. Exit

Enter VIOLA as Cesario, and MALVOLIO, at several° doors separate

MALVOLIO Were not you ev'n° now with the Countess just Olivia?
VIOLA Even now, sir, on° a moderate pace, I have since arrived but hither.° come only this far
MALVOLIO [offering a ring] She returns this ring to you, sir. You might have saved me my pains to have taken° it by taking away yourself. She adds, moreover, that you should put your lord into a desperate assurance° she will none of hopeless certainty come again in his affairs, unless it be to report your lord's taking of this.[1] Receive it so.

VIOLA She took the ring of me.[2] I'll none of it.
MALVOLIO Come, sir, you peevishly threw it to her, and her will is it should be so returned.
[He throws the ring down]
If it be worth stooping for, there it lies, in your eye;° if not, sight
be it his that finds it. Exit
VIOLA [picking up the ring] I left no ring with her. What means this lady?

She made good view of° me, indeed so much looked carefidly at
That straight methought her eyes had lost° her tongue, made her lose
For she did speak in starts, distractedly.
She loves me, sure. The cunning of her passion Invites me in° this churlish messenger. by means of None of my lord's ring! Why, he sent her none.
I am the man.[3] If it be so—as 'tis—
Poor lady, she were better love a dream!

Wherein the pregnant enemy[4] does much.
How easy is it for the proper false[5]
In women's waxen hearts to set their forms![6]
Alas, our frailty is the cause, not we,
For such as we are made of, such we be.[7]
How will this fadge?° My master loves her dearly, turn out
And I, poor monster,[8] fond° as much on him, dote
And she, mistaken, seems to dote on me.

2.2 Location: Between Olivia's house and Orsino's palace.
[1] Reception of this (rejection).
[2] Viola pretends to believe Olivia's story. "Of": from.
[3] I.e., the man with whom she has fallen in love.
[4] The devil. "Pregnant": teeming with ideas.
[5] Handsome, but deceitful (men).
[6] To impress their images on women's affections (as a seal stamps its image in wax).
[7] For being made of frail flesh, we are frail.
[8] Since she is both man and woman.

What will become of this? As I am man,
My state is desperate° for my master's love. hopeless
As I am woman, now, alas the day,
What thriftless° sighs shall poor Olivia breathe! unprofitable
O time, thou must untangle this, not I.
It is too hard a knot for me t'untie. [Exit]

Enter SIR TOBY and SIR ANDREW

SIR TOBY Approach, Sir Andrew. Not to be abed after midnight is to be up betimes,° and diliculo surgere,[1] thou knowest. early

SIR ANDREW Nay, by my troth,° I know not; but I know to be up late is to be up late. faith

SIR TOBY A false conclusion. I hate it as an unfilled can.° To be up after midnight and to go to bed then is early; so that to go to bed after midnight is to go to bed betimes. Does not our lives consist of the four elements?[2] tankard

SIR ANDREW Faith, so they say, but I think it rather consists of eating and drinking.

SIR TOBY Thou'rt a scholar; let us therefore eat and drink. Marian, I say, a stoup° of wine. two-pint tankard

Enter [FESTE, the] clown

SIR ANDREW Here comes the fool, i'faith.

FESTE How now, my hearts. Did you never see the picture of "we three"?[3]

SIR TOBY Welcome, ass. Now let's have a catch.[4]

SIR ANDREW By my troth, the fool has an excellent breast.° I had rather than forty shillings I had such a leg,° and so sweet a breath to sing, as the fool has. In sooth, thou wast in very gracious fooling last night, when thou spokest of Pigrogromitus, of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Queubus.[5] 'Twas very good, i'faith. I sent thee sixpence for thy leman.° Hadst it? singing voice (for dancing) sweethean

FESTE I did impeticos thy gratility;[6] for Malvolio's nose is no whipstock. My lady has a white hand, and the Myrmidons are no bottle-ale houses.[7]

SIR ANDREW Excellent! Why, this is the best fooling, when all is done. Now a song.

SIR TOBY [to FESTE] Come on, there is sixpence for you. Let's have a song.

SIR ANDREW [to FESTE] There's a testril[8] of me, too. If one knight give a—[9]

FESTE Would you have a love-song, or a song of good life?

2.3 Location: Olivia's house.

[1] Part of a Latin proverb, meaning "to rise at dawn (is most healthy)."

[2] The four elements, thought to make up all matter, were earth, air, fire, and water.

[3] A trick picture portraying two fools' or asses' heads, the third being the viewer.

[4] Round: a simple song for several voices.

[5] "Pigrogromitus . . . Queubus": Feste's mock learning. "Equinoctial": equator of the astronomical heavens.

[6] Comic jargon for "impocket (or impetticoat) your gratuity."

[7] Perhaps it is the sheer inscrutability of Feste's foolery that so impresses Sir Andrew (line 28). "Whipstock": handle of a whip. "Bottle-ale houses": cheap taverns.

[8] Sir Andrew's version of "tester" (sixpence).

[9] In the First Folio, "give a" appears at the end of a justified line; an omission is possible.

SIR TOBY A love-song, a love-song.

SIR ANDREW Ay, ay. I care not for good life.

FESTE [sings)

O mistress mine, where are you roaming?
O stay and hear, your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low.
Trip° no further, pretty sweeting. go
Journeys end in lovers meeting,
Every wise man's son doth know.[1]

SIR ANDREW Excellent good, i'faith.

SIR TOBY Good, good.

FESTE What is love? 'Tis not hereafter,
Present mirth hath present laughter.
What's to come is still° unsure. always
In delay there lies no plenty,
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty.° twenty-times sweet
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

SIR ANDREW A mellifluous voice, as I am true knight.

SIR TOBY A contagious breath.[2]

SIR ANDREW Very sweet and contagious, i'faith.

SIR TOBY To hear by the nose, it is dulcet in contagion.[3] But shall we make the welkin° dance indeed? Shall we rouse the night-owl in a catch that will draw three souls out of one weaver?[4] Shall we do that? sky

SIR ANDREW An° you love me, let's do't. I am dog° at a catch. if / clever

FESTE By'r Lady, sir, and some dogs will catch well.

SIR ANDREW Most certain. Let our catch be "Thou knave."

FESTE "Hold thy peace, thou knave,"[5] knight. I shall be constrained in't to call thee knave, knight.

SIR ANDREW 'Tis not the first time I have constrained one to call me knave. Begin, fool. It begins "Hold thy peace."

FESTE I shall never begin if I hold my peace.

AIR ANDREW 'Good, i'faith. Come, begin.

[They sing the] catch.

Enter MARIA

MARIA What a caterwauling do you keep here! If my lady have not called up her steward Malvolio and bid him turn you out of doors, never trust me.

SIR TOBY My lady's a Cathayan,[6] we are politicians,° Malvolio's a Peg-o'-Ramsey,[7] and "Three merry men be we." Am not I consanguineous?[8] Am I not of her blood? Tilly- schemers vally°—"lady"! "There dwelt a man in Babylon, lady, lady."[9]

---

[1] The words of the song are not certainly Shakespeare's; they fit the tune of an instrumental piece printed in Thomas Morley's First Book of Consort Lessons (1 599). "Wise man's son": wise men were thought to have foolish sons.

[2] Catchy voice; with a play on "disease-causing air."

[3] If one could hear through the nose, the sound would be sweetly ("dulcet") infectious.

[4] Weavers were traditionally addicted to psalm singing, so to move them with popular catches would be a great triumph. Music was said to be able to draw the soul from the body.

[5] The words of the catch are "Hold thy peace, I prithee hold thy peace, thou knave." Each singer repeatedly calls the others knaves and tells them to stop singing.

[6] Chinese; but also ethnocentric slang for "trickster" or "cheat."

[7] Name of a dance and popular song; here, used contemptuously.

[8] A blood relative (of Olivia's). "Three . . . we": refrain of a popular song.

fiddlesticks

FESTE Beshrew° me, the knight's in admirable fooling.

SIR ANDREW Ay, he does well enough if he be disposed, and so do I, too. He does it with a better grace, but I do it more natural.[1]

SIR TOBY "O' the twelfth day of December"[2]—

MARIA For the love o' God, peace.

Enter MALVOLIO

MALVOLIO My masters, are you mad? Or what are you? Have you no wit,° manners, nor honesty,° but to gabble like tinkers at this time of night? Do ye make an alehouse of my lady's house, that ye squeak out your coziers'° catches without any mitigation or remorse[3] of voice? Is there no respect of place, persons, nor time in you?

sense / decency

cobblers'

SIR TOBY We did keep time, sir, in our catches. Sneck up!°

go hang yourself

MALVOLIO Sir Toby, I must be round° with you. My lady bade me tell you that though she harbors you as her kinsman she's nothing allied to your disorders. If you can separate yourself and your misdemeanors you are welcome to the house. If not, an it would please you to take leave of her she is very willing to bid you farewell.

plainspoken

SIR TOBY "Farewell, dear heart, since I must needs be gone.'

MARIA Nay, good Sir Toby.

FESTE "His eyes do show his days are almost done."

MALVOLIO Is't even so?

SIR TOBY "But I will never die."

FESTE "Sir Toby, there you lie."

MALVOLIO This is much credit to you.

SIR TOBY "Shall I bid him go?"

FESTE "What an if° you do?"

an if = if

SIR TOBY "Shall I bid him go, and spare not?"

FESTE "O no, no, no, no, you dare not."

SIR TOBY Out o' tune, sir, ye lie. [To MALVOLIO] Art any more than a steward? Dost thou think because thou art virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale?[5]

FESTE Yes, by Saint Anne, and ginger[6] shall be hot i'th' mouth, too.

SIR TOBY Thou'rt i'th' right. [To MALVOLIO] Go, sir, rub your chain with crumbs.[7] [To MARIA] A stoup of wine, Maria.

MALVOLIO Mistress Mary, if you prized my lady's favor at any thing more than contempt you would not give

---

[9] The opening and refrain of a popular song.

[1] Effortlessly; but unconsciously playing on the sense of natural as "fool" or "idiot."

[2] Snatch of a ballad; or possibly a drunken version of "twelfth day of Christmas," that is, Twelfth Night.

[3] Without any abating or softening.

[4] Part of another song that Sir Toby and Feste adapt for the occasion.

[5] Traditionally associated with church festivals and therefore disliked by Puritans.

[6] Used to spice ale. Saint Anne was the mother of the Virgin; the oath would be offensive to Puritans, who attacked her cult.

[7] Clean your steward's chain; mind your own business.

means° for this uncivil rule.° She shall know of it, by this drink / behavior
hand. Exit[8]

MARIA Go shake your ears. (like an ass)

SIR ANDREW 'Twere as good a deed as to drink when a man's a-hungry to challenge him the field° and then to to a duel break promise with him, and make a fool of him.

SIR TOBY Do't, knight. I'll write thee a challenge, or I'll deliver thy indignation to him by word of mouth.

MARIA Sweet Sir Toby, be patient for tonight. Since the youth of the Count's was today with my lady she is much out of quiet. For Monsieur Malvolio, let me alone with him.° If I do not gull him into a nayword[9] and make him leave him to me a common recreation,° do not think I have wit enough to sport, jest lie straight in my bed. I know I can do it.

SIR TOBY Possess° us, possess us, tell us something of him. inform

MARIA Marry, sir, sometimes he is a kind of puritan.[1]

SIR ANDREW O, if I thought that I'd beat him like a dog.

SIR TOBY What, for being a puritan? Thy exquisite° reason, ingenious
dear knight.

SIR ANDREW I have no exquisite reason for't, but I have reason good enough.

MARIA The dev'l a puritan that he is, or anything constantly but a time-pleaser,° an affectioned° ass that cons boot licker / affected state without book and utters it by great swathes;[2] the best persuaded of himself,[3] so crammed, as he thinks, with excellencies, that it is his grounds of faith° that all his creed that look on him love him; and on that vice in him will my revenge find notable cause to work.

SIR TOBY What wilt thou do?

MARIA I will drop in his way some obscure epistles of love, wherein by the color of his beard, the shape of his leg,
the manner of his gait, the expressure° of his eye, fore- expression
head, and complexion, he shall find himself most feelingly personated.° I can write very like my lady your niece; represented on a forgotten matter we can hardly make distinction of our hands.° handwriting

SIR TOBY Excellent, I smell a device.

SIR ANDREW I have't in my nose too.

SIR TOBY He shall think by the letters that thou wilt drop that they come from my niece, and that she's in love with him.

MARIA My purpose is indeed a horse of that color.

SIR ANDREW And your horse now would make him an ass.

MARIA Ass° I doubt not. (punning on "as")

SIR ANDREW O, 'twill be admirable.

MARIA Sport royal, I warrant you. I know my physic° will medicine work with him. I will plant you two—and let the fool make a third—where he shall find the letter. Observe his construction° of it. For this night, to bed, and dream on the event.° Farewell. Exit — interpretation / outcome

---

[8] Teste plays no further part in this scene. This is the suggested exit for him.

[9] If I do not trick ("gull") him into a byword (for "dupe").

[1] Could mean "morally strict and censorious," as well as "a follower of the Puritan religious faith."

[2] Memorizes dignified and high-flown language and utters it in great sweeps (like hay falling under a scythe).

[3] Having the highest opinion of himself.

SIR TOBY Good night, Penthesilea.[4]

SIR ANDREW Before me,[5] she's a good wench.

SIR TOBY She's a beagle true bred, and one that adores me. What o' that?

SIR ANDREW I was adored once, too.

SIR TOBY Let's to bed, knight. Thou hadst need send for more money.

SIR ANDREW If I cannot recover° your niece, I am a foul way out.° — win / out of money

SIR TOBY Send for money, knight. If thou hast her not i'th' end, call me cut.[6]

SIR ANDREW If I do not, never trust me, take it how you will.

SIR TOBY Come, come, I'll go burn some sack,[7] 'tis too late to go to bed now. Come knight, come knight. Exeunt

2.4

Enter Duke, VIOLA [as Cesario], CURIO, and others

ORSINO Give me some music. Now good morrow,° friends. morning
Now good Cesario, but° that piece of song, just
That old and antic° song we heard last night. quaint
Methought it did relieve my passion° much, suffering
More than light airs and recollected° terms studied; artificial
Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times.
Come, but one verse.

CURIO He is not here, so please your lordship, that should sing it.

ORSINO Who was it?

CURIO Feste the jester, my lord, a fool that the lady Olivia's father took much delight in. He is about the house.

ORSINO Seek him out, and play the tune the while.
[Exit CURIO]
Music plays
[To VIOLA] Come hither, boy. If ever thou shalt love,
In the sweet pangs of it remember me;
For such as I am, all true lovers are,
Unstaid° and skittish in all motions° else unstable / emotions
Save° in the constant image of the creature except
That is beloved. How dost thou like this tune?

VIOLA It gives a very echo to the seat
Where love is throned.[1]

ORSINO Thou dost speak masterly.° expertly
My life upon't, young though thou art thine eye

---

[4] Queen of the Amazons (a joke about Maria's small size).
[5] On my soul (a mild oath).
[6] A dock-tailed horse; also, slang for "gelding" or for "female genitals."
[7] I'll go warm and spice some Spanish wine.
2.4 Location: Orsino's palace.
[1] I.e., it reflects back to the heart.

Hath stayed upon some favor° that it loves. face
Hath it not, boy?
VIOLA A little, by your favor.° leave; face
ORSINO What kind of woman is't?
VIOLA Of your complexion.
ORSINO She is not worth thee then. What years, i'faith?
VIOLA About your years, my lord.
ORSINO Too old, by heaven. Let still° the woman take always
An elder than herself. So wears° she to him; adapts
So sways she level[2] in her husband's heart.
For, boy, however we do praise ourselves,
Our fancies° are more giddy and unfirm, affections
More longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn, exhausted
Than women's are.
VIOLA I think° it well, my lord. believe
ORSINO Then let thy love be younger than thyself,
Or thy affection cannot hold the bent;[3]
For women are as roses, whose fair flower
Being once displayed,° doth fall that very hour. opened
VIOLA And so they are. Alas that they are so:
To die even° when they to perfection grow. just

Enter CURIO and [FESTE, the] clown

ORSINO [to FESTE] O fellow, come, the song we had last night.
Mark it, Cesario, it is old and plain.
The spinsters,° and the knitters in the sun, spinners
And the free° maids that weave their thread with bones,[4] carefree
Do use to chant it. It is silly sooth,° simple truth
And dallies with° the innocence of love, lingers lovingly on
Like the old° age. golden
FESTE Are you ready, sir?
ORSINO I prithee, sing.

Music

FESTE [sings] Come away,° come away death, come hither
And in sad cypress[5] let me be laid.
Fie away, fie away breath,
I am slain by a fair cruel maid.
My shroud of white, stuck all with yew,° yew sprigs
O prepare it.
My part of death no one so true
Did share it.[6]

Not a flower, not a flower sweet
On my black coffin let there be strewn.
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be thrown.
A thousand thousand sighs to save,
Lay me O where

---

[2] So does she balance (influence and affection).

[3] Cannot remain at full stretch (like the tautness of a bowstring).

[4] Spools made from bone on which lace (called "bone lace") was woven.

[5] Cypress-wood coffin. Like yews, cypresses were emblematic of mourning.

[6] I.e., no one has died so true to love as I.

Sad true lover never find my grave,
To weep there.
ORSINO [giving money] There's for thy pains.
FESTE No pains, sir. I take pleasure in singing, sir.
ORSINO I'll pay thy pleasure then.
FESTE Truly, sir, and pleasure will be paid,° one time or another. paid for ORSINO Give me now leave° to leave° thee. permission / dismiss
FESTE Now the melancholy god[7] protect thee, and the tailor make thy doublet° of changeable taffeta,[8] for thy mind is a very opal.[9] I would have men of such constancy put to sea, that their business might be everything, and their intent° everywhere, for that's it that always makes a good voyage of nothing.[1] Farewell. Exit close-fitting jacket destination
ORSINO Let all the rest give place:° withdraw
[Exeunt CURIO and others]
Once more, Cesario,
Get thee to yon same sovereign° cruelty. supreme
Tell her my love, more noble than the world,
Prizes not quantity of dirty lands.
The parts° that fortune hath bestowed upon her possessions
Tell her I hold as giddily[2] as fortune;
But 'tis that miracle and queen of gems
That nature pranks° her in attracts my soul. adorns
VIOLA But if she cannot love you, sir?
ORSINO I cannot be so answered.
VIOLA Sooth,° but you must. in truth
Say that some lady, as perhaps there is,
Hath for your love as great a pang of heart
As you have for Olivia. You cannot love her.
You tell her so. Must she not then be answered?
ORSINO There is no woman's sides
Can bide° the beating of so strong a passion withstand
As love doth give my heart; no woman's heart
So big, to hold so much. They lack retention.° constancy
Alas, their love may be called appetite,
No motion° of the liver, but the palate,[3] impulse
That suffer surfeit, cloyment,° and revolt.° satiety / revulsion
But mine is all as hungry as the sea,
And can digest as much. Make no compare
Between that love a woman can bear me
And that I owe° Olivia. have for
VIOLA Ay, but I know—
ORSINO What dost thou know?
VIOLA TOO well what love women to men may owe.

---

[7] Saturn (thought to control the melancholic).
[8] Shot silk, whose color changes with the angle of vision.
[9] An iridescent gemstone that changes color depending on the angle from which it is seen.
[1] I.e., this fickle lack of direction can make a voyage in the notoriously changeful sea carefree and consonant with one's desires.
[2] Lightly (fortune being fickle).
[3] Appetite, like the palate, is easily sated and thus lacks the emotional depth and complexity of real love, whose seat is the liver.

In faith, they are as true of heart as we.
My father had a daughter loved a man
As it might be, perhaps, were I a woman
I should your lordship.

ORSINO And what's her history?

VIOLA A blank, my lord. She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i'th' bud,
Feed on her damask[4] cheek. She pined in thought,
And with a green and yellow° melancholy pale and sallow
She sat like patience on a monument,[5]
Smiling at grief. Was not this love indeed?
We men may say more, swear more, but indeed
Our shows are more than will;[6] for still° we prove always
Much in our vows, but little in our love.

ORSINO But died thy sister of her love, my boy?

VIOLA I am all the daughters of my father's house,
And all the brothers too; and yet I know not.
Sir, shall I to this lady?

ORSINO Ay, that's the theme,
To her in haste. Give her this jewel. Say
My love can give no place, bide no denay.[7]

Exeunt [severally]

2.5

Enter SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, and FABIAN

SIR TOBY Come thy ways,° Signor Fabian. come along

FABIAN Nay, I'll come. If I lose a scruple° of this sport let me be boiled to death with melancholy.[1] miss a scrap

SIR TOBY Wouldst thou not be glad to have the niggardly° rascally sheep-biter[2] come by some notable shame? stingy

FABIAN I would exult, man. You know he brought me out o' favour with my lady about a bear-baiting[3] here.

SIR TOBY To anger him we'll have the bear again, and we will fool° him black and blue, shall we not, Sir Andrew? mock

SIR ANDREW An° we do not, it is pity of our lives. if

Enter MARIA [with a letter]

SIR TOBY Here comes the little villain. How now, my metal of India?[4]

MARIA Get ye all three into the box-tree.° Malvolio's coming down this walk. He has been yonder i' the sun practising behavior to his own shadow this half-hour. Observe him, for the love of mockery, for I know this letter will make a contemplative° idiot of him. Close,° in the name of jesting! hedge of boxwood vacuous /hide

[The men hide, MARIA places the letter]

---

[4] Pink and white, like a damask rose.
[5] A memorial statue symbolizing patience.
[6] Our displays of love are greater than our actual feelings.
[7] My love cannot be bated, nor tolerate refusal.
2.5 Location: Olivia's garden.
[1] Melancholy was a cold humor; "boiled" puns on "bile," the surplus of which produced melancholy.
[2] Literally, a dog that attacks sheep; here, a malicious sneak.
[3] Puritans disapproved of blood sports like bearbaiting.
[4] A woman worth her weight in gold.

Lie thou there, for here comes the trout that must be caught with tickling.[5] Exit

Enter MALVOLIO

MALVOLIO 'Tis but fortune, all is fortune. Maria once told me she° did affect° me, and I have heard herself come thus near, that should she fancy° it should be one of my complexion. Besides, she uses me with a more exalted respect than anyone else that follows her. What should I think on't?

i.e., Olivia / care for

SIR TOBY Here's an overweening° rogue.

presumptuous

FABIAN O, peace! Contemplation makes a rare turkey-cock[6] of him—how he jets° under his advanced° plumes!

struts / raised

SIR ANDREW 'Slight,[7] I could so beat the rogue.

SIR TOBY Peace, I say.

MALVOLIO To be Count Malvolio!

SIR TOBY Ah, rogue.

SIR ANDREW Pistol him, pistol him.

SIR TOBY Peace, peace.

MALVOLIO There is example° for't: the Lady of the Strachey married the yeoman of the wardrobe.[8]

precedent

SIR ANDREW Fie on him, Jezebel.[9]

FABIAN O peace, now he's deeply in. Look how imagination blows him.°

puffs him up

MALVOLIO Having been three months married to her, sitting in my state°—

chair of state

SIR TOBY O for a stone-bow[1] to hit him in the eye!

MALVOLIO Calling my officers° about me, in my branched[2] velvet gown, having come from a day-bed° where I have left Olivia sleeping—household attendants couch

SIR TOBY Fire and brimstone!

FABIAN O peace, peace.

MALVOLIO And then to have the humor of state[3] and—after a demure travel of regard,[4] telling them I know my place, as I would they should do theirs—to ask for my kinsman Toby.

SIR TOBY Bolts and shackles!

FABIAN O peace, peace, peace, now, now.

MALVOLIO Seven of my people with an obedient start make° out for him. I frown the while, and perchance wind up my watch, or play with my—[touching his chain][5] some rich jewel. Toby approaches; curtsies° there to me.

go bows

SIR TOBY Shall this fellow live?

---

[5] Flattery; trout can supposedly be caught by stroking them under the gills.

[6] Proverbially proud; they display their feathers like peacocks.

[7] By God's light (an oath).

[8] Perhaps an allusion to a noblewoman who had married her manservant, but there is no certain identification. "Yeoman of the wardrobe": keeper of clothes and linen.

[9] Biblical allusion to the proud wife of Ahab, king of Israel.

[1] Catapult, or crossbow for stones.

[2] Embroidered with branch patterns.

[3] To adopt the grand air of exalted greatness.

[4] After casting my eyes gravely about the room.

[5] Malvolio momentarily forgets that he will have abandoned his steward's chain; watches were an expensive luxury at this time.

FABIAN Though our silence be drawn from us with cars,[6] yet peace.

MALVOLIO I extend my hand to him thus, quenching my familiar smile with an austere regard° of control— look

SIR TOBY And does not Toby take° you a blow o' the lips, give then?

MALVOLIO Saying "Cousin Toby, my fortunes, having cast me on your niece, give me this prerogative of speech"—

SIR TOBY What, what!

MALVOLIO "You must amend your drunkenness."

SIR TOBY Out, scab.

FABIAN Nay, patience, or we break the sinews of our plot.

MALVOLIO "Besides, you waste the treasure of your time with a foolish knight"—

SIR ANDREW That's me, I warrant you.

MALVOLIO "One Sir Andrew."

SIR ANDREW I knew 'twas I, for many do call me fool.

MALVOLIO [seeing the letter] What employment° have we business
here?

FABIAN Now is the woodcock near the gin.[7]

SIR TOBY O peace, and the spirit of humors intimate[8] reading aloud to him.

MALVOLIO [taking up the letter] By my life, this is my lady's hand. These be her very c's, her u's, and her t's,[9] and thus makes she her great P's. It is in contempt of° question beyond her hand.

SIR ANDREW Her c's, her u's, and her t's? Why that?

MALVOLIO [reads] "To the unknown beloved, this, and my good wishes." Her very phrases! [Opening the letter] By your leave, wax[1]—soft,° and the impressure her Lucrece,[2] wait with which she uses to seal°—'tis my lady. To whom habitually seals should this be?

FABIAN This wins him, liver and all.

MALVOLIO "Jove knows I love,
But who?
Lips do not move,
No man must know."

"No man must know." What follows? The numbers altered.° meter changed
"No man must know." If this should be thee, Malvolio?

SIR TOBY Marry, hang thee, brock.[3]

MALVOLIO "I may command where I adore,
But silence like a Lucrece knife[4]
With bloodless stroke my heart doth gore.
M.O.A.I, doth sway my life."

---

[6] A prisoner might be tied to two carts or chariots ("cars") and pulled by horses in opposite directions to extort information.

[7] Snare. The woodcock is a proverbially foolish bird.

[8] And may a capricious impulse suggest.

[9] Malvolio unwittingly spells out "cut," slang for female genitals; the meaning is compounded by "great P's." In fact, these letters do not appear on the outside of the letter.

[1] He addresses himself to the sealing wax.

[2] The figure of Lucrece, Roman model of chastity, is the device ("impressure") imprinted on the seal.

[3] Badger (proverbially stinking).

[4] After being raped, Lucretia stabbed herself to death.

FABIAN A fustian° riddle. bombastic

SIR TOBY Excellent wench, say I.

MALVOLIO "M.O.A.I, doth sway my life." Nay, but first let me see, let me see, let me see.

FABIAN What dish o' poison has she dressed° him! prepared

SIR TOBY And with what wing the staniel checks at it![5]

MALVOLIO "I may command where I adore." Why, she may command me. I serve her, she is my lady. Why, this is evident to any formal capacity.° There is no obstruction in this. And the end—what should that alphabetical position° portend? If I could make that resemble something in me. Softly—'M.O.A.I.'

SIR TOBY O ay,[6] make up that, he is now at a cold scent.

FABIAN Sowter will cry upon't for all this, though° it be as rank as a fox.[7] as though

MALVOLIO "M." Malvolio—'M"—why, that begins my name.

FABIAN Did not I say he would work it out? The cur is excellent at faults.[8]

MALVOLIO "M." But then there is no consonancy in the sequel.[9] That suffers under probation.[1] "A" should follow, but "O" does.

FABIAN And "O"[2] shall end, I hope.

SIR TOBY Ay, or I'll cudgel him, and make him cry "O!"

MALVOLIO And then "I" comes behind.

FABIAN Ay, an you had any eye behind you you might see more detraction° at your heels than fortunes before you. defamation

MALVOLIO "M.O.A.I." This simulation° is not as the former; and yet to crush° this a little, it would bow° to me, for every one of these letters are in my name. Soft, here follows prose: "If this fall into thy hand, revolve.° In my stars° I am above thee, but be not afraid of greatness. Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon 'em. Thy fates open their hands,° let thy blood and spirit embrace them, and to inure° thyself to what thou art like° to be, cast thy humble slough,[3] and appear fresh. [7] "Sowter" (the name of a hound), having lost the scent, will start to bay loudly as he picks up the new, rank (stinking) smell of the fox.

[8] At picking up a scent after it is momentarily lost. A "fault" is a "cold scent" (line 117).

[3] A snake's old skin, which peels away.

[4] Let your tongue ring out arguments of statecraft or politics.

[5] An antiquated way of adjusting a garter—going once below the knee, crossing behind it, and knotting above the knee at the side.

[6] An emphatic expression, like "I tell you."

[SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, and FABIAN come from hiding]

FABIAN I will not give my part of this sport for a pension of thousands to be paid from the Sophy.° — shah of Persia

SIR TOBY I could marry this wench for this device.

SIR ANDREW So could I, too.

SIR TOBY And ask no other dowry with her but such another jest.

Enter MARIA

SIR ANDREW Nor I neither.

FABIAN Here comes my noble gull-catcher.° — trickster

SIR TOBY [to MARIA] Wilt thou set thy foot o' my neck?

SIR ANDREW [to MARIA] Or o' mine either?

SIR TOBY [to MARIA] Shall I play° my freedom at tray-trip,[2] — wager

SIR TOBY Like aqua vitae° with a midwife. — spirits, liquor

MARIA If you will then see the fruits of the sport, mark his first approach before my lady. He will come to her in yellow stockings, and 'tis a color she abhors, and cross-gartered, a fashion she detests; and he will smile upon her, which will now be so unsuitable to her disposition, being addicted to a melancholy as she is, that it cannot but turn him into a notable contempt.[3] If you will see it, follow me.

[7] Change places (of servant and mistress or master).

[8] Open countryside reveals.

[1] I will be in every detail the identical man (described in the letter).

[2] A game of dice in which the winner throws a three ("tray" is from the Spanish tres).

SIR TOBY To the gates of Tartar,° thou most excellent devil of wit. hell

SIR ANDREW I'll make one,° too. Exeunt go along

Enter VIOLA [as Cesario \ and [FESTE, the] clown [with pipe and taborI[1]

VIOLA Save° thee, friend, and thy music. Dost thou live by thy tabor? God

FESTE No, sir, I live by° the church.

VIOLA Art thou a churchman?

FESTE No such matter, sir. I do live by[2] the church for I do live at my house, and my house doth stand by the church.

VIOLA So thou mayst say the king lies by[3] a beggar if a beggar dwell near him, or the church stands° by thy tabor if thy tabor stand by the church. is maintained

FESTE You have said, sir. To see this age!—A sentence° is but a cheverel° glove to a good wit, how quickly the wrong side may be turned outward. saying kidskin

VIOLA Nay, that's certain. They that dally nicely° with words may quickly make them wanton.[4] play subtly

FESTE I would therefore my sister had had no name, sir.

VIOLA Why, man?

FESTE Why, sir, her name's a word, and to dally with that word might make my sister wanton. But indeed, words are very rascals since bonds disgraced them.[5]

VIOLA Thy reason, man?

FESTE Troth, sir, I can yield you none without words, and words are grown so false I am loath to prove reason with them.

VIOLA I warrant thou art a merry fellow, and carest for nothing.

FESTE Not so, sir, I do care for something; but in my conscience, sir, I do not care for you. If that be to care for nothing, sir, I would it would make you invisible.

VIOLA Art not thou the Lady Olivia's fool?

FESTE No indeed, sir, the Lady Olivia has no folly, she will keep no fool, sir, till she be married, and fools are as like husbands as pilchards[6] are to herrings—the husband's the bigger. I am indeed not her fool, but her corrupter of words.

---

[3] A notorious object of contempt.

3.1 Location: Olivia's garden.

[1] The dialogue demands only a tabor, but jesters commonly played a pipe with one hand while tapping a tabor (small drum, hanging from the neck) with the other.

[2] I do earn my keep with.

[3] Lives near; punning on "goes to bed with."

[4] Equivocal; Viola puns on the sense "unchaste."

[5] Since legal contracts replaced a man's word of honor. ("Bonds" plays on "sworn statements" and "fetters," betokening criminality.)

[6] Small fish similar to herring.

VIOLA I saw thee late° at the Count Orsino's. lately

FESTE Foolery, sir, does walk about the orb[7] like the sun, it shines everywhere. I would be sorry, sir, but the fool should be as oft with your master as with my mistress.[8] I think I saw your wisdom[9] there.

VIOLA Nay, an thou pass upon[1] me, I'll no more with thee. [giving money] Hold, there's expenses for thee.

FESTE Now Jove in his next commodity° of hair send thee a beard. shipment

VIOLA By my troth I'll tell thee, I am almost sick for one,[2] though I would not have it grow on my chin. Is thy lady within?

FESTE Would not a pair of these have bred,[3] sir?

VIOLA Yes, being kept together and put to use.[4]

FESTE I would play Lord Pandarus[5] of Phrygia, sir, to bring a Cressida to this Troilus.

VIOLA [giving money] I understand you, sir, 'tis well begged.

FESTE The matter I hope is not great, sir; begging but a beggar—Cressida was a beggar.[6] My lady is within, sir. I will conster° to them whence you come. Who you are and what you would are out of my welkin—I might say "element," but the word is over-worn.[7] Exit explain

VIOLA This fellow is wise enough to play the fool,
And to do that well craves a kind of wit.° intelligence
He must observe their mood on whom he jests,
The quality of persons, and the time,
And, like the haggard, check at every feather
That comes before his eye.[8] This is a practice° skill
As full of labor as a wise man's art,
For folly that he wisely shows is fit,[9]
But wise men, folly-fall'n,° quite taint[1] their wit. fallen into folly

Enter SIR TOBY and [SIR] ANDREW

SIR TOBY Save you, gentleman.

VIOLA And you, sir.

SIR ANDREW Dieu vous garde,[2] monsieur.

VIOLA Et vous aussi, voire serviteur.[3]

---

[7] World; the sun was still believed to circle the earth.

[8] Unless ("but") Feste should visit his foolery upon others, but also unless Orsino should be called "fool" as often as Olivia.

[9] A mocking title for Cesario.

[1] If you express an opinion of; if you joke about.

[2] Almost eager for a beard; almost pining for a man (Orsino).

[3] Would not a pair of coins such as these have multiplied (with possible pun on "be enough to buy bread").

[4] Invested to produce interest.

[5] Go-between or "pander," since Feste needs a "mate" for his coin(s). Shakespeare dramatizes the story in Troilus and Cressida.

[6] In asking for the "mate" to his Troilus coin, Feste draws on a version of the story of Troilus and Cressida in which Cressida became a leprous beggar.

[7] "Welkin" (sky or air) is synonymous with one meaning of "element," used in what Feste regards as the overworn phrase "out of my element."

[8] I.e., as a wild hawk ("haggard") must be sensitive to its prey's disposition.

[9] For folly that he skillfully displays is proper.

[1] Discredit; spoil.

[2] God protect you (French).

[3] And you also, (I am) your servant. (Sir Andrew's awkward reply demonstrates that his French is limited.)

SIR ANDREW I hope, sir, you are, and I am yours.
SIR TOBY Will you encounter[4] the house? My niece is desirous you should enter if your trade be to her.
VIOLA I am bound to° your niece, sir: I mean she is the for list° of my voyage. destination
SIR TOBY Taste° your legs, sir, put them to motion. try
VIOLA My legs do better understand° me, sir, than I understand what you mean by bidding me taste my legs. stand under
SIR TOBY I mean to go, sir, to enter.
VIOLA I will answer you with gait and entrance.

Enter OLIVIA, and [MARIA, her] gentlewoman

But we are prevented.° [To OLIVIA] Most excellent accomplished lady, the heavens rain odors on you. anticipated
SIR ANDREW [to SIR TOBY] That youth's a rare° courtier; an excellent
"rain odors"—well.° well put VIOLA My matter hath no voice,° lady, but to your own must not be spoken most pregnant° and vouchsafed° ear. receptive / proffered
SIR ANDREW [to SIR TOBY] "Odors," "pregnant," and "vouchsafed"—I'll get 'em all three all ready.[5]
OLIVIA Let the garden door be shut, and leave me to my hearing. [Exeunt SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, and MARIA]
Give me your hand, sir.
VIOLA My duty, madam, and most humble service.
OLIVIA What is your name?
VIOLA Cesario is your servant's name, fair princess.
OLIVIA My servant, sir? 'Twas never merry world[6]
Since lowly feigning° was called compliment. pretended humility
You're servant to the Count Orsino, youth.
VIOLA And he is yours, and his must needs be yours.
Your servant's servant is your servant, madam.
OLIVIA For° him, I think not on him. For his thoughts, as for
Would they were blanks rather than filled with me.
VIOLA Madam, I come to whet your gentle thoughts
On his behalf.
OLIVIA O by your leave,[7] I pray you.
I bade you never speak again of him;
But would you undertake another suit,
I had rather hear you to solicit that
Than music from the spheres.[8]
VIOLA Dear lady—
OLIVIA Give me leave, beseech you. I did send,
After the last enchantment you did here,
A ring in chase of you. So did I abuse° deceive; dishonor
Myself, my servant, and I fear me you.° and, as I fear, you
Under your hard construction[9] must I sit,
To force° that on you in a shameful cunning for forcing
Which you knew none of yours. What might you think?

---

[4] Pedantry for "enter" (Toby mocks Viola's courtly language).
[5] I.e., to commit to memory for later use.
[6] The proverbial "Things have never been the same."
[7] Permit me to interrupt (polite expression).
[8] Exquisite music thought to be made by the planets as they moved, but inaudible to mortal ears.
[9] Your unfavorable interpretation (of my behavior).

Have you not set mine honor at the stake
And baited it with all th'unmuzzled thoughts[1]
That tyrannous heart can think? To one of your receiving° perception
Enough is shown. A cypress,[2] not a bosom,
Hides my heart. So let me hear you speak.
VIOLA I pity you.
OLIVIA That's a degree to° love. toward
VIOLA No, not a grece,° for 'tis a vulgar proof° step / common experience
That very oft we pity enemies.
OLIVIA Why then, methinks 'tis time to smile again.[3]
O world, how apt° the poor are to be proud! ready
If one should be a prey, how much the better
To fall before the lion than the wolf![4]
Clock strikes
The clock upbraids° me with the waste of time. reproaches
Be not afraid, good youth, I will not have you;
And yet when wit and youth is come to harvest
Your wife is like to reap a proper° man. handsome; worthy
There lies your way, due west.
VIOLA Then westward ho![5]
Grace and good disposition° attend your ladyship. peace of mind
You'll nothing, madam, to my lord by me?
OLIVIA Stay. I prithee tell me what thou[6] think'st of me.
VIOLA That you do think you are not what you are.[7]
OLIVIA If I think so, I think the same of you.[8]
VIOLA Then think you right, I am not what I am.
OLIVIA I would you were as I would have you be.
VIOLA Would it be better, madam, than I am?
I wish it might, for now I am your fool.[9]
OLIVIA [aside] O, what a deal of scorn looks beautiful
In the contempt and anger of his lip!
A murd'rous guilt shows not itself more soon
Than love that would seem hid. Love's night is noon.[1]
[To VIOLA*]* Cesario, by the roses of the spring,
By maidhood, honor, truth, and everything,
I love thee so that, maugre° all thy pride, despite Nor° wit nor reason can my passion hide. neither
Do not extort thy reasons from this clause,
For that° I woo, thou therefore hast no cause.[2] that because
But rather reason thus with reason fetter:[3]
Love sought is good, but given unsought, is better.

---

[1] As bears that were tied up at the stake and baited with dogs.
[2] Veil of transparent silken gauze; the cypress tree was also emblematic of mourning.
[3] Time to discard love's melancholy.
[4] I.e., if I had to fall prey to love, it would have been better to succumb to the noble Orsino than to the hardhearted Cesario.
[5] Thames watermen's cry to attract London passengers for the court at Westminster.
[6] Olivia changes from "you" to the familiar "thou."
[7] That you think you are in love with a man, but you are mistaken.
[8] Olivia may think that Cesario has suggested that she is mad; or she may imply that she thinks that Cesario, despite his subordinate position, is noble.
[9] You have made a fool of me.
[1] Love, though attempting secrecy, still shines out as bright as day.
[2] Do not take the position that just because I woo you, you are under no obligation to reciprocate.
[3] But instead constrain your reasoning with this argument.

VIOLA By innocence I swear, and by my youth,
I have one heart, one bosom, and one truth,
And that no woman has, nor never none
Shall mistress be of it save I alone.
And so adieu, good madam. Never more
Will I my master's tears to you deplore.° lament

OLIVIA Yet come again, for thou perhaps mayst move
That heart which now abhors, to like his love.
Exeunt [severally]

3.2

Enter SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, and FABIAN

SIR ANDREW No, faith, I'll not stay a jot longer.

SIR TOBY Thy reason, dear venom,° give thy reason. venomous one

FABIAN YOU must needs yield your reason, Sir Andrew.

SIR ANDREW Marry, I saw your niece do more favors to the Count's servingman than ever she bestowed upon me.
I saw't i'th' orchard.° garden

SIR TOBY Did she see thee the while,° old boy? Tell me that. meanwhile

SIR ANDREW As plain as I see you now.

FABIAN This was a great argument° of love in her toward proof
you.

SIR ANDREW 'Slight,° will you make an ass o' me? by God's light

FABIAN I will prove it legitimate, sir, upon the oaths of judgment and reason.

SIR TOBY And they have been grand-jurymen[1] since before
Noah was a sailor.

FABIAN She did show favor to the youth in your sight only to exasperate you, to awake your dormouse° valor, to put meek, timid fire in your heart and brimstone in your liver. You should then have accosted her, and with some excellent jests, fire-new from the mint,° you should have banged the newly minted
youth into dumbness. This was looked for at your hand, and this was balked.° The double gilt[2] of this opportunity neglected you let time wash off, and you are now sailed into the north of my lady's opinion,[3] where you will hang like an icicle on a Dutchman's[4] beard unless you do redeem it by some laudable attempt either of valor or policy.° cunning

SIR ANDREW An't° be any way, it must be with valor, for if it policy I hate. I had as lief° be a Brownist as a politician.[5] as soon

SIR TOBY Why then, build me thy fortunes upon the basis of valor. Challenge me° the Count's youth to fight with for me him, hurt him in eleven places. My niece shall take note of it; and assure thyself, there is no love-broker in the world can more prevail in man's commendation with woman than report of valor.

3.2 Location: Olivia's house.

[1] Grand-jurymen were supposed to be good judges of evidence.

[2] Twice gilded, and as such, Sir Andrew's "golden opportunity" to prove both love and valor.

[3] Into Olivia's cold disfavor.

[4] Perhaps an allusion to William Barentz, who led an expedition to the Arctic in 1596—97.

[5] Schemer. A Brownist was a member of the Puritan sect founded in 1581 by Robert Browne.

FABIAN There is no way but this, Sir Andrew.

SIR ANDREW Will either of you bear me a challenge to him?

SIR TOBY Go, write it in a martial hand, be curst° and brief. sharp
It is no matter how witty so it be eloquent and full of invention.° Taunt him with the license of ink.[6] If thou imagination; untruth
"thou'st"[7] him some thrice, it shall not be amiss, and as many lies° as will lie in thy sheet of paper, although the accusations of lying sheet were big enough for the bed of Ware,[8] in England, set 'em down, go about it. Let there be gall[9] enough in thy ink; though thou write with a goose-pen,[1] no matter.
About it.

SIR ANDREW Where shall I find you?

SIR TOBY We'll call thee at the cubiculo.° Go. little chamber

Exit SIR ANDREW

FABIAN This is a dear manikin° to you, Sir Toby. puppet

SIR TOBY I have been dear° to him, lad, some two thousand costly strong or so.

FABIAN We shall have a rare letter from him; but you'll not deliver't.

SIR TOBY Never trust me then; and by all means stir on the youth to an answer. I think oxen and wain-ropes[2] cannot hale° them together. For Andrew, if he were opened and you find so much blood in his liver[3] as will clog° the foot of a flea, I'll eat the rest of th'anatomy.° weigh down / cadaver

FABIAN And his opposite,° the youth, bears in his visage adversary no great presage of cruelty.

Enter MARIA

SIR TOBY Look where the youngest wren of nine[4] comes.

MARIA If you desire the spleen,° and will laugh yourselves a laughing fit into stitches, follow me. Yon gull° Malvolio is turned heathen, a very renegado,[5] for there is no Christian that means to be saved by believing rightly can ever believe such impossible passages of grossness.[6] He's in yellow stockings.

SIR TOBY And cross-gartered?

MARIA Most villainously,° like a pedant° that keeps a abominably / teacher school i'th' church.[7] I have dogged him like his murderer.
He does obey every point of the letter that I dropped to betray him. He does smile his face into more lines than is in the new map with the augmentation of the Indies.[8]

---

[6] I.e., with the freedom taken in writing but not risked in conversation.

[7] Call him "thou" (an insult to a stranger).

[8] Famous Elizabethan bedstead, nearly eleven feet square, now in the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

[9] (1) Oak gall, an ingredient in ink; (2) bitterness or rancor.

[1] Quill made of a goose feather. (The goose was proverbially cowardly and foolish.)

[2] Wagon ropes pulled by oxen.

[3] Supposed to be the source of blood, which engendered courage.

[4] The smallest of small birds; the smallest wren in a family of nine.

[5] Renegade (Spanish); a Christian converted to Islam.

[6] Such patent absurdities (in the letter).

[7] Because no schoolroom is available in a small rustic community.

[8] Possibly refers to a map published in I 599 showing the East Indies more fully than in earlier maps and crisscrossed by many rhumb lines.

You have not seen such a thing as 'tis. I can hardly forbear hurling things at him. I know my lady will strike him. If she do, he'll smile, and take't for a great favor.

SIR TOBY Come bring us, bring us where he is. Exeunt

3.3

Enter SEBASTIAN and ANTONIO

SEBASTIAN I would not by my will have troubled you,
But since you make your pleasure of your pains
I will no further chide you.
ANTONIO I could not stay behind you. My desire,
More sharp than filed steel, did spur me forth,
And not all° love to see you—though so much only
As might have drawn one to a longer voyage—
But jealousy° what might befall your travel, apprehension
Being skilless in° these parts, which to a stranger, unfamiliar to Unguided and unfriended, often prove
Rough and unhospitable. My willing love
The rather° by these arguments of fear more willingly
Set forth in your pursuit.
SEBASTIAN My kind Antonio,
I can no other answer make but thanks,
And thanks; and ever oft° good turns very often
Are shuffled off° with such uncurrent[1] pay. shrugged off
Rut were my worth as is my conscience° firm, sense of indebtedness
You should find better dealing. What's to do?
Shall we go see the relics° of this town? sights
ANTONIO Tomorrow, sir. Best first go see your lodging.
SEBASTIAN I am not weary, and 'tis long to night.
I pray you let us satisfy our eyes
With the memorials and the things of fame
That do renown this city.
ANTONIO Would you'd pardon me.
I do not without danger walk these streets.
Once in a sea-fight 'gainst the Count his° galleys i.e., the Count's
I did some service, of such note indeed
That were I ta'en° here it would scarce be answered.[2] captured
SEBASTIAN Belike° you slew great number of his people. perhaps
ANTONIO Th'offense is not of such a bloody nature,
Albeit° the quality° of the time and quarrel although / circumstances
Might well have given us bloody argument.° cause for bloodshed
It might have since been answered in repaying
What we took from them, which for traffic's° sake trade's
Most of our city did. Only myself stood out,
For which if I be latched° in this place caught
I shall pay dear.
SEBASTIAN Do not then walk too open.
ANTONIO It doth not fit me. Hold, sir, here's my purse.

3.3 Location: A street scene.

[1] Out of currency; worthless.

[2] It would be difficult for me to make reparation (and thus my life would be in danger).

In the south suburbs at the Elephant° name of an inn
Is best to lodge. I will bespeak our diet° order our meals
Whiles you beguile° the time and feed your knowledge pass
With viewing of the town. There shall you have me.
SEBASTIAN Why I your purse?
ANTONIO Haply° your eye shall light upon some toy° perhaps / trifle
You have desire to purchase; and your store° resources
I think is not for idle markets,[3] sir.
SEBASTIAN I'll be your purse-bearer, and leave you
For an hour.
ANTONIO To th' Elephant.
SEBASTIAN I do remember.
Exeunt [severally]

3.4

Enter OLIVIA and MARIA

OLIVIA [aside] I have sent after him, he says he'll come.
How shall I feast him? What bestow of° him?
For youth is bought more oft than begged or borrowed.[1]
I speak too loud.
[To MARIA] Where's Malvolio? He is sad° and civil,° sober / respectful
And suits well for a servant with my fortunes.
Where is Malvolio?
MARIA He's coming, madam, but in very strange manner.
He is sure possessed,° madam. (by the devil); insane
OLIVIA Why, what's the matter? Does he rave?
MARIA No, madam, he does nothing but smile. Your ladyship were best to have some guard about you if he come, for sure the man is tainted in's wits.
OLIVIA Go call him hither. [Exit MARIA]
I am as mad as he,
If sad and merry madness equal be.
Enter MALVOLIO [cross-gartered and wearing yellow stockings, with MARIA]
How now, Malvolio?
MALVOLIO Sweet lady, ho, ho!
OLIVIA Smil'st thou? I sent for thee upon a sad occasion.° about a serious matter
MALVOLIO Sad, lady? I could be sad. This does make some obstruction in the blood, this cross-gartering, but what of that? If it please the eye of one, it is with me as the very true sonnet° is, "Please one, and please all."[2] song
OLIVIA Why, how dost thou, man? What is the matter with thee?
MALVOLIO Not black in my mind, though yellow[3] in my legs. It did come to his hands, and commands shall be executed. I think we do know the sweet roman hand.° italic calligraphy

---

[3] Not large enough to spend on luxuries.

3.4 Location: The garden of Olivia's house.

[1] "Better to buy than to beg or borrow" was proverbial.

[2] If I please one, I please all I care to please (words of a popular bawdy ballad).

[3] Black and yellow biles indicated choleric and melancholic dispositions, respectively. "Black and yellow" was the name of a popular song; to "wear yellow hose" was to be jealous.

OLIVIA Wilt thou go to bed,[4] Malvolio?

MALVOLIO [kissing his hand] To bed? "Ay, sweetheart, and I'll come to thee."[5]

OLIVIA God comfort thee. Why dost thou smile so, and kiss thy hand so oft?

MARIA How do you, Malvolio?

MALVOLIO At your request?—yes, nightingales answer daws.[6]

MARIA Why appear you with this ridiculous boldness before my lady?

MALVOLIO "Be not afraid of greatness"—'twas well writ.

OLIVIA What meanest thou by that, Malvolio?

MALVOLIO "Some are born great"—

OLIVIA Ha?

MALVOLIO "Some achieve greatness"—

OLIVIA What sayst thou?

MALVOLIO "And some have greatness thrust upon them."

OLIVIA Heaven restore thee.

MALVOLIO "Remember who commended thy yellow stockings"—

OLIVIA "Thy yellow stockings"?

MALVOLIO "And wished to see thee cross-gartered."

OLIVIA "Cross-gartered"?

MALVOLIO "Go to, thou art made, if thou desirest to be

OLIVIA Am I made?

MALVOLIO "If not, let me see thee a servant still."

OLIVIA Why, this is very midsummer° madness.

Enter a SERVANT

SERVANT Madam, the young gentleman of the Count Orsino's is returned. I could hardly entreat him back. He attends your ladyship's pleasure.

OLIVIA I'll come to him. [Exit SERVANT]

Good Maria, let this fellow be looked to. Where's my cousin Toby? Let some of my people have a special care of him, I would not have him miscarry° for the half of my dowry. Exeunt [OLIVIA and MARIA, severally]

MALVOLIO O ho, do you come near° me now? No worse man than Sir Toby to look to me. This concurs directly with the letter, she sends him on purpose, that I may appear stubborn to him, for she incites me to that in the letter. "Cast thy humble slough," says she, "be opposite with a kinsman, surly with servants, let thy tongue tang arguments of state, put thyself into the trick of singularity," and consequently° sets down the manner how, as a sad face, a reverend carriage, a slow tongue, in the habit of some sir of note,° and so forth. [5] A line from a popular song.

[6] Shall I deign to reply to you? Yes, since even the nightingale sings in response to the crowing of the jackdaw.

[7] Birds were caught by smearing sticky birdlime on branches.

it is Jove's doing, and Jove make me thankful. And when she went away now, "let this fellow be looked to." Fellow![8]—not "Malvolio," nor after my degree, but "fellow." Why, everything adheres together that no dram of a scruple, no scruple of a scruple,[9] no obstacle, no incredulous or unsafe circumstance—what can be said?—nothing that can be can come between me and the full prospect of my hopes. Well, Jove, not I, is the doer of this, and he is to be thanked.

Enter [SIR] TOBY, FABIAN, and MARIA

SIR TOBY Which way is he, in the name of sanctity? If all the devils of hell be drawn in little,[1] and Legion[2] himself possessed him, yet I'll speak to him.

FABIAN Here he is, here he is. [To MALVOLIO] How is't with you, sir? How is't with you, man?

MALVOLIO Go off, I discard you. Let me enjoy my private.° Go off. privacy

MARIA Lo, how hollow° the fiend speaks within him. Did not I tell you? Sir Toby, my lady prays you to have a care of him. resonantly

MALVOLIO Aha, does she so?

SIR TOBY Go to, go to. Peace, peace, we must deal gently with him. Let me alone.° How do you, Malvolio? How is't with you? What, man, defy° the devil. Consider, he's an enemy to mankind. leave him to me renounce

MALVOLIO Do you know what you say?

MARIA La° you, an you speak ill of the devil, how he takes it at heart. Pray God he be not bewitched. look

FABIAN Carry his water to th' wise woman.[3]

MARIA Marry, and it shall be done tomorrow morning, if I live. My lady would not lose him for more than I'll say.

MALVOLIO How now, mistress?

MARIA O Lord!

SIR TOBY Prithee hold thy peace, this is not the way. Do you not see you move° him? Let me alone with him. anger

FABIAN No way but gentleness, gently, gently. The fiend is rough,° and will not be roughly used. violent

SIR TOBY Why how now, my bawcock? How dost thou, chuck?[4]

MALVOLIO Sir!

SIR TOBY Ay, biddy,° come with me. What, man, 'tis not for gravity° to play at cherry-pit[5] with Satan. Hang him, foul collier.[6] hen for a man of dignity

---

[8] Malvolio takes the word to mean "companion."

[9] Both phrases mean "no scrap of a doubt." "Dram": one-eighth of a fluid ounce. "Scruple": one-third of a dram.

[1] Be contracted into a small space (punning on "painted in miniature").

[2] Alluding to a scene of exorcism in Mark 5.8—9: "For he [Jesus] said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered saying, My name is Legion: for we are many."

[3] Local healer, "good witch." "Water": urine (for medical diagnosis).

[4] A term of endearment, perhaps from chick, chicken. "Bawcock": fine fellow (from the French beau coq, "fine bird").

[5] A children's game in which cherry stones were thrown into a hole.

[6] Dirty coalman (the devil was supposed to be black).

MARIA Get him to say his prayers. Good Sir Toby, get him to pray.

MALVOLIO My prayers, minx?° impertinent girl

MARIA No, I warrant you, he will not hear of godliness.

MALVOLIO Go hang yourselves, all. You are idle° shallow foolish things, I am not of your element.° You shall know more social sphere hereafter. Exit

SIR TOBY Is't possible?

FABIAN If this were played upon a stage, now, I could condemn it as an improbable fiction.

SIR TOBY His very genius° hath taken the infection of the spirit device,° man. trick

MARIA Nay, pursue him now, lest the device take air and taint.[7]

FABIAN Why, we shall make him mad indeed.

MARIA The house will be the quieter.

SIR TOBY Come, we'll have him in a dark room and bound.[8]
My niece is already in the belief that he's mad. We may carry it thus° for our pleasure and his penance till our continue the pretense very pastime, tired out of breath, prompt us to have mercy on him, at which time we will bring the device to the bar[9] and crown thee for a finder of madmen.[1] But see, but see.

Enter SIR ANDREW [with a paper]

FABIAN More matter for a May morning.[2]

SIR ANDREW Here's the challenge, read it. I warrant there's vinegar and pepper in't.

FABIAN Is't so saucy?

SIR ANDREW Ay—is't? I warrant him. Do but read.

SIR TOBY Give me.
[Reads] "Youth, whatsoever thou art, thou art but a scurvy fellow."

FABIAN Good, and valiant.

SIR TOBY "Wonder not, nor admire° not in thy mind why I marvel
do call thee so, for I will show thee no reason for't."

FABIAN A good note, that keeps you from the blow of the law.[3]

SIR TOBY "Thou comest to the Lady Olivia, and in my sight she uses thee kindly; but thou liest in thy throat,° that is not the matter I challenge thee for."

FABIAN Very brief, and to exceeding good sense [aside] -less.[4]

SIR TOBY "I will waylay thee going home, where if it be thy chance to kill me"—

FABIAN Good.

---

[7] Spoil (like leftover food) by exposure to air; become known (and thus ruined).

[8] Customary treatments for madness.

[9] Into the open court (to be judged).

[1] I.e., one of a jury "finding," or declaring, a man to be mad.

[2] More pastime fit for a holiday.

[3] That protects you from a charge of a breach of peace.

[4] The Folio's "sence-lesse" appears to use the hyphen to signal an aside.

SIR TOBY "Thou killest me like a rogue and a villain."

FABIAN Still you keep o'th' windy side[5] of the law—good.

SIR TOBY "Fare thee well, and God have mercy upon one of our souls. He may have mercy upon mine, but my hope is better,[6] and so look to thyself.

Thy friend as thou usest him, and thy sworn enemy,
Andrew Aguecheek."

If this letter move° him not, his legs cannot. I'll give't him.

MARIA You may have very fit occasion for't. He is now in some commerce° with my lady, and will by and by depart. conversation

SIR TOBY GO, Sir Andrew. Scout me° for him at the corner of the orchard like a bum-baily.[7] So soon as ever thou seest him, draw, and as thou drawest, swear horrible, for it comes to pass oft that a terrible oath, with a swaggering accent sharply twanged off, gives manhood more approbation° than ever proof° itself would have earned him. Away. look out credit / trial

SIR ANDREW Nay, let me alone for swearing.[8] Exit

SIR TOBY NOW will not I deliver his letter, for the behavior of the young gentleman gives him out to be of good capacity° and breeding.° His employment between his lord and my niece confirms no less. Therefore this letter, being so excellently ignorant, will breed no terror in the youth. He will find it comes from a clodpoll.° But, sir, I will deliver his challenge by word of mouth, set upon Aguecheek a notable report of valor, and drive the gentleman—as I know his youth will aptly receive it[9]—into a most hideous opinion of his rage, skill, fury, and impetuosity. This will so fright them both that they will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices.[1] ability / upbringing blockhead

Enter OLIVIA, and VIOLA [as Cesario]

FABIAN Here he comes with your niece. Give them way° till he take leave, and presently after him. stand aside

SIR TOBY I will meditate the while upon some horrid message for a challenge.

[Exeunt SIR TOBY, FABIAN, and MARIA]

OLIVIA I have said too much unto a heart of stone,
And laid mine honor too unchary° out. zrelessly
There's something in me that reproves my fault,
But such a headstrong potent fault it is
That it but mocks reproof.

VIOLA With the same 'havior
That your passion bears[2] goes on my master's griefs.

OLIVIA [giving a jewel] Here, wear this jewel[3] for me,'tis my picture—

---

[5] Downwind of the law—on the safe side of it.

[6] Andrew means he expects to survive, but he ineptly implies that he expects to be damned.

[7] Petty sheriff's officer employed to arrest debtors.

[8] Have no doubts as to my swearing ability.

[9] As I know his inexperience will readily believe the report.

[1] Basilisks: mythical creatures supposed to kill at a glance.

[2] Behavior that characterizes your Iovesickness.

[3] Jeweled ornament, here a brooch or a locket with Olivia's picture.

Refuse it not, it hath no tongue to vex you—
And I beseech you come again tomorrow.
What shall you ask of me that I'll deny,
That honor, saved, may upon asking give?[4]

VIOLA Nothing but this: your true love for my master.

OLIVIA How with mine honor may I give him that
Which I have given to you?

VIOLA I will acquit you.[5]

OLIVIA Well, come again tomorrow. Fare thee well.
A fiend like thee might bear my soul to hell. [Exit]

Enter [SIR] TOBY and FABIAN

SIR TOBY Gentleman, God save thee.

VIOLA And you, sir.

SIR TOBY That defense thou hast, betake thee to't. Of what nature the wrongs are thou hast done him, I know not, but thy intercepter, full of despite,° bloody as the hunter, defiance attends° thee at the orchard end. Dismount thy tuck,[6] be awaits yare° in thy preparation, for thy assailant is quick, skillful, prompt and deadly.

VIOLA You mistake, sir, I am sure no man hath any quarrel to me. My remembrance° is very free and clear from any memory
image of offense done to any man.

SIR TOBY You'll find it otherwise, I assure you. Therefore, if you hold your life at any price, betake you to your guard, for your opposite° hath in him what youth, strength, skill, opponent
and wrath can furnish man withal.

VIOLA I pray you, sir, what is he?

SIR TOBY He is knight dubbed with unhatched[7] rapier and on carpet consideration,[8] but he is a devil in private brawl. Souls and bodies hath he divorced three, and his incensement at this moment is so implacable that satisfaction can be none but by pangs of death and sepulchre.
Hob nob[9] is his word,° give't or take't.

VIOLA I will return again into the house and desire some conduct° of the lady. I am no fighter. I have heard of some escort kind of men that put quarrels purposely on others, to taste° their valor. Belike this is a man of that quirk. test

SIR TOBY Sir, no. His indignation derives itself out of a very competent° injury, therefore get you on, and give him his sufficient desire. Back you shall not to the house unless you undertake that° with me which with as much safety you might i.e., a duel
answer him. Therefore on, or strip your sword stark naked, for meddle° you must, that's certain, or forswear engage in a duel to wear iron about you.[1]

VIOLA This is as uncivil as strange. I beseech you do me this courteous office, as to know of° the knight what my ascertain from offense to him is. It is something of my negligence, nothing of my purpose.

[4] That honor may grant without compromising itself.
[5] I will release you from your promise.
[6] Draw your rapier.
[7] Unhacked, or undented, never used in battle.
[8] A "carpet knight" obtained his title through connections at court rather than valor on the battlefield.
[9] Have or have not ("all or nothing").
[1] Or forfeit your right to wear a sword.

SIR TOBY I will do so. Signor Fabian, stay you by this gentleman till my return. Exit

VIOLA Pray you, sir, do you know of this matter?

FABIAN I know the knight is incensed against you even to a mortal arbitrement,° but nothing of the circumstance deadly duel more.

VIOLA I beseech you, what manner of man is he?

FABIAN Nothing of that wonderful promise to read him by his form[2] as you are like to find him in the proof° of his experience valor. He is indeed, sir, the most skillful, bloody, and fatal opposite that you could possibly have found in any part of Illyria. Will you° walk towards him, I will make your if you will peace with him if I can.

VIOLA I shall be much bound to you for't. I am one that had rather go with Sir Priest[3] than Sir Knight—I care not who knows so much of my mettle.° Exeunt disposition

Enter [SIR] TOBY and [SIR] ANDREW

SIR TOBY Why, man, he's a very devil, I have not seen such a virago.[4] I had a pass° with him, rapier, scabbard, and fencing bout all, and he gives me the stuck-in[5] with such a mortal motion that it is inevitable, and on the answer,° he pays return hit you as surely as your feet hits the ground they step on.
They say he has been fencer to the Sophy.° shah of Persia

SIR ANDREW Pox on't, I'll not meddle with him.

SIR TOBY Ay, but he will not now be pacified, Fabian can scarce hold him yonder.

SIR ANDREW Plague on't, an° I thought he had been valiant if and so cunning in fence I'd have seen him damned ere I'd have challenged him. Let him let the matter slip and I'll give him my horse, grey Capulet.

SIR TOBY I'll make the motion.° Stand here, make a good offer show on't—this shall end without the perdition of souls.° loss of lives
[Aside] Marry, I'll ride your horse as well as I ride you.

Enter FABIAN, and VIOLA [as Cesario]

[Aside to FABIAN] I have his horse to take up° the quarrel, I settle have persuaded him the youth's a devil.

FABIAN [aside to SIR TOBY] He is as horribly conceited[6] of him, and pants and looks pale as if a bear were at his heels.

SIR TOBY [to VIOLA] There's no remedy, sir, he will fight with you for's oath' sake. Marry, he hath better bethought him of his quarrel, and he finds that now scarce to be worth talking of. Therefore draw for the supportance of his vow, he protests he will not hurt you.

VIOLA [aside] Pray God defend me. A little thing would make me tell them how much I lack of a man.

FABIAN [to SIR ANDREW] Give ground if you see him furious.

---

[2] I.e., from his outward appearance, you cannot perceive him to be as remarkable.

[3] Priests were often addressed as "sir."

[4] Woman warrior (suggesting great ferocity with a feminine appearance).

[5] Thrust (from the Italian stoccata).

[6] He has as terrifying an idea.

SIR TOBY Come, Sir Andrew, there's no remedy, the gentleman will for his honor's sake have one bout with you, he cannot by the duello° avoid it, but he has promised code of dueling me, as he is a gentleman and a soldier, he will not hurt you. Come on, to't.

SIR ANDREW Pray God he keep his oath.

Enter ANTONIO

VIOLA I do assure you 'tis against my will.

[SIR ANDREW and VIOLA draw their swords]

ANTONIO [drawing his sword, to SIR ANDREW] Put up your sword. If this young gentleman
Have done offense, I take the fault on me.
If you offend him, I for him defy you.

SIB TOBY You, sir? Why, what are you?

ANTONIO One, sir, that for his love dares yet do more Than you have heard him brag to you he will.

SIR TOBY [drawing his sword] Nay, if you be an undertaker,[7] I am for you.

Enter OFFICERS

FABIAN O, good Sir Toby, hold. Here come the officers.

SIR TOBY [to ANTONIO] I'll be with you anon.

VIOLA [to SIR ANDREW] Pray, sir, put your sword up if you please.

SIR ANDREW Marry will I, sir, and for that° I promised you as for that I'll be as good as my word. He will bear you easily, and reins well.

[SIR ANDREW and VIOLA put up their swords]

FIRST OFFICER This is the man, do thy office.

SECOND OFFICER Antonio, I arrest thee at the suit of Count Orsino.

ANTONIO You do mistake me, sir.

FIRST OFFICER NO, sir, no jot. I know your favor° well, face
Though now you have no seacap on your head.
[To SECOND OFFICER] Take him away, he knows I know him well.

ANTONIO I must obey. [To VIOLA] This comes with seeking you.
But there's no remedy, I shall answer° it. answer for
What will you do now my necessity
Makes me to ask you for my purse? It grieves me
Much more for what I cannot do for you
Than what befalls myself. You stand amazed,
But be of comfort.

SECOND OFFICER Come, sir, away.

ANTONIO [to VIOLA] I must entreat of you some of that money.

VIOLA What money, sir?
For the fair kindness you have showed me here,
And part° being prompted by your present trouble, in part
Out of my lean and low ability
I'll lend you something. My having is not much.
I'll make division of my present° with you. ready money

---

[7] One who would take upon himself a task (here, a challenge).

Hold, [offering money] there's half my coffer.
ANTONIO Will you deny me now?
Is't possible that my deserts to you
Can lack persuasion?[8] Do not tempt my misery,
Lest that it make me so unsound[0] a man morally weak
As to upbraid you with those kindnesses
That I have done for you.
VIOLA I know of none,
Nor know I you by voice, or any feature.
I hate ingratitude more in a man
Than lying, vainness, babbling drunkenness,
Or any taint of vice whose strong corruption
Inhabits our frail blood.
ANTONIO O heavens themselves!
SECOND OFFICER Come, sir, I pray you go.
ANTONIO Let me speak a little. This youth that you see here
I snatched one half out of the jaws of death,
Relieved him with such sanctity[0] of love, great devotion
And to his image,[9] which methought did promise
Most venerable worth,[1] did I devotion.
FIRST OFFICER What's that to us? The time goes by, away.
ANTONIO But O, how vile an idol proves this god!
Thou hast, Sebastian, done good feature[0] shame. physical beauty
In nature there's no blemish but the mind.
None can be called deformed but the unkind.
Virtue is beauty, but the beauteous evil
Are empty trunks o'er-flourished[2] by the devil.
FIRST OFFICER The man grows mad, away with him.
Come, come, sir.
ANTONIO Lead me on. Exit [with OFFICERS]
VIOLA [aside] Methinks his words do from such passion fly
That he believes himself. So do not I.[3]
Prove true, imagination, O prove true,
That I, dear brother, be now ta'en for you!
SIR TOBY Come hither, knight. Come hither, Fabian. We'll whisper o'er a couplet or two of most sage saws.[0] sayings, maxims
[The)/ stand aside]
VIOLA He named Sebastian. I my brother know
Yet living in my glass.[0] Even such and so mirror
In favor[0] was my brother, and he went appearance
Still[0] in this fashion, color, ornament, always
For him I imitate. O, if it prove,
Tempests are kind, and salt waves fresh in love! Exit
SIR TOBY [to SIR ANDREW] A very dishonest,[0] paltry boy, and more a coward than a hare. His dishonesty appears in leaving his friend here in necessity, and denying him; and for his cowardship, ask Fabian. dishonorable

---

[8] Is it possible my past kindness can fail to persuade you?

[9] Appearance (with a play on "religious icon").

[1] Was worthy of veneration.

[2] Chests decorated with carving or painting; beautified bodies.

[3] I.e., I do not entirely believe the passionate hope (for my brother's rescue) that is arising in me.

FABIAN A coward, a most devout coward, religious in it.
SIR ANDREW 'Slid,° I'll after him again, and beat him. by God's eyelid
SIR TOBY DO, cuff him soundly, but never draw thy sword.
SIR ANDREW An I do not— [Exit]
FABIAN Come, let's see the event.° outcome
SIR TOBY I dare lay any money 'twill be nothing yet.° after all
Exeunt

4.1

Enter SEBASTIAN and [FESTE, the] clown

FESTE Will you° make me believe that I am not sent for are you trying to
you?
SEBASTIAN Go to, go to, thou art a foolish fellow,
Let me be clear° of thee. rid
FESTE Well held out,° i'faith! No, I do not know you, nor kept up
I am not sent to you by my lady to bid you come speak with her, nor your name is not Master Cesario, nor this is not my nose, neither. Nothing that is so, is so.
SEBASTIAN I prithee vent° thy folly somewhere else, utter; excrete
Thou know'st not me.
FESTE Vent my folly! He has heard that word of some great man, and now applies it to a fool. Vent my folly—I am afraid this great lubber° the world will prove a cockney.° lout / pampered child
I prithee now ungird thy strangeness,[1] and tell me what I shall "vent" to my lady? Shall I "vent" to her that thou art coming?
SEBASTIAN I prithee, foolish Greek,° depart from me. buffoon
There's money for thee. If you tarry longer
I shall give worse payment.
FESTE By my troth, thou hast an open hand. These wise men that give fools money get themselves a good report,° reputation after fourteen years' purchase.[2]

Enter [SIR] ANDREW, [SIR] TOBY, and FABIAN

SIR ANDREW [to SEBASTIAN] Now, sir, have I met you again?
[Striking him] There's for you.
SEBASTIAN [striking SIR ANDREW with his DAGGER] Why,
there's for thee, and there, and there.
Are all the people mad?
SIR TOBY [to SEBASTIAN, holding him hack] Hold, sir, or I'll throw your dagger o'er the house.
FESTE This will I tell my lady straight.° I would not be in straightway
some of your coats for twopence. [Exit]
SIR TOBY Come on, sir, hold.
SIR ANDREW Nay, let him alone, I'll go another way to work with him. I'll have an action of battery° against him if a lawsuit for assault there be any law in Illyria. Though I struck him first, yet it's no matter for that.

4.1 Location: Near Olivia's house.

[1] I.e., stop pretending not to know me. (Feste mocks Sebastian's affected language.)

[2] I.e., at a high price. The purchase price of land was normally twelve times its annual rent.

SEBASTIAN Let go thy hand.
SIR TOBY Come, sir, I will not let you go. Come, my young soldier, put up your iron. You are well fleshed.[3] Come on.
SEBASTIAN [freeing himself] I will be free from thee.
What wouldst thou now?
If thou dar'st tempt me further, draw thy sword.
SIR TOBY What, what? Nay then, I must have an ounce or two of this malapert° blood from you. impudent
*[*SIR TOBY and SEBASTIAN draw their swords.]
Enter OLIVIA
OLIVIA Hold, Toby, on thy life I charge thee hold.
SIR TOBY Madam.
OLIVIA Will it be ever thus? Ungracious wretch,
Fit for the mountains and the barbarous caves,
Where manners ne'er were preached—out of my sight!
Be not offended, dear Cesario.
[To SIR TOBY*]* Rudesby,° be gone. ruffian
[Exeunt SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, and FABIAN*]*
I prithee, gentle friend,
Let thy fair wisdom, not thy passion sway
In this uncivil and unjust extent° assault
Against thy peace. Go with me to my house,
And hear thou there how many fruitless pranks
This ruffian hath botched up,° that thou thereby clumsily contrived
Mayst smile at this. Thou shalt not choose but go.
Do not deny. Beshrew° his soul for me, curse
He started one poor heart of mine in thee.[4]
SEBASTIAN What relish° is in this? How runs the stream? task; meaning
Or° I am mad, or else this is a dream. either
Let fancy° still my sense in Lethe[5] steep. imagination
If it be thus to dream, still° let me sleep. ever
OLIVIA Nay, come, I prithee, would thou'dst be ruled by me.
SEBASTIAN Madam, I will.
OLIVIA O, say so, and so be. Exeunt

4.2

Enter MARIA [carrying a gown and false heard, and FESTE, the] clown

MARIA Nay, I prithee put on this gown and this beard, make him believe thou art Sir Topas[1] the curate. Do it quickly. I'll call Sir Toby the whilst.° Exit in the meantime
FESTE Well, I'll put it on, and I will dissemble[2] myself in't,

---

[3] Experienced in combat. Hunting hounds were said to be "fleshed" after being fed part of their first kill.

[4] By attacking Sebastian, Sir Toby frightened Olivia, who has exchanged hearts with Sebastian. "Started": an allusion to hunting, creating a pun on "hart/heart."

4.2 Location: Olivia's house, where Malvolio will be found (offstage) "in a dark room and bound" (3.4.132).

and I would I were the first that ever dissembled in such a gown.

[He disguises himself]

I am not tall enough to become the function well,[3] nor lean enough to be thought a good student,° but to be said° "an honest man and a good housekeeper"° goes as fairly as[4] to say "a careful man and a great scholar." The competitors° enter.

Enter [SIR] TOBY [and MARIA]

SIR TOBY Jove bless thee, Master Parson.

FESTE Bonos dies,[5] Sir Toby, for, as the old hermit of Prague,[6] that never saw pen and ink, very wittily° said to a niece of King Gorboduc,° "That that is, is." So I, being Master Parson, am Master Parson; for what is "that" but "that," and "is" but "is"?

SIR TOBY To him, Sir Topas.

FESTE What ho, I say, peace in this prison.

SIR TOBY The knave counterfeits well—a good knave.

MALVOLIO within

MALVOLIO Who calls there?

FESTE Sir Topas the curate, who comes to visit Malvolio the lunatic.

MALVOLIO Sir Topas, Sir Topas, good Sir Topas, go to my lady.

FESTE Out, hyperbolical fiend,[7] how vexest thou this man! Talkest thou nothing but of ladies?

SIR TOBY Well said, Master Parson.

MALVOLIO Sir Topas, never was man thus wronged. Good Sir Topas, do not think I am mad. They have laid me here in hideous darkness.

FESTE Fie, thou dishonest Satan—I call thee by the most modest° terms, for I am one of those gentle ones that will use the devil himself with courtesy. Sayst thou that house° is dark?

mildest

MALVOLIO As hell, Sir Topas.

FESTE Why, it hath bay windows transparent as barricadoes, and the clerestories[8] toward the south-north are as lustrous as ebony,[9] and yet complainest thou of obstruction?

MALVOLIO I am not mad, Sir Topas; I say to you this house is dark.

FESTE Madman, thou errest. I say there is no darkness but ignorance, in which thou art more puzzled than the Egyptians in their fog.[1]

[3] Grace the priestly office. "Tall": stout, rather than of great height.

[4] Sounds as well as.

[5] Good day (false Latin).

[6] Probably an invented authority.

[7] Feste treats Malvolio as a man possessed by vehement ("hyperbolical") evil spirits.

[8] Upper windows, usually in a church or great hall. "Barricadoes": barricades (subsequent paradoxes are equivalent to "as clear as mud").

[9] A dense and naturally dull black wood.

[1] One of the plagues of Egypt was a "black darkness" lasting for three days (Exodus 10.21—23).

MALVOLIO I say this house is as dark as ignorance, though ignorance were as dark as hell; and I say there was never man thus abused. I am no more mad than you are. Make the trial of it in any constant question.°

logical discussion

FESTE What is the opinion of Pythagoras[2] concerning wildfowl?

MALVOLIO That the soul of our grandam might haply° inhabit a bird.

FESTE What thinkest thou of his opinion?

MALVOLIO I think nobly of the soul, and no way approve his opinion.

FESTE Fare thee well. Remain thou still in darkness. Thou shalt hold th opinion of Pythagoras ere I will allow of thy wits,° and fear to kill a woodcock[3] lest thou dispossess the soul of thy grandam. Fare thee well.

certify your sanity

MALVOLIO Sir Topas, Sir Topas!

SIR TOBY My most exquisite Sir Topas.

FESTE Nay, I am for all waters.[4]

MARIA Thou mightst have done this without thy beard and gown, he sees thee not.

SIR TOBY [to FESTE] To him in thine own voice, and bring me word how thou findest him. I would we were well rid of this knavery. If he may be conveniently delivered, I would he were, for I am now so far in offense with my niece that I cannot pursue with any safety this sport to the upshot. [To MARIA] Come by and by to my chamber.

Exit [with MARIA]

FESTE [sings][5] "Hey Robin, jolly Robin,
Tell me how thy lady does."

MALVOLIO Fool!

FESTE "My lady is unkind, pardie."[6]

MALVOLIO Fool!

FESTE "Alas, why is she so?"

MALVOLIO Fool, I say!

FESTE "She loves another."
Who calls, ha?

MALVOLIO Good fool, as ever thou wilt deserve well at my hand, help me to a candle and pen, ink, and paper. As I am a gentleman, I will live to be thankful to thee for't.

FESTE Master Malvolio?

MALVOLIO Ay, good fool.

FESTE Alas, sir, how fell you besides° your five wits?[7]

out of

MALVOLIO Fool, there was never man so notoriously° abused. I am as well in my wits, fool, as thou art.

outrageously

[2] An ancient Greek philosopher who held that the same soul could successively inhabit different creatures.

[3] A traditionally stupid bird.

[4] I am able to turn my hand to anything.

[5] Feste's song, which makes Malvolio aware of his presence, is traditional. There is a version by Sir Thomas Wyatt.

[6] A corruption of the French pardieu, "by God."

[7] Usually regarded as common sense, fantasy, memory, judgment, and imagination.

FESTE But as well? Then you are mad indeed, if you be no better in your wits than a fool.

MALVOLIO They have here propertied me,[8] keep me in darkness, send ministers to me, asses, and do all they can to face me[9] out of my wits.

FESTE Advise you° what you say, the minister is here. be careful [As Sir Topas] Malvolio, Malvolio, thy wits the heavens restore. Endeavor thyself to sleep, and leave thy vain bibble-babble.

MALVOLIO Sir Topas.

FESTE [as Sir Topas] Maintain no words with him, good fellow. [As himself] Who I, sir? Not I, sir. God b'wi' you,° God be with you good Sir Topas. [As Sir Topas] Marry, amen. [As himself] I will, sir, I will.

MALVOLIO Fool, fool, fool, I say.

FESTE Alas, sir, be patient. What say you, sir? I am shent° scolded for speaking to you.

MALVOLIO Good fool, help me to some light and some paper. I tell thee I am as well in my wits as any man in Illyria.

FESTE Well-a-day° that you were, sir. alas

MALVOLIO By this hand, I am. Good fool, some ink, paper, and light, and convey what I will set down to my lady. It shall advantage thee more than ever the bearing of letter did.

FESTE I will help you to't. But tell me true, are you not mad indeed, or do you but counterfeit?

MALVOLIO Believe me, I am not, I tell thee true.

FESTE Nay, I'll ne'er believe a madman till I see his brains. I will fetch you light, and paper, and ink.

MALVOLIO Fool, I'll requite it in the highest degree. I prithee, be gone.

FESTE
I am gone, sir,
And anon, sir,
  I'll be with you again,
In a trice,
Like to the old Vice,[1]
  Your need to sustain,
Who with dagger of lath
In his rage and his wrath
  Cries "Aha," to the devil,
Like a mad lad,
"Pare thy nails, dad,
  Adieu, goodman[2] devil."

Enter SEBASTIAN

SEBASTIAN This is the air, that is the glorious sun.
This pearl she gave me, I do feel't and see't,
And though 'tis wonder that enwraps me thus,
Yet 'tis not madness. Where's Antonio then?
I could not find him at the Elephant,
Yet there he was,° and there I found this credit,° had been / report
That he did range the town to seek me out.
His counsel now might do me golden service,
For though my soul disputes well with my sense[1]
That this may be some error but no madness,
Yet doth this accident and flood of fortune
So far exceed all instance,° all discourse,° precedent / reasoning
That I am ready to distrust mine eyes
And wrangle with my reason that persuades me
To any other trust° but that I am mad, belief
Or else the lady's mad. Yet if 'twere so
She could not sway° her house, command her followers, rule
Take and give back affairs and their dispatch[2]
With such a smooth, discreet, and stable bearing
As I perceive she does. There's something in't
That is deceivable.° But here the lady comes. deceptive

Enter OLIVIA and PRIEST

OLIVIA Blame not this haste of mine. If you mean well
Now go with me, and with this holy man,
Into the chantry by.° There before him, nearby chapel
And underneath that consecrated roof,
Plight me the full assurance of your faith,[3]
That my most jealous and too doubtful soul
May live at peace. He shall conceal it
Whiles° you are willing it shall come to note, until
What° time we will our celebration keep at which
According to my birth.° What do you say? rank

SEBASTIAN I'll follow this good man, and go with you,
And having sworn truth, ever will be true.

OLIVIA Then lead the way, good father, and heavens so shine
That they may fairly note° this act of mine. Exeunt look favorably upon

Enter [FESTE, the] clown and FABIAN

FABIAN Now, as thou lovest me, let me see his letter.

FESTE Good Master Fabian, grant me another request.

FABIAN Anything.

FESTE DO not desire to see this letter.

FABIAN This is to give a dog, and in recompense desire my dog again.[1]

4.3 Location: Near Olivia's house.

[1] For though my reason and my sense both concur.

[2] Undertake business, and ensure that it is carried out.

[3] Enter into the solemn contract of betrothal.

5.1 Location: Before Olivia's house.

Enter Duke, VIOLA [as Cesario], CURIO, and lords

ORSINO Belong you to the Lady Olivia, friends?

FESTE Ay, sir, we are some of her trappings.° ornaments

ORSINO I know thee well. How dost thou, my good fellow?

FESTE Truly, sir, the better for my foes and the worse for my friends.

ORSINO Just the contrary- -the better for thy friends.

FESTE No, sir, the worse.

ORSINO How can that be?

FESTE Marry, sir, they praise me, and make an ass of me. Now my foes tell me plainly I am an ass, so that by my foes, sir, I profit in the knowledge of myself, and by my friends I am abused;° so that, conclusions to be as kisses, if your four negatives make your two affirmatives,[2] why then the worse for my friends and the better for my foes. deceived

ORSINO Why, this is excellent.

FESTE By my troth, sir, no, though it please you to be one of my friends.

ORSINO [giving money] Thou shalt not be the worse for me. There's gold.

FESTE But° that it would be double-dealing,[3] sir, I would you could make it another. except for the fact

ORSINO O, you give me ill counsel.

FESTE Put your grace in your pocket,[4] sir, for this once, and let your flesh and blood obey it.[5]

ORSINO Well, I will be so much a sinner to° be a double-dealer. [Giving money] There's another.

FESTE Primo, secundo, tertio[6] is a good play,° and the old saying is "The third pays for all."[7] The triplex,° sir, is a good tripping measure, or the bells of Saint Bennet,[8] sir, may put you in mind—"one, two, three." game triple time in music

ORSINO You can fool no more money out of me at this throw.° If you will let your lady know I am here to speak with her, and bring her along with you, it may awake my bounty° further. throw of the dice generosity

FESTE Marry, sir, lullaby to your bounty till I come again. I go, sir, but I would not have you to think that my desire of having is the sin of covetousness. But as you say, sir, let your bounty take a nap, I will awake it anon. Exit

Enter ANTONIO and OFFICERS

VIOLA Here comes the man, sir, that did rescue me.

ORSINO That face of his I do remember well,
Yet when I saw it last it was besmeared
As black as Vulcan[9] in the smoke of war.

requested a dog, and the donor, when granted a wish in return, asked for the dog back.

[2] As in grammar a double negative can make an affirmative (and therefore four negatives can make two affirmatives), so when a coy girl is asked for a kiss, her four refusals can be construed as "yes, yes."

[3] (1) A duplicity; (2) a double donation.

[4] Set aside (pocket up) your virtue; also (with a play on the customary form of address for a duke, "your grace"), reach into your pocket and grace me with another coin.

[5] Let your normal human instincts (as opposed to grace) follow the "ill counsel" (line 28).

[6] First, second, third (Latin): perhaps an allusion to a dice throw or a child's game.

[7] Third time lucky (proverbial).

[8] A London church, across the Thames from the Globe Theater, was known as St. Bennet Hithe.

[9] Blacksmith god of the Romans.

A baubling° vessel was he captain of, trifling
For shallow draft and bulk unprizable,[1]
With which such scatheful° grapple did he make destructive
With the most noble bottom° of our fleet ship
That very envy° and the tongue of loss° even enmity / the losers
Cried fame and honor on him. What's the matter?
FIRST OFFICER Orsino, this is that Antonio
That took the Phoenix and her freight from Candy,° Candia, capital of Crete
And this is he that did the Tiger board
When your young nephew Titus lost his leg.
Here in the streets, desperate of shame and state,[2]
In private brabble° did we apprehend him. brawl
VIOLA He did me kindness, sir, drew on my side,[3]
But in conclusion put strange speech upon° me. spoke strangely to
I know not what 'twas but distraction.° if not insanity
ORSINO [to ANTONIO] Notable° pirate, thou salt-water thief, notorious
What foolish boldness brought thee to their mercies
Whom thou in terms so bloody and so dear° dire
Hast made thine enemies?
ANTONIO Orsino, noble sir,
Be pleased that I shake off these names you give me.
Antonio never yet was thief or pirate,
Though, I confess, on base° and ground enough foundation
Orsino's enemy. A witchcraft drew me hither.
That most ingrateful boy there by your side
From the rude sea's enraged and foamy mouth
Did I redeem. A wreck past hope he was.
His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention° or restraint, reservation
All his in dedication. For his sake
Did I expose myself, pure° for his love, only
Into the danger of this adverse° town, hostile
Drew to defend him when he was beset,
Where being apprehended, his false cunning—
Not meaning to partake with me in danger—
Taught him to face me out of his acquaintance,[4]
And grew a twenty years' removed thing
While one would wink,[5] denied me mine own purse,
Which I had recommended° to his use
Not half an hour before.
VIOLA How can this be?
ORSINO When came he to this town?
ANTONIO Today, my lord, and for three months before,
No int'rim, not a minute's vacancy,° interval
Both day and night did we keep company.

Enter OLIVIA and attendants

ORSINO Here comes the Countess. Now heaven walks on earth.
But for thee, fellow—fellow, thy words are madness.

---

[1] Of no value because of its small size. "Draft": water displaced by a vessel.
[2] Recklessly oblivious of the danger to his honor and his position (as a free man and public enemy).
[3] Drew his sword in my defense.
[4] To brazenly deny my acquaintance.
[5] I.e., in the wink of an eye, pretended we had been estranged for twenty years.

Three months this youth hath tended upon me.
But more of that anon. Take him aside.
OLIVIA What would my lord, but that he may not have,[6]
Wherein Olivia may seem serviceable?
Cesario, you do not keep promise with me.
VIOLA Madam—
ORSINO Gracious Olivia—
OLIVIA What do you say, Cesario? Good my lord—
VIOLA My lord would speak, my duty hushes me.
OLIVIA If it be aught° to the old tune, my lord, anything
It is as fat and fulsome° to mine ear gross and offensive
As howling after music.
ORSINO Still so cruel?
OLIVIA Still so constant, lord.
ORSINO What, to perverseness? You uncivil lady,
To whose ingrate and unauspicious° altars unfavorable
My soul the faithfull'st off'rings hath breathed out
That e'er devotion tendered—what shall I do?
OLIVIA Even what it please my lord that shall become° him. be fitting for
ORSINO Why should I not, had I the heart to do it,
Like to th' Egyptian thief, at point of death
Kill what I love[7]—a savage jealousy
That sometime savors nobly.° But hear me this: of nobility
Since you to non-regardance° cast my faith, oblivion
And that I partly know the instrument
That screws° me from my true place in your favor, wrenches
Live you the marble-breasted tyrant still.
But this your minion,° whom I know you love, darling
And whom, by heaven I swear, I tender° dearly, regard
Him will I tear out of that cruel eye
Where he sits crowned in his master's spite.[8]
[To VIOLA] Come, boy, with me. My thoughts are ripe in mischief.
I'll sacrifice the lamb that I do love
To spite a raven's heart within a dove.
VIOLA And I most jocund,° apt,° and willingly cheerfully / ready
To do you rest a thousand deaths would die.
OLIVIA Where goes Cesario?
VIOLA After him I love
More than I love these eyes, more than my life,
More by all mores[9] than e'er I shall love wife.
If I do feign, you witnesses above,
Punish my life for tainting of my love.
OLIVIA Ay me detested, how am I beguiled!° deceived
VIOLA Who does beguile you? Who does do you wrong?
OLIVIA Hast thou forgot thyself? Is it so long?
Call forth the holy father. [Exit an attendant]
ORSINO [to VIOLA] Come, away.

[6] Except that which he may not have (my love).
[7] In Heliodorus's Ethiopica, a Greek prose romance translated into English in 1569 and popular in Shakespeare's day, the Egyptian robber chief Thyamis tries to kill his captive Chariclea, whom he loves, when he is in danger from a rival band.
[8] To the mortification of his master.
[9] More beyond all comparison.

OLIVIA Whither, my lord? Cesario, husband, stay.
ORSINO Husband?
OLIVIA Ay, husband. Can he that deny?
ORSINO [to VIOLA] Her husband, sirrah?[1]
VIOLA No, my lord, not I.
OLIVIA Alas, it is the baseness of thy fear
That makes thee strangle thy propriety.[2]
Fear not, Cesario, take thy fortunes up,
Be that thou know'st thou art, and then thou art
As great as that° thou fear'st. him whom

Enter PRIEST

O welcome, father.
Father, I charge thee by thy reverence
Here to unfold—though lately we intended
To keep in darkness what occasion° now necessity
Reveals before 'tis ripe—-what thou dost know
Hath newly passed between this youth and me.
PRIEST A contract of eternal bond of love,
Confirmed by mutual joinder° of your hands, joining
Attested by the holy close° of lips, meeting
Strengthened by interchangement of your rings,
And all the ceremony of this compact
Sealed in my function,[3] by my testimony;
Since when, my watch hath told me, toward my grave
I have traveled but two hours.
ORSINO [to VIOLA] O thou dissembling cub, what wilt thou be
When time hath sowed a grizzle on thy case?[4]
Or will not else° thy craft° so quickly grow otherwise / craftiness
That thine own trip shall be thine overthrow?[5]
Farewell, and take her, but direct thy feet
Where thou and I henceforth may never meet.
VIOLA My lord, I do protest.
OLIVIA O, do not swear!
Hold little° faith, though thou hast too much fear. preserve some

Enter SIR ANDREW

SIR ANDREW For the love of God, a surgeon—send one presently° to Sir Toby. immediately

OLIVIA What's the matter?

SIR ANDREW He's broke° my head across, and has given Sir Toby a bloody coxcomb,[6] too. For the love of God, your help! I had rather than forty pound I were at home. cut

OLIVIA Who has done this, Sir Andrew?

SIR ANDREW The Count's gentleman, one Cesario. We took him for a coward, but he's the very devil incardinate.[7]

---

[1] Contemptuous form of address to an inferior.
[2] That makes you deny your identity (as my husband).
[3] Ratified by priestly authority.
[4] A gray hair ("grizzle") on your hide (sustaining the metaphor of "cub").
[5] That your attempt to trip someone else will be the cause of your downfall.
[6] Head; also, a fool's cap, which resembles the crest of a cock.
[7] Sir Andrew's blunder for "incarnate" (in the flesh).

ORSINO My gentleman, Cesario?
SIR ANDREW 'Od's lifelings,° here he is. [To VIOLA] YOU by God's little lives broke my head for nothing, and that that I did I was set on to do't by Sir Toby.
VIOLA Why do you speak to me? I never hurt you.
You drew your sword upon me without cause,
But I bespake you fair,[8] and hurt you not.

Enter [SIR] TOBY and [FESTE, the] clown

SIR ANDREW If a bloody coxcomb be a hurt you have hurt me. I think you set nothing by° a bloody coxcomb. Here think nothing of comes Sir Toby, halting.° You shall hear more; but if° he limping / if only had not been in drink he would have tickled° you other- chastised
gates° than he did. in other ways
ORSINO [to SIR TOBY] How now, gentleman? How is't with you?
SIR TOBY That's all one,° he's hurt me, and there's th'end
on't.
[To FESTE] Sot,° didst see Dick Surgeon, sot? fool; drunkard
FESTE O, he's drunk, Sir Toby, an hour agone. His eyes were set[9] at eight i'th' morning.
SIR TOBY Then he's a rogue, and a passy-measures pavan.[1]
I hate a drunken rogue.
OLIVIA Away with him! Who hath made this havoc with them?
SIR ANDREW I'll help you, Sir Toby, because we'll be dressed[2] together.
SIR TOBY Will you help—an ass-head, and a coxcomb,° and fool
a knave; a thin-faced knave, a gull?° dupe
OLIVIA Get him to bed, and let his hurt be looked to.

[Exeunt SIR TOBY, SIR ANDREW, FESTE, and FABIAN]
Enter SEBASTIAN

SEBASTIAN [to OLIVIA] I am sorry, madam, I have hurt your kinsman,
But had it been the brother of my blood
I must have done no less with wit and safety.[3]
You throw a strange regard upon me,° and by that regard me strangely
I do perceive it hath offended you.
Pardon me, sweet one, even for the vows
We made each other but so late ago.
ORSINO One face, one voice, one habit, and two persons,
A natural perspective,[4] that is and is not.
SEBASTIAN Antonio! O, my dear Antonio,
How have the hours racked and tortured me
Since I have lost thee!
ANTONIO Sebastian are you?
SEBASTIAN Fear'st thou° that, Antonio? do you doubt

---

[8] But I spoke courteously to you.
[9] Closed (as the sun sets).
[1] A variety of the slow dance known as "pavane" (from the Italian passemezzo pavana). Sir Toby may think its swaying movements suggest drunkenness.
[2] We'll have our wounds dressed.
[3] With any sense of my welfare.
[4] An optical illusion produced by nature (rather than by a mirror).

ANTONIO How have you made division of yourself?
An apple cleft in two is not more twin
Than these two creatures. Which is Sebastian?
OLIVIA Most wonderful!° full of wonder
SEBASTIAN [seeing VIOLA] Do I stand there? I never had a brother,
Nor can there be that deity° in my nature divine power
Of here and everywhere.° I had a sister, of omnipresence
Whom the blind waves and surges have devoured.
Of charity,° what kin are you to me? please
What countryman? What name? What parentage?
VIOLA Of Messaline. Sebastian was my father.
Such a Sebastian was my brother, too.
So went he suited° to his watery tomb. in appearance; clad
If spirits can assume both form and suit
You come to fright us.
SEBASTIAN A spirit I am indeed,
But am in that dimension grossly clad
Which from the womb I did participate.[5]
Were you a woman, as the rest goes even,° the rest suggests
I should my tears let fall upon your cheek
And say "Thrice welcome, drowned Viola."
VIOLA My father had a mole upon his brow.
SEBASTIAN And so had mine.
VIOLA And died that day when Viola from her birth
Had numbered thirteen years.
SEBASTIAN O, that record is lively[6] in my soul.
He finished indeed his mortal act
That day that made my sister thirteen years.
VIOLA If nothing lets° to make us happy both hinders
But this my masculine usurped attire,
Do not embrace me till each circumstance
Of place, time, fortune do cohere and jump° agree
That I am Viola, which to confirm
I'll bring you to a captain in this town
Where lie my maiden weeds,° by whose gentle help clothes
I was preserved to serve this noble count.
All the occurrence of my fortune since
Hath been between this lady and this lord.
SEBASTIAN [to OLIVIA] SO comes it, lady, you have been mistook.
But nature to her bias drew in that.[7]
You would have been contracted° to a maid, betrothed
Nor are you therein, by my life, deceived.
You are betrothed both to a maid and man.[8]
ORSINO [to OLIVIA] Be not amazed. Right noble is his blood.
If this be so, as yet the glass seems true,[9]
I shall have share in this most happy wreck.

---

[5] I.e., I am clad, like all mortals, in the flesh in which I was born.
[6] The memory of that is vivid.
[7] But nature followed her inclination. (The image is from the game of bowls, which sometimes used a ball with an off-center weight that caused it to curve away from a straight course.)
[8] I.e., a man who is a virgin.
[9] The "natural perspective" (line 214) continues to seem real.

[To VIOLA] Boy, thou hast said to me a thousand times
Thou never shouldst love woman like to me.
VIOLA And all those sayings will I overswear,[0] swear again
And all those swearings keep as true in soul
As doth that orbed continent[1] the fire
That severs day from night.
ORSINO Give me thy hand,
And let me see thee in thy woman's weeds.
VIOLA The captain that did bring me first on shore
Hath my maid's garments. He upon some action[0] legal charge
Is now in durance,[0] at Malvolio's suit, prison
A gentleman and follower of my lady's.
OLIVIA He shall enlarge[0] him. Fetch Malvolio hither— release
And yet, alas, now I remember me,
They say, poor gentleman, he's much distraught.[0] crazed

Enter [FESTE, the] clown with a letter, and FABIAN

A most extracting[0] frenzy of mine own distracting
From my remembrance clearly banished his.
How does he, sirrah?

FESTE Truly, madam, he holds Beelzebub at the stave's end[2] as well as a man in his case may do. He's here writ a letter to you. I should have given't you today morning. But as a madman's epistles are no gospels,[3] so it skills[0] not much when they are delivered. matters

OLIVIA Open't and read it.

FESTE Look then to be well edified when the fool delivers[0] the madman. [Reads] "By the Lord, madam"— speaks the words of

OLIVIA How now, art thou mad?

FESTE No, madam, I do but read madness. An your ladyship will have it as it ought to be you must allow vox.[4]

OLIVIA Prithee, read i'thy right wits.

FESTE So I do, madonna, but to read his right wits[5] is to read thus. Therefore perpend,[0] my princess, and give ear. pay attention

OLIVIA [to FABIAN] Read it you, sirrah.

[FESTE gives the letter to FABIAN]

FABIAN (READS) "By the Lord, madam, you wrong me, and the world shall know it. Though you have put me into darkness and given your drunken cousin rule over me, yet have I the benefit of my senses as well as your ladyship. I have your own letter that induced me to the semblance I put on, with the which I doubt not but to do myself much right or you much shame. Think of me as you please. I leave my duty a little unthought of, and speak out of my injury.[6]

[3] Gospel truths. "Epistles": letters (playing on the sense of apostolic accounts of Christ in the New Testament).

[4] The appropriate voice (Latin).

[5] To accurately represent his mental state.

[6] I neglect the formality I owe you as your servant and speak as an injured person.

The madly-used Malvolio.'
OLIVIA Did he write this?
FESTE Ay, madam.
ORSINO This savors not much of distraction.° insanity
OLIVIA See him delivered,° Fabian, bring him hither. released
My lord, so please you—these things further thought on—
To think me as well a sister as a wife,[7]
One day shall crown th'alliance[8] on't, so please you,
Here at my house and at my proper cost.° own expense
ORSINO Madam, I am most apt° t'embrace your offer.
[To VIOLA*]* Your master quits° you, and for your service done him releases
So much against the mettle° of your sex, disposition
So far beneath your soft and tender breeding,
And since you called me master for so long,
Here is my hand. You shall from this time be
Your master's mistress.
OLIVIA [to VIOLA*]*
A sister, you are she.
Enter MALVOLIO
ORSINO Is this the madman?
OLIVIA Ay, my lord, this same.
How now, Malvolio?
MALVOLIO Madam, you have done me wrong,
Notorious wrong.
OLIVIA Have I, Malvolio? No.
MALVOLIO [showing a letter] Lady, you have. Pray you peruse that letter.
You must not now deny it is your hand.° handwriting
Write from° it if you can, in hand or phrase, differently from
Or say 'tis not your seal, not your invention.° composition
You can say none of this. Well, grant it then,
And tell me in the modesty of honor[9]
Why you have given me such clear lights° of favor, signs
Bade me come smiling and cross-gartered to you,
To put on yellow stockings, and to frown
Upon Sir Toby and the lighter° people, lesser
And acting° this in an obedient hope, upon doing
Why have you suffered° me to be imprisoned, allowed
Kept in a dark house, visited by the priest,
And made the most notorious geck° and gull fool
That e'er invention° played on? Tell me why? trickery
OLIVIA Alas, Malvolio, this is not my writing,
Though I confess much like the character,° handwriting
But out of question,'tis Maria's hand.
And now I do bethink me, it was she
First told me thou wast mad; then cam'st° in smiling, you came

Upon thee in the letter. Prithee be content;
This practice hath most shrewdly passed[1] upon thee,
But when we know the grounds and authors of it
Thou shalt be both the plaintiff and the judge
Of thine own cause.

FABIAN Good madam, hear me speak,
And let no quarrel nor no brawl to come
Taint the condition of this present hour,
Which I have wondered at. In hope it shall not,
Most freely I confess myself and Toby
Set this device against Malvolio here
Upon° some stubborn and uncourteous parts° because / behavior
We had conceived against him.[2] Maria writ
The letter, at Sir Toby's great importance,° importunity, insistence
In recompense whereof he hath married her.

"By the Lord, fool, I am not mad"—but do you remember, "Madam, why laugh you at such a barren rascal, an you smile not, he's gagged"—and thus the whirligig° spinning top of time brings in his revenges.

MALVOLIO I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you.

OLIVIA He hath been most notoriously abused.

ORSINO Pursue him, and entreat him to a peace.
He hath not told us of the captain yet.
[Exit one or more]
When that is known, and golden time convents,° summons; is convenient
A solemn combination shall be made
Of our dear souls. Meantime, sweet sister,
We will not part from hence.° Cesario, come— (Olivia's house)
For so you shall be while you are a man;
But when in other habits° you are seen, attire
Orsino's mistress, and his fancy's° queen. love's; imagination's
Exeunt [all but FESTE*]*

FESTE (sings) When that I was and a little tiny boy,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
A foolish thing was but a toy,
For the rain it raineth every day.

[1] This trick has most mischievously played.

[2] To which we took exception.

But when I came to man's estate,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
'Gainst knaves and thieves men shut their gate,
For the rain it raineth every day.

But when I came, alas, to wive,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
By swaggering[0] could I never thrive,
For the rain it raineth every day.

But when I came unto my beds,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
With tosspots[0] still had drunken heads,
For the rain it raineth every day.

A great while ago the world begun,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
But that's all one, our play is done,
And we'll strive to please you every day.

King Lear The story of King Lear and his three daughters had often been told, in chronicles, poems, and sermons as well as on stage, when Shakespeare undertook to make it the subject of a tragedy. The play, performed at court in December 1605, was probably written and first performed somewhat earlier, though not before 1603, since it contains allusions to a florid piece of anti-Catholic propaganda published that year, Samuel Harsnett's Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures. Thus scholars generally assign Shakespeare's composition of King Lear to 1604—05, shortly after Othello (ca. 1603—04) and before Macbeth (ca. 1606): an astounding succession of tragic masterpieces.

When King Lear was first performed it may have struck contemporaries as strangely timely in the wake of a lawsuit that had occurred in late 1603. The two elder daughters of a doddering gentleman named Sir Brian Annesley attempted to get him legally certified as insane, thereby enabling themselves to take over his estate, while his youngest daughter vehemently protested on her father's behalf. The youngest daughter's name happened to be Cordell, a name uncannily close to that of Lear's youngest daughter, Cordelia, who tries to save her father from the malevolent designs of her older sisters.

The Annesley case directs our own attention to the ordinary family tensions and fears around which King Lear, for all its wildness, violence, and strangeness, is constructed. Though the Lear story has the mythic quality of a folktale (specifically, it resembles both the tale of Cinderella and the tale of a daughter who falls into disfavor for telling her father she loves him as much as salt), it was recounted in Shakespeare's time both as a piece of authentic British history from the very ancient past (ca. 800 B.C.E.) and as a warning to contemporary fathers not to put too much trust in the flattery of their children. In some versions of the story, including Shakespeare's, the warning centers on a decision to retire.

Retirement has come to seem a routine event, but in the patriarchal culture of Tudor and Stuart England, where the old demanded the public deference of the young, it was generally shunned. When through illness or extreme old age, it became unavoidable, retirement put a severe strain on the politics and psychology of deference by driving a wedge between status—what Lear at society's pinnacle calls "The name, and all the additions to a king" (1.1.137)—and power. In both the state and the family, the strain could be somewhat eased by transferring power to the eldest legitimate male successor, but as the families of both the legendary Lear and the real Brian Annesley show, such a successor did not always exist. In the absence of a male heir, the aged Lear, determined to "shake all cares and business" from himself and confer them on "younger strengths," attempts to divide his kingdom among his daughters so that, "as he puts it, "future strife / May be prevented now" (1.1.38—44). But this attempt, centered on a public love test, is a disastrous failure, since it leads him to banish the one child who truly loves him.

Shakespeare contrives to show that the problem with which his characters are grappling does not simply result from the absence of a son and heir. In his most brilliant and complex use of a double plot, he intertwines the story of Lear and his three daughters with the story of Gloucester and his two sons, a story he adapted from an episode in Philip Sidney's prose romance, Arcadia. Gloucester has a legitimate heir, his elder son, Edgar, as well as an illegitimate son, Edmund, and in this family the tragic conflict originates not in an unusual manner of transferring property from one generation to another but rather in the reverse: Edmund seethes with murderous resentment at the disadvantage entirely customary for someone in his position, both as a younger son and as what was called a "base" or "natural" child.

But why does Lear, who has, as the play begins, already drawn up the map equitably dividing the kingdom, stage the love test? In Shakespeare's principal source, an anonymous play called The True Chronicle History of King Leir (published in 1605 but dating from 1594 or earlier), there is a gratifyingly clear answer. Leir's strong-willed daughter Cordelia has vowed that she will marry only a man whom she herself loves; Leir wishes her to marry the man he chooses for his own dynastic purposes. He stages the love test, anticipating that in competing with her sisters, Cordelia will declare that she loves her father best, at which point Leir will demand that she prove her love by marrying the suitor of his choice. The stratagem backfires, but its purpose is clear.

By stripping his character of a comparable motive, Shakespeare makes Lear's act seem stranger, at once more arbitrary and more rooted in deep psychological needs. His Lear is a man who has determined to retire from power but who cannot endure dependence. Unwilling to lose his identity as an absolute authority both in the state and in the family, he arranges a public ritual—"Which of you shall we say doth love us most?" (1.1.50)—whose aim seems to be to allay his own anxiety by arousing it in his children. But Cordelia refuses to perform: "What shall Cordelia speak? Love, and be silent" (1.1.61). When she says "Nothing," a word that echoes darkly throughout the play, Lear hears what he most dreads: emptiness, loss of respect, the extinction of identity. And when, under further interrogation, she declares that she loves her father "according to my bond" (1.1.93), Lear understands these words too to be the equivalent of "nothing."

As Cordelia's subsequent actions demonstrate, his youngest daughter's bond is in reality a sustaining, generous love, but it is a love that ultimately leads to her death. Here Shakespeare makes an even more startling departure not only from The True Chronicle History of King Leir but from all his known sources. The earliest of these, the account in Geoffrey of Monmouth's twelfth-century Historia Regum Britanniae, sets the pattern repeated in John Higgins's A Mirror for Magistrates (1574 ed.), William Warner's Albion's England (1586), Baphael Holinshed's Chronicles (1587), and Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590: 2.10.27—32): the aged Lear is overthrown by his wicked daughters and their husbands, but he is restored to the throne by the army of his good daughter's husband, the king of France. The story then is one of loss and restoration: Lear resumes his reign, and then "made ripe for death" by old age, as Spenser puts it, he dies and is succeeded by Cordelia. The conclusion is not unequivocally happy: in all of the known chronicles, Cordelia rules worthily for several years and then, after being deposed and imprisoned by her nephews, in despair commits suicide. But Shakespeare's ending is unprecedented in its tragic devastation. When in Act 5 Lear suddenly enters with the lifeless body of Cordelia in his arms, the original audience, secure in the expectation of a very different resolution, must have been doubly shocked, a shock cruelly reinforced when the signs that she might be reviving—"This feather stirs; she lives!" (5.3.265)—all prove false. Lear apparently dies in the grip of the illusion that he detects some breath on his daughter's lips, but we know that Cordelia will, as he says a moment earlier, "come no more, / Never, never, never, never, never!" (5.3.307—08).

Those five reiterated words, the bleakest pentameter line Shakespeare ever wrote, are the climax of an extraordinary poetics of despair that is set in motion when Lear disinherits Cordelia and when Gloucester credits Edmund's lies about Edgar. King Lear has seemed to many modern readers and audiences the greatest of Shakespeare's tragedies precisely because of its anguished look into the heart of darkness, but its vision of suffering and evil has not always commanded unequivocal admiration. In the eighteenth century Samuel Johnson wrote that "I was many years ago so shocked by Cordelia's death that I know not whether I ever endured to read again the last scenes of the play till I undertook to revise them as an editor." Johnson's contemporaries preferred a revision of Shakespeare's tragedy undertaken in 1681 by Nahum Tate. Finding the play, he writes, "a Heap of Jewels, unstrung, and unpolished," Tate proceeded to restring them in order to save Cordelia's life and to produce the unambiguous triumph of the forces of good, culminating in the joyous marriage of Cordelia and Edgar.

Only in the nineteenth century was Shakespeare's deeply pessimistic ending—the old generation dead or dying, the survivors shaken to the core, the ruling families all broken with no impending marriage to promise renewal—generally restored to theatrical performance and the tragedy's immense power fully acknowledged. Even passionate admirers of King Lear, however, continued to express deep uneasiness, questioning whether the tragedy was suitable for the stage. Charles Lamb, for example, concluded flatly that "Lear is essentially impossible to be represented on stage." "To see Lear acted," Lamb wrote, "to see an old man tottering about the stage with a walking stick, turned out of doors by his daughters in a rainy night, has nothing in it but what is painful and disgusting." In such a view, King Lear could only be staged successfully in the imagination, where, freed from the limits of the human body, it could assume its true, stupendous proportions and enable the reader to grasp its ultimate spiritual meaning.

A succession of brilliant stage performances and, more recently, films has not only belied the view that King Lear is unactable but also underscored the crucial importance in the play of the body. If Shakespeare explores the extremes of the mind's anguish and the soul's devotion, he never forgets that his characters have bodies as well, bodies that have needs, cravings, and terrible vulnerabilities. When in this tragedy characters fall from high station, they plunge unprotected into a world of violent storms, murderous cruelty, and physical horror. The old king wanders raging on the heath, through a wild night of thunder and rain. Disguised as Poor Tom, a mad beggar possessed by demons, Gloucester's son Edgar enacts a life of utmost degradation. Gloucester's fate is even more terrible: betrayed by his son Edmund, he is seized in his own house by Lear's reptilian daughter Regan and her husband Cornwall, tied to a chair, brutally interrogated, blinded, and then thrust bleeding out of doors.

The body in King Lear is a site not only of abject misery, nausea, and pain but also of care and a nascent moral awareness. In the midst of his mad ravings, Lear turns to the shivering Fool and asks, "Art cold?" (3.2.68). The question anticipates his recognition a few moments later that there is more suffering in the world than his own. Such signs of goodness and empathy, as simple as offering one's hand to someone who is frightened, do not outweigh the harshness of the physical world of the play, let alone cancel out the vicious cruelty of certain of its inhabitants, but they do qualify its moral bleakness. For a time evil seems to flourish unchecked in the world of the play, but the wicked do not ultimately triumph, and, in the midst of their anguish, humiliation, and pain, Lear and Gloucester achieve flashes of insight.

The tragedy is not only that the intervals of moral resolution, mental lucidity, and spiritual calm are so brief, continually giving way to feverish grief and rage, but also that the modest human understandings, moving in their simplicity, cost such an enormous amount of pain. Edgar saves his father from despair but also in some sense breaks his father's heart. Cordelia's steadfast honesty, her refusal to flatter the father she loves, is admirable but has disastrous consequences, and her attempt to save Lear leads only to her own death. For a sublime moment, Lear actually sees his daughter, understands her separateness, acknowledges her existence:

> Do not laugh at me;
> For, as I am a man, I think this lady
> To be my child Cordelia. (4.7.69-71)

But it has taken the destruction of virtually his whole world to reach this recognition.

An apocalyptic dream of last judgment and redemption hovers over the entire tragedy, but it is a dream forever deferred. At the sight of the howling Lear with the dead Cordelia in his arms, the bystanders can only ask a succession of stunned questions. Lear's own question seems the most terrible and the most important:

> Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life,
> And thou no breath at all? (5.3.306-07)

It is a sign of King Lear's astonishing freedom from orthodoxy that it refuses to offer any of the conventional answers to this question, answers that serve largely to conceal or deflect the mourner's anguish.

King Lear first appeared in print in a quarto published in 1608 entitled The History of King Lear; a substantially different text, entitled The Tragedy of King Lear and grouped with the other tragedies, was printed in the 1623 Folio. From the eighteenth century, when the difference between the two texts was first noted, editors, assuming that they were imperfect versions of the identical play, customarily conflated them, blending together the approximately one hundred folio lines not printed in the quarto with the approximately three hundred quarto lines not printed in the folio and selecting as best they could among the hundreds of particular alternative readings. But there is a growing scholarly consensus that the 1608 text of Lear represents the play as Shakespeare first wrote it and that the 1623 text represents a substantial revision. In order to make available as much of both texts as possible within the space constraints of this anthology, we here present a conflated version. We add, on facing pages, a sample in which readers can compare in detail The History of King Lear and The Tragedy of King Lear. Beaders who wish to pursue this comparison further may consult the Norton Shakespeare, where the two texts are printed in their entirety on facing pages.

Enter KENT, GLOUCESTER,[1] and EDMUND

KENT I thought the king had more affected° the Duke of Albany° than Cornwall.

GLOUCESTER It did always seem so to us; but now, in the division of the kingdom, it appears not° which of the dukes he values most; for equalities° are so weighed,° that curiosity in neither can make choice of either's moiety.[2]

KENT Is not this your son, my lord?

GLOUCESTER His breeding,° sir, hath been at my charge.[3] I have so often blushed to acknowledge him, that now I am brazed° to it.

KENT I cannot conceive° you.

GLOUCESTER Sir, this young fellow's mother could;[4] whereupon she grew round-wombed, and had, indeed, sir, a son for her cradle ere she had a husband for her bed. Do you smell a fault?[5]

KENT I cannot wish the fault undone, the issue° of it being so proper.°

GLOUCESTER But I have, sir, a son by order of law,° some year elder than this, who yet is no dearer in my account.°

1.1 Location: King Lear's court.

[1] Pronounced "Gloster."

[2] That careful scrutiny ("curiosity") of both parts cannot determine which portion ("moiety") is preferable.

[3] My responsibility; at my cost.

[4] Could conceive; punning on biological conception.

[5] (1) Sin, wrongdoing; (2) female genitals.

Though this knave^0 came something saucily[6] into the world before he was sent for, yet was his mother fair; there was good sport at his making, and the whoreson^0 must be acknowledged. Do you know this noble gentleman, Edmund? scamp, fellow rogue; bastard

EDMUND No, my lord.

GLOUCESTER My lord of Kent. Remember him hereafter as my honorable friend.

EDMUND My services to your lordship.

KENT I must love you, and sue° to know you better. ask

EDMUND Sir, I shall study deserving.^{0} shall learn to deserve

GLOUCESTER He hath been out^0 nine years, and away he shall again. (Sound a sennet^0) The king is coming. away, abroad fanfare of trumpets

Enter one bearing a coronet, then King LEAR, CORNWALL, ALBANY, GONERIL, REGAN, CORDELIA, and attendants

LEAR Attend the lords of France and Burgundy, Gloucester.

GLOUCESTER I shall, my liege.^{0} feudal superior

Exeunt LOUCESTER and EDMUND

LEAR Meantime we^0 shall express our darker^0 purpose. ("royal" we) / more secret
Give me the map there. Know^0 that we have divided be informed
In three our kingdom; and 'tis our fast^0 intent steadfast
To shake all cares and business from our age,
Conferring them on younger strengths, while we Unburthened crawl toward death. Our son^0 of Cornwall, son-in-law
And you, our no less loving son of Albany,
We have this hour a constant will to publish[7]
Our daughters' several dowers,^{0} that future strife individual dowries
May be prevented now. The princes, France and Burgundy,
Great rivals in our youngest daughter's love,
Long in our court have made their amorous sojourn,
And here are to be answered. Tell me, my daughters—
Since now we will divest us, both of rule,
Interest^0 of territory, cares of state— legal title
Which of you shall we say doth love us most?
That^0 we our largest bounty^0 may extend so that / generosity
Where nature doth with merit challenge.[8] Goneril,
Our eldest-born, speak first.

GONERIL Sir, I love you more than words can wield^0 the matter; convey
Dearer than eye-sight, space,^{0} and liberty; freedom of movement
Beyond what can be valued, rich or rare;
No less than life, with grace, health, beauty, honor;
As much as child e'er loved, or father found;
A love that makes breath^0 poor, and speech unable;
Beyond all manner of so much^0 I love you. beyond all comparison

CORDELIA (aside) What shall Cordelia speak? Love, and be silent.

---

[6] Somewhat rudely; somewhat shamefully.

[7] A fixed determination to announce publicly.

[8] I.e., to the one whose natural love and good deeds mutually enhance each other.

LEAR Of all these bounds, even from this line to this,
With shadowy forests and with champains riched,° plains enriched
With plenteous rivers and wide-skirted meads,° broad meadows
We make thee lady:° to thine and Albany's issue° mistress / children, heirs
Be this perpetual. What says our second daughter,
Our dearest Regan, wife to Cornwall? Speak.
REGAN Sir, I am made
Of the self-same metal° that my sister is, spirit; substance
And prize me at her worth.° In my true heart believe myself her equal
I find she names my very deed of love;
Only she comes too short, that° I profess in that
Myself an enemy to all other joys,
Which the most precious square of sense possesses,[9]
And find I am alone felicitate° am only made happy
In your dear highness' love.
CORDELIA (aside) Then poor Cordelia!
And yet not so; since, I am sure, my love's
More ponderous° than my tongue. weighty
LEAR To thee and thine, hereditary ever
Remain this ample third of our fair kingdom;
No less in space, validity,° and pleasure, value
Than that conferred on Goneril. Now, our joy,
Although our last and least;° to whose young love youngest; smallest
The vines of France and milk of Burgundy
Strive to be interessed,° what can you say to draw given access to A third more opulent than your sisters? Speak.
CORDELIA Nothing, my lord.
LEAR Nothing?
CORDELIA Nothing.
LEAR Nothing will come of nothing, speak again.
CORDELIA Unhappy that I am, I cannot heave
My heart into my mouth. I love your majesty
According to my bond;° nor more nor less. filial duty
LEAR How, how, Cordelia! mend your speech a little,
Lest it may mar your fortunes.
CORDELIA Good my lord,
You have begot me, bred° me, loved me; I raised
Return those duties back as are right fit,
Obey you, love you, and most honor you.
Why have my sisters husbands, if they say
They love you all?° Haply,° when I shall wed, exclusively / perhaps
That lord whose hand must take my plight° shall carry marriage vow; condition
Half my love with him, half my care and duty.
Sure, I shall never marry like my sisters,
To love my father all.
LEAR But goes thy heart with this?
CORDELIA Ay, good my lord.
LEAR So young, and so untender?
CORDELIA So young, my lord, and true.° honest; faithful
LEAR Let it be so! Thy truth, then, be thy dower!

[9] That the body can enjoy.

For, by the sacred radiance of the sun,
The mysteries of Hecate,[1] and the night;
By all the operation of the orbs
From whom we do exist and cease to be;[2]
Here I disclaim all my paternal care,
Propinquity° and property of blood,° closeness / kinship
And as a stranger to my heart and me
Hold thee, from this,° for ever. The barbarous Scythian,[3] this time
Or he that makes his generation messes[4]
To gorge his appetite, shall to my bosom
Be as well neighbored, pitied, and relieved,° assisted in trouble
As thou my sometime° daughter. former
KENT Good my liege—
LEAR Peace, Kent!
Come not between the dragon and his wrath.
I loved her most, and thought to set my rest[5]
On her kind nursery.° Hence, and avoid my sight! care
So be my grave my peace,[6] as here I give
Her father's heart from her! Call France; who stirs?[7]
Call Burgundy, Cornwall and Albany,
With my two daughters' dowers digest° this third: incorporate
Let pride, which she calls plainness,° marry her. directness
I do invest you jointly with my power,
Pre-eminence, and all the large effects° outward shows, trappings
That troop with° majesty. Ourself, by monthly course, accompany
With reservation° of an hundred knights, legal right to retain
By you to be sustained, shall our abode
Make with you by due turns. Only we still retain
The name, and all the additions° to a king; prerogatives
The sway,° revenue, execution of the rest, power
Beloved sons, be yours; which to confirm,
This coronet[8] part betwixt you.
KENT Royal Lear,
Whom I have ever honored as my king,
Loved as my father, as my master followed,
As my great patron thought on in my prayers—
LEAR The bow is bent and drawn, make from° the shaft. get clear of KENT Let it fall° rather, though the fork° invade strike home / arrowhead
The region of my heart: be Kent unmannerly,
When Lear is mad. What wilt thou do, old man?
Think'st thou that duty shall have dread to speak,
When power to flattery bows? To plainness° honor's bound, plain speaking

9. I'll stake my life on my opinion.

Flourish.° Re-enter GLOUCESTER, with FRANCE, BURGUNDY, and attendants — fanfare of trumpets
GLOUCESTER Here's France and Burgundy, my noble lord.
LEAR My lord of Burgundy,
We first address towards you, who with this king
Hath rivaled for our daughter. What, in the least,
Will you require in present dower with her,
Or cease your quest of love?
BURGUNDY Most royal majesty,
I crave no more than what your highness offered,
Nor will you tender° less. — offer
LEAR Right noble Burgundy,
When she was dear to us, we did hold her so;
But now her price is fallen. Sir, there she stands;
If aught° within that little seeming substance,[5] — anything
Or all of it, with our displeasure pieced,° — joined,
And nothing more, may fitly like° your grace, — please
She's there, and she is yours.
BURGUNDY I know no answer.
LEAR Will you, with those infirmities she owes,° — owns
Unfriended, new-adopted to our hate,
Dowered with our curse, and strangered° with our oath, — estranged
Take her, or leave her?
BURGUNDY Pardon me, royal sir;
Election makes not up on such conditions.[6]
LEAR Then leave her, sir; for, by the power that made me,
I tell you° all her wealth. (To FRANCE) For° you, great king, — inform you of / as for
I would not from your love make such a stray° — stray so far
To° match you where I hate; therefore beseech you — as to
To avert your liking° a more worthier way — to turn your affections
Than on a wretch whom nature is ashamed
Almost to acknowledge hers.
FRANCE This is most strange,
That she, whom even but now was your best object,
The argument° of your praise, balm of your age, — theme
Most best, most dearest, should in this trice° of time — moment
Commit a thing so monstrous, to dismantle° — as to strip off, disrobe
So many folds of favor. Sure, her offense
Must be of such unnatural degree,
That monsters it,° or your fore-vouched affection — makes it monstrous
Fall'n into taint;[7] which to believe of her,
Must be a faith that reason without miracle
Could never plant in me.
CORDELIA I yet beseech your majesty—
If for I want° that glib and oily art, — because I lack

---

[5] I.e., one who appears more substantial than she is; one who will not pretend.
[6] A choice cannot be made under those terms.
[7] I.e., or else the love you earlier swore for Cordelia must be regarded with suspicion. "Or" may also mean "before," in which case the phrase would mean "before the love you once proclaimed could have decayed."

To speak and purpose not°—since what I well intend, and not intend
I'll do't before I speak—that you make known
It is no vicious blot, murder, or foulness,
No unchaste action, or dishonored step,
That hath deprived me of your grace and favor;
But even for want of that for which I am richer,
A still-soliciting° eye, and such a tongue an always-begging
As I am glad I have not, though not to have it
Hath lost me in your liking.
LEAR Better thou
Hadst not been born than not to have pleased me better.
FRANCE Is it but this—a tardiness in nature
Which often leaves the history unspoke
That it intends to do?[8] My lord of Burgundy,
What say you to the lady? Love's not love
When it is mingled with regards° that stands considerations
Aloof from th' entire point. Will you have her?
She is herself a dowry.
BURGUNDY Royal Lear,
Give but that portion which yourself proposed,
And here I take Cordelia by the hand,
Duchess of Burgundy.
LEAR Nothing! I have sworn; I am firm.
BURGUNDY I am sorry, then, you have so lost a father
That you must lose a husband.
CORDELIA Peace be with Burgundy!
Since that respects of fortune are his love,
I shall not be his wife.
FRANCE Fairest Cordelia, that art most rich, being poor;
Most choice, forsaken; and most loved, despised!
Thee and thy virtues here I seize upon:
Be it lawful I take up what's cast away.
Gods, gods! 'tis strange that from their cold'st neglect
My love should kindle to inflamed respect.° ardent regard
Thy dowerless daughter, king, thrown to my chance,
Is queen of us, of ours, and our fair France.
Not all the dukes of waterish° Burgundy irrigated, watery; weak
Can buy this unprized° precious maid of me. unappreciated
Bid them farewell, Cordelia, though unkind;° though they are unkind
Thou losest here,° a better where° to find. this place/place
LEAR Thou hast her, France; let her be thine; for we Have no such daughter, nor shall ever see
That face of hers again. Therefore be gone
Without our grace, our love, our benison.° blessing
Come, noble Burgundy.
Flourish. Exeunt all hut FRANCE, GONERIL, REGAN, and CORDELIA
FRANCE Bid farewell to your sisters.
CORDELIA The jewels of our father, with washed eyes Cordelia leaves you. I know you what you are,

---

[8] A natural reserve that inhibits voicing one's intentions.

And like a sister am most loath to call
Your faults as they are named.° Love well our father. are properly called
To your professed bosoms° I commit him; publicly proclaimed love
But yet, alas, stood I° within his grace, if I stood
I would prefer° him to a better place. promote; recommend
So, farewell to you both.

REGAN Prescribe not us our duties.

GONERIL Let your study
Be to content your lord, who hath received you
At fortune's alms.[9] You have obedience scanted,° stinted on
And well are worth the want that you have wanted.[1]

CORDELIA Time shall unfold what pleated cunning hides:
Who cover faults, at last shame them derides.[2]
Well may you prosper!

FRANCE Come, my fair Cordelia.

Exeunt FRANCE and CORDELIA

GONERIL Sister, it is not a little I have to say of what most nearly appertains to us both. I think our father will hence to-night.

REGAN That's most certain, and with you; next month with us.

GONERIL You see how full of changes° his age is; the observation we have made of it hath not been little:[3] he always loved our sister most; and with what poor judgment he hath now cast her off appears too grossly.° fickleness / blatantly

REGAN 'Tis the infirmity of his age; yet he hath ever but slenderly known himself.

GONERIL The best and soundest of his time hath been but rash;[4] then° must we look to receive from his age, not alone the imperfections of long-engraffed condition,° but therewithal the unruly waywardness that infirm and choleric° years bring with them. therefore / deep-rooted habit / prone to anger

REGAN Such unconstant starts[5] are we like° to have from him as this of Kent's banishment. likely

GONERIL There is further compliment° of leave-taking between France and him. Pray you, let's hit° together: if our father carry authority with such dispositions[6] as he bears, this last surrender° of his will but offend° us. ceremony / join; strike / abdication / harm

REGAN We shall further think on't.

GONERIL We must do something, and i' the heat.° Exeunt while the iron is hot

My services are bound.[1] Wherefore° should I why

[9] As a charitable gift from Dame Fortune.

[1] And you deserve to get no more love (from your husband) than you have given (to your father). "Want" plays on its alternative meanings of "lack" and "desire."

[2] Those who hide their faults will in the end be put to shame.

[3] We have observed it more than a little.

[4] Even in the prime of his life he was impetuous.

[5] Such impulsive outbursts.

[6] Frame of mind.

1.2 Location: The earl of Gloucester's house.

[1] Edmund declares the raw force of unsocialized and unregulated existence, as opposed to human law, to be his ruler; ironically, "nature" also means "natural filial affection." A "natural" was another word for "bastard" (illegitimate child).

EDMUND So please your lordship, none.

Putting up the letter

GLOUCESTER Why so earnestly seek you to put up that letter?

EDMUND I know no news, my lord.

GLOUCESTER What paper were you reading?

EDMUND Nothing, my lord.

GLOUCESTER No? What needed, then, that terrible dispatch° of it into your pocket? The quality of nothing hath not such need to hide itself. Let's see. Come, if it be nothing, I shall not need spectacles. frightened haste

EDMUND I beseech you, sir, pardon me. It is a letter from my brother, that I have not all o'er-read; and for so much as I have perused, I find it not fit for your o'er-looking.

GLOUCESTER Give me the letter, sir.

EDMUND I shall offend, either to detain or give it. The contents, as in part I understand them, are to blame.

GLOUCESTER Let's see, let's see.

EDMUND I hope, for my brother's justification, he wrote this but as an essay or taste[5] of my virtue.

GLOUCESTER (reads) "This policy and reverence of age makes the world bitter to the best of our times;[6] keeps our fortunes from us till our oldness cannot relish them. I begin to find an idle and fond° bondage in the oppression of aged tyranny; who sways, not as it hath power, but as it is suffered.[7] Come to me, that of this I may speak more. If our father would sleep till I waked him, you should enjoy half his revenue for ever, and live the beloved of your brother, Edgar."

[2] I.e., submit to the imposition of inheritance law.

[3] Engendering a bastard, by virtue of its illicitness and furtiveness, entails heightened sexual energy, in Edmund's view, and hence produces more well-formed, vigorous offspring.

[4] Established as mere show; relegated to pension.

[5] Simply as a proof or test. Both terms derive from metallurgy.

Hum—conspiracy!—"Sleep till I waked him—you should enjoy half his revenue"—My son Edgar! Had he a hand to write this? a heart and brain to breed it in?—When came this to you? who brought it?

EDMUND I do not well know, my lord. If it shall please you to suspend your indignation against my brother till you can derive from him better testimony of his intent, you shall run a certain° course; where,° if you violently proceed against him, mistaking his purpose, it would make a great gap in your own honor and shake in pieces the heart of his obedience. EDGAR Do you busy yourself about that?

The one in motley[6] here,
The other found out there.

LEAR Dost thou call me fool, boy?

FOOL All thy other titles thou hast given away; that thou wast born with.

KENT This is not altogether fool,° my lord. foolish; folly

FOOL No, faith, lords and great men will not let me; if I had a monopoly out, they would have part on't: and ladies too, they will not let me have all fool to myself; they'll be snatching. Give me an egg, nuncle, and I'll give thee two crowns.

LEAR What two crowns shall they be?

FOOL Why, after I have cut the egg i' the middle, and eat up the meat,° the two crowns of the egg. When thou clovest° edible-part thy crown i' the middle, and gavest away both parts, cleaved thou borest° thy ass on thy back o'er the dirt.[7] Thou hadst you carried little wit° in thy bald crown, when thou gavest thy golden sense one away. If I speak like myself° in this, let him be (like a fool)
whipped that first finds it so.[8]

Singing

Fools had ne'er less grace in a year;
For wise men are grown foppish,[9]
They know not how their wits to wear,
Their manners are so apish.° stupid; imitative

LEAR When were you wont° to be so full of songs, sirrah? accustomed

FOOL I have used° it, nuncle, ever since thou madest thy practiced daughters thy mother; for when thou gavest them the rod, and put'st down thine own breeches,

Singing

Then they for sudden joy did weep,
And I for sorrow sung,
That such a king should play bo-peep,° a child's game
And go the fools among.

Prithee, nuncle, keep a schoolmaster that can teach thy fool to lie. I would fain° learn to lie.

LEAR An° you lie, sirrah, we'll have you whipped. if

FOOL I marvel what kin° thou and thy daughters are. how alike
They'll have me whipped for speaking true, thou'lt have me whipped for lying; and sometimes I am whipped for holding my peace. I had rather be any kind o' thing than a fool; and yet I would not be thee, nuncle; thou hast pared thy wit o' both sides, and left nothing i' the middle. Here comes one o' the parings.

Enter GONERIL

LEAR How now, daughter! What makes that frontlet[1] on?

---

[6] Multicolored dress of a court jester.

[7] In a fable of Aesop, a man carried his ass instead of riding it, thereby reversing the order of nature.

[8] I.e., who first discovers for himself that this is true; colloquially, who deserves to be whipped as a fool.

[9] Professional fools have gone out of favor ("grace") since wise men have lately outdone them in idiocy.

[1] Band worn on the forehead; here, a metaphor for "frown."

Methinks you are too much of late i' the frown.
FOOL Thou wast a pretty fellow when thou hadst no need to care for her frowning; now thou art an O without a figure.[2] I am better than thou art now; I am a fool, thou art nothing. [To GONERIL] Yes, forsooth,° I will hold my — indeed tongue; so your face bids me, though you say nothing.
Mum, mum,
He that keeps nor crust nor crumb,
Weary of all, shall want° some. — lack, be in need of (Pointing to LEAR*)* That's a shealed peascod.° — empty pea pod
GONERIL Not only, sir, this your all-licensed° fool, — unrestrained
But other of your insolent retinue
Do hourly carp and quarrel, breaking forth
In rank° and not-to-be-endured riots. Sir, — fold; spreading
I had thought, by making this well known unto you,
To have found a safe° redress; but now grow fearful, — sure
By what yourself too late° have spoke and done, — recently
That you protect this course, and put it on° — encourage it
By your allowance; which if you should, the fault
Would not 'scape censure, nor the redresses sleep,
Which, in the tender of a wholesome weal,
Might in their working do you that offense,
Which else were shame, that then necessity
Will call discreet proceeding.[3]
FOOL For, you know, nuncle,
The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo[4] so long,
That it had it° head bit off by it young.° — its / (the young cuckoo)
So, out went the candle, and we were left darkling.° — in the dark
LEAR Are you our daughter?
GONERIL Come, sir.
I would you would make use of that good wisdom,
Whereof I know you are fraught,° and put away — fidl
These dispositions,° that of late transform you — moods, attitudes
From what you rightly are.
FOOL May not an ass know when the cart draws the horse?
Whoop, Jug![5] I love thee.
LEAR Doth any here know me? This is not Lear.
Doth Lear walk thus? speak thus? Where are his eyes?
Either his notion° weakens, his discernings — intellect
Are lethargied—Ha! waking?° 'Tis not so. — am I awake
Who is it that can tell me who I am?
FOOL Lear's shadow.
LEAR I would° learn that; for, by the marks° of sovereignty, — wish to / evidence knowledge, and reason, I should be false persuaded I had daughters.

[2] A zero without a preceding digit; nothing.

[3] I.e., if you do approve (of your attendants' behavior), you will not escape criticism, nor will it be without retribution, which for the common good will cause you pain. While this would otherwise be improper, it will be seen as a prudent ("discreet") action under the circumstances. "Tender of": concern for. "Weal": state, commonwealth. "Then necessity": the demands of the time.

[4] The cuckoo lays its eggs in other birds' nests.

[5] Nickname for "Joan"; sobriquet for a whore.

FOOL Which° they will make an obedient father. whom
LEAR Your name, fair gentlewoman?
GONERIL This admiration,° sir, is much o' the savor excessive amazement
Of other your new pranks. I do beseech you
To understand my purposes aright.
As you are old and reverend,° you should be Wise. to he respected
Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires;
Men so disordered,° so deboshed° and bold, disorderly / debauched
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shows° like a riotous inn. Epicurism° and lust appears /gluttony
Make it more like a tavern or a brothel
Than a graced° palace. The shame itself doth speak an honored
For instant remedy; be then desired
By her, that else° will take the thing she begs, otherwise
A little to disquantity your train;° to reduce your retinue
And the remainder that shall still depend,° be retained
To be such men as may besort° your age, befit
And know themselves° and you. know their place
LEAR Darkness and devils!
Saddle my horses! call my train together!
Degenerate bastard! I'll not trouble thee.
Yet° have I left a daughter. still
GONERIL YOU strike my people, and your disordered rabble
Make servants of their betters.
Enter ALBANY
LEAR Woe that° too late repents!—(To ALBANY) woe to him who
O, sir, are you come?
Is it your will? Speak, sir. Prepare my horses!
Ingratitude, thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous when thou show'st thee in a child
Than the sea-monster!
ALBANY Pray, sir, be patient.
LEAR (to GONERIL) Detested kite!° thou liest: carrion-eating hawk
My train are men of choice and rarest parts,° qualities
That all particulars of duty know,
And in the most exact regard support
The worships of° their name. O most small fault, honors accorded
How ugly didst thou in Cordelia show!
That, like an engine, wrench'd my frame of nature
From the fixed place;[6] drew from my heart all love,
And added to the gall. O Lear, Lear, Lear!
Beat at this gate, that let thy folly in, (striking his head)
And thy dear° judgment out! Go, go, my people. precious
ALBANY My lord, I am guiltless, as I am ignorant
Of what hath moved you.
LEAR It may be so, my lord.
Hear, Nature, hear! dear goddess, hear!
Suspend thy purpose, if thou didst intend
To make this creature fruitful!

---

[6] As a machine (or lever) dislocated my natural affections from their proper foundations.

Into her womb convey sterility!
Dry up in her the organs of increase;
And from her derogate° body never spring debased
A babe to honor her! If she must teem," breed
Create her child of spleen,° that it may live malice
And be a thwart, disnatured° torment to her! a perverse unnatural
Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth;
With cadent° tears fret° channels in her cheeks; flowing / carve
Turn all her mother's pains and benefits° cares and kind actions
To laughter and contempt, that she may feel
How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child! Away, away! Exit

ALBANY Now, gods that we adore, whereof comes this?

GONERIL Never afflict yourself to know the cause;
But let his disposition° have that scope inclination
That dotage gives it.

Re-enter LEAR

LEAR What, fifty of my followers at a clap?
Within a fortnight?[7]

ALBANY What's the matter, sir?

LEAR I'll tell thee. (To GONERIL) Life and death! I am ashamed
That thou hast power to shake my manhood thus;
That these hot tears, which break from me perforce,° against my will
Should make thee worth them. Blasts and fogs upon thee!
The untented woundings° of a father's curse the undressed wounds
Pierce every sense about thee! Old fond° eyes, foolish
Beweep° this cause again, I'll pluck ye out, if you weep over
And cast you, with the waters that you lose,
To temper° clay. Yea, is it come to this? soften
Let it be so. Yet have I left a daughter,
Who, I am sure, is kind and comfortable.° comforting
When she shall hear this of thee, with her nails
She'll flay thy wolvish visage. Thou shalt find
That I'll resume the shape which thou dost think
I have cast off for ever; thou shalt, I warrant thee.

Exeunt LEAR, KENT, and attendants

GONERIL. Do you mark that, my lord?

ALBANY I cannot be so partial,° Goneril, biased
To° the great love 1 bear you— because of

GONERIL Pray you, content.° What, Oswald, ho! (To the FOOL) You sir, more knave than fool, after your master! be quiet

FOOL Nuncle Lear, nuncle Lear, tarry and take the fool with thee.

A fox, when one has caught her,
And such a daughter,
Should sure° to the slaughter, surely be sent
If my cap would buy a halter:° collar; noose
So the fool follows after. Exit

---

[7] Evidently Goneril has already given orders that fully half of Lear's retinue is to be dismissed. See lines 241—43 above.

GONERIL This man hath had good counsel!—a hundred knights?
'Tis politic° and safe to let him keep prudent
At point° a hundred knights? Yes, that on every dream, armed
Each buzz,° each fancy, each complaint, dislike, rumor
He may enguard° his dotage with their powers, protect
And hold our lives in mercy. Oswald, I say!

ALBANY Well, you may fear too far.

GONERIL Safer than trust too far:
Let me still° take away the harms I fear, always
Not° fear still to be taken. I know his heart. rather than
What he hath uttered I have writ my sister.
If she sustain him and his hundred knights,
When I have showed the unfitness—

Re-enter OSWALD

How now, Oswald!
What, have you writ that letter to my sister?

OSWALD Yes, madam.

GONERIL Take you some company, and away to horse!
Inform her full of my particular fear,
And thereto add such reasons of your own
As may compact° it more. Get you gone, compound
And hasten your return. Exit OSWALD
No, no, my lord,
This milky gentleness and course of yours
Though I condemn not, yet, under pardon,° your pardon
You are much more attaxed° for want of wisdom taken to task, censured
Than praised for harmful mildness.

ALBANY How far your eyes may pierce° I cannot tell: foresee
Striving to better, oft we mar what's well.

GONERIL Nay, then——

ALBANY Well, well; the event.° Exeunt time will tell

1.5

Enter LEAR, KENT, and FOOL

LEAR Go you before° to Gloucester[1] with these letters. Acquaint my daughter no further with any thing you know than comes from her demand out of the letter.[2] If your diligence be not speedy, I shall be there afore you. on ahead

KENT I will not sleep, my lord, till I have delivered your letter. Exit

FOOL If a man's brains were in's heels, were't not in danger of kibes?° chilblains

LEAR Ay, boy.

FOOL Then, I prithee, be merry; thy wit shall ne'er go slipshod.[3]

LEAR Ha, ha, ha!

1.5 Location: Before Albany's castle.

[1] To the city of Gloucester.

[2] Other than such questions as are prompted by the letter.

[3] Literally, your brains will not wear slippers (to warm feet that are afflicted with chilblains); feet of any intelligence would not walk toward Regan.

FOOL Shalt° see thy other daughter will use thee kindly; thou shalt for though she's as like this as a crab's° like an apple, yet crab apple, sour apple
I can tell what I can tell.
LEAR Why, what canst thou tell, my boy?
FOOL She will taste as like this as a crab does to a crab.
Thou canst tell why one's nose stands i' the middle on's° of one's face?
LEAR No.
FOOL Why, to keep one's eyes of either side's nose, that what a man cannot smell out, 'a° may spy into. he
LEAR I did her° wrong— (Cordelia)
FOOL Canst tell how an oyster makes his shell?
LEAR NO.
FOOL Nor I neither; but I can tell why a snail has a house.
LEAR Why?
FOOL Why, to put his head in; not to give it away to his daughters, and leave his horns without a case.[4]
LEAR I will forget my nature.° So kind a father! Be my lose my fatherly feelings horses ready?
FOOL Thy asses° are gone about 'em. The reason why the (servants)
seven stars° are no more than seven is a pretty reason. the Pleiades
LEAR Because they are not eight?
FOOL Yes, indeed. Thou wouldst make a good fool.
LEAR To take't again perforce![5] Monster ingratitude!
FOOL If thou wert my fool, nuncle, I'd have thee beaten for being old before thy time.
LEAR How's that?
FOOL Thou shouldst not have been old till thou hadst been wise
LEAR O, let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heaven!
Keep me in temper;° I would not be mad!

Enter GENTLEMEN

How now! Are the horses ready?
GENTLEMEN Ready, my lord.
LEAR Come, boy.
FOOL She that's a maid now, and laughs at my departure,
Shall not be a maid long, unless things be cut shorter.[6]

Exeunt

2.1

Enter EDMUND and CURAN meeting

EDMUND Save° thee, Curan. God save
CURAN And you, sir. I have been with your father, and given him notice that the Duke of Cornwall and Regan his duchess will be here with him this night.
EDMUND How comes that?

[4] Protective covering for his head or concealment for his horns (horns were the conventional sign of a cuckold). The Fool reflects the cynical view, common in the period, that all married men are inevitably cuckolded.

[5] To take it back by force. Lear may refer to Goneril's treachery, or he may be contemplating resuming his authority.

[6] A girl who would laugh at my leaving would be so foolish that she could not remain a virgin for long; "things" refers both to the unfolding event and to penises.

2.1 Location: Gloucester's castle.

CURAN Nay, I know not. You have heard of the news abroad—I mean the whispered ones, for they are yet but ear-bussing arguments?[1]

EDMUND Not I. Pray you, what are they?

CURAN Have you heard of no likely wars toward,° 'twixt the Dukes of Cornwall and Albany? impending

EDMUND Not a word.

CURAN You may do,° then, in time. Fare you well, sir. do so

Exit

EDMUND The duke be here tonight? The better! best!
This weaves itself perforce° into my business. i.e., of its own accord
My father hath set guard to take my brother;
And I have one thing, of a queasy question,
Which I must act.[2] Briefness and fortune, work!° be with me
Brother, a word! Descend! Brother, I say!

Enter EDGAR

My father watches. O sir, fly this place!
Intelligence is given where you are hid.
You have now the good advantage of the night.
Have you not spoken 'gainst the Duke of Cornwall?
He's coming hither; now, i' the night, i' the haste,
And Regan with him: have you nothing said
Upon his party° 'gainst the Duke of Albany? on his (Cornwall's) side
Advise yourself.° consider carefully

EDGAR I am sure on't,° not a word. of it

EDMUND I hear my father coming. Pardon me!
In cunning I must draw my sword upon you:
Draw; seem to defend yourself; now quit you° well. acquit yourself
Yield! Come before my father. Light, ho, here!
Fly, brother. Torches, torches! So farewell. Exit EDGAR
Some blood drawn on me would beget opinion° produce the impression

(wounds his arm)

Of my more fierce endeavor. I have seen drunkards
Do more than this in sport. Father, father!
Stop, stop! No help?

Enter GLOUCESTER, and servants with torches

GLOUCESTER Now, Edmund, where's the villain?

EDMUND Here stood he in the dark, his sharp sword out,
Mumbling of wicked charms, conjuring the moon
To stand° auspicious mistress,— to act as his

GLOUCESTER But where is he?

EDMUND Look, sir, I bleed.

GLOUCESTER Where is the villain, Edmund?

EDMUND Fled this way, sir. When by no means he could—

GLOUCESTER Pursue him, ho! Go after.

Exeunt some servants

By no means what?

EDMUND Persuade me to the murder of your lordship;

---

[1] Barely whispered affairs. "Bussing": kissing.

[2] There is one thing, of a ticklish sort, that I must do.

But that° I told him, the revenging gods in response to that
'Gainst parricides did all their thunders bend;
Spoke, with how manifold and strong a bond
The child was bound to the father; sir, in fine,° finally
Seeing how loathly opposite° I stood
To his unnatural purpose, in fell° motion, deadly
With his prepared sword, he charges home° strikes to the heart of
My unprovided° body, lanched° mine arm: unprotected / wounded
But when he saw my best alarumed spirits,
Bold in the quarrel's right,[3] roused to the encounter,
Or whether gasted° by the noise I made, frightened
Full suddenly he fled.

GLOUCESTER Let him fly far.
Not in this land shall he remain uncaught;
And found—dispatch.° The noble duke my master, and once found—killed
My worthy arch° and patron, comes to-night: lord
By his authority I will proclaim it,
That he which finds him shall deserve our thanks,
Bringing the murderous caitifp to the stake;[4] wretch
He that conceals him, death.

EDMUND When I dissuaded him from his intent,
And found him pight° to do it, with curst° speech resolved / hitter
I threatened to discover° him. He replied, expose
"Thou unpossessing bastard! dost thou think
If I would stand against thee, would the reposal° placing
Of any trust, virtue, or worth in thee
Make thy words faithed?° No. What I should deny—
As this I would; ay, though thou didst produce believed
My very character[5]—I'd turn it all
To[6] thy suggestion, plot, and damned practice:°
And thou must make a dullard of the world, scheming
If they not thought the profits of my death
Were very pregnant° and potential spurs°
To make thee seek it."[7] full / powerful temptations

GLOUCESTER Strong° and fast'ned° villain! flagrant / incorrigible
Would he deny his letter? I never got° him. begot

Tucket° within

Hark, the Duke's trumpets! I know not why he comes. flourish of trumpets
All ports° I'll bar; the villain shall not 'scape;
The duke must grant me that. Besides, his picture[8] seaports; exits
I will send far and near, that all the kingdom
May have due note of him; and of my land,
Loyal and natural° boy, I'll work the means loving; illegitimate
To make thee capable.° legally able to inherit

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, and attendants

---

[3] I.e., that I was fully roused to action, made brave by righteousness.

[4] Treachery and rebellion were crimes for which one could be burned.

[5] Handwriting; but also, a true summary of my character.

[6] I'd blame it all on.

[7] And do you think the world so stupid that it could not see the benefit you would get from my death (and thus a motive for plotting to kill me)?

[8] Likenesses of outlaws were drawn up, printed, and publicly displayed, sometimes with an offer of reward, as in "Wanted" posters.

CORNWALL How now, my noble friend! Since I came hither,
(Which I can call but now) I have heard strange news.
REGAN If it be true, all vengeance comes too short
Which can pursue the offender. How dost, my lord?
GLOUCESTER O, madam, my old heart is cracked, is cracked!
REGAN What, did my father's godson seek your life?
He whom my father named? Your Edgar?
GLOUCESTER O, lady, lady, shame would have it hid!
REGAN Was he not companion with the riotous knights
That tend° upon my father? attend
GLOUCESTER I know not, madam. 'Tis too bad, too bad!
EDMUND Yes, madam, he was of that consort.° company
REGAN No marvel, then, though° he were ill affected.° that / ill-dis
'Tis they have put him on° the old man's death, have urged him to seek
To have th' expense° and waste of his revenues.
I have this present evening from my sister
Been well informed of them; and with such cautions
That if they come to sojourn at my house,
I'll not be there.
CORNWALL Nor I, assure thee, Regan.
Edmund, I hear that you have shown your father
A child-like office.° filial service
EDMUND 'Twas my duty, sir.
GLOUCESTER He did bewray his practice,° and received reveal his (Edgar's) plot
This hurt you see, striving to apprehend him.
CORNWALL Is he pursued?
GLOUCESTER Ay, my good lord.
CORNWALL If he be taken, he shall never more
Be feared of doing harm. Make your own purpose,
How in my strength you please.[9] For you, Edmund,
Whose virtue and obedience doth this instant
So much commend itself, you shall be ours.
Natures of such deep trust we shall much need;
You we first seize on.
EDMUND I shall serve you, sir,
Truly, however else.° if nothing else
GLOUCESTER For him I thank your grace.
CORNWALL You know not why we came to visit you—
REGAN Thus out of season, threading dark-eyed night.
Occasions, noble Gloucester, of some poise,° weight
Wherein we must have use of your advice:
Our father he hath writ, so hath our sister,
Of differences,° which I best thought it fit quarrels
To answer from° our home. The several° messengers away from / various
From hence attend° dispatch. Our good old friend, await
Lay comforts to your bosom, and bestow
Your needful° counsel to our business, badly needed

[9] Devise your plots making use of my forces and authority as you see fit.

Which craves the instant use.[1]
GLOUCESTER I serve you, madam.
Your graces are right welcome. Exeunt

2.2

Enter KENT and OSWALD, severally° — separately

OSWALD Good dawning to thee, friend. Art° of this house? — are you a servant
KENT Ay.
OSWALD Where may we set our horses?
KENT I' the mire.
OSWALD Prithee, if thou lovest me,° tell me. — if you will be so kind
KENT I love thee not.
OSWALD Why, then, I care not for thee.
KENT If I had thee in Lipsbury pinfold,[1] I would make thee care for me.
OSWALD Why dost thou use° me thus? I know thee not. — treat
KENT Fellow, I know thee.
OSWALD What dost thou know me for?° — i.e, to be KENT A knave; a rascal; an eater of broken meats;° a base, — scraps proud, shallow, beggarly, three-suited, hundred-pound, filthy, worsted-stocking knave;[2] a lily-livered,° action-taking — cowardly
knave; a whoreson, glass-gazing,° superserviceable, — mirror-gazing finical° rogue; one-trunk-inheriting slave;[3] one that — finicky, fastidious wouldst be a bawd in way of good service,[4] and art nothing but the composition° of a knave, beggar, coward, pandar, — combination and the son and heir of a mongrel bitch; one whom I will beat into clamorous whining, if thou deniest the least syllable of thy addition.[5]
OSWALD Why, what a monstrous fellow art thou, thus to rail on one that is neither known of° thee nor knows thee! — by KENT What a brazen-faced varlet° art thou, to deny thou — rascal knowest me! Is it two days ago since I tripped up thy heels, and beat thee before the king? Draw, you rogue!
For, though it be night, yet the moon shines. I'll make a sop of the moonshine[6] of you. Draw, you whoreson cullionly barber-monger,[7] draw!

Drawing his sword

OSWALD Away! I have nothing to do with thee.
KENT Draw, you rascal! You come with letters against the king, and take Vanity the puppet's part against the royalty of her father.[8] Draw, you rogue, or I'll so carbonado[9] your

---

[1] Which requires immediate attention.

2.2 Location: Before Gloucester's house.

[1] If I had you in the enclosure of my mouth (gripped in my teeth). Lipsbury is probably an invented place-name. "Pinfold": pen, animal enclosure.

[2] Oswald is being called a poor imitation of a gentleman. Servants were permitted three suits a year; one hundred pounds was the minimum qualification for the purchase of one of King James's knighthoods; a gentleman would wear silk, not "worsted" (of thick woolen material), stockings.

[3] "One-trunk inheriting": owning only what would fill one trunk. "Superserviceable": overly officious, or too ready to serve. "Action-taking": litigious, one who would rather use the law than his fists.

[4] One who would be a pimp if called upon.

[5] Of the descriptions Kent has just applied to him. "Addition": title (used ironically).

[6] Kent proposes so to skewer and pierce Oswald that his body might soak up moonlight. "Sop": piece of bread to be steeped or dunked in soup.

[7] Despicable frequenter of hairdressers. A "cullion" is a testicle.

[8] And support Goneril, here depicted as a dressed-up doll whose pride is contrasted with Lear's kingliness.

[9] Slash or score as one would the surface of meat in preparation for broiling.

shanks! Draw, you rascal! Come your ways!° come forward

OSWALD Help, ho! murther! help!

KENT Strike, you slave! Stand, rogue! Stand, you neat° elegant; foppish slave! Strike! [Beating him]

OSWALD Help, ho! murther! murther!

Enter EDMUND with his rapier drawn, CORNWALL,
REGAN, GLOUCESTER, and servants

EDMUND How now! What's the matter?

Parts them

KENT With you, goodman° boy, an° you please! Come, I'll i.e., lowborn / if flesh ye![1] Come, on, young master!

GLOUCESTER Weapons! arms! What's the matter here?

CORNWALL Keep peace, upon your lives!
He dies that strikes again. What is the matter?

REGAN The messengers from our sister and the king.

CORNWALL What is your difference? Speak.

OSWALD I am scarce in breath, my lord.

KENT No marvel, you have so bestirred your valor. You cowardly rascal, nature disclaims° in thee; a tailor made disowns her part thee.

CORNWALL Thou art a strange fellow. A tailor[2] make a man?

KENT Ay, a tailor, sir. A stone-cutter or a painter could not have made him so ill,° though he had been but two hours so badly
at the trade.

CORNWALL Speak yet, how grew your quarrel?

OSWALD This ancient ruffian, sir, whose life I have spared at suit of° his gray beard— on account of

KENT Thou whoreson zed![3] thou unnecessary letter! My lord, if you will give me leave, I will tread this unbolted° unsifted, coarse villain into mortar, and daub the walls of a jakes° with privy, toilet
him. Spare my gray beard, you wagtail?[4]

CORNWALL Peace, sirrah!
You beastly knave, know you no reverence?° respect

KENT Yes, sir, but anger hath a privilege.

CORNWALL Why art thou angry?

KENT That such a slave as this should wear a sword,
Who wears no honesty. Such smiling rogues as these,
Like rats, oft bite the holy cords[5] a-twain
Which are too intrinse° t' unloose; smooth° every passion intricate /flatter
That in natures of their lords rebel;
Bring oil to fire, snow to their colder moods;
Renege,° affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks[6] deny
With every gale and vary° of their masters, mood
Knowing nought, like dogs, but following.

---

[1] I'll blood you (as a hunting dog); I'll initiate you into fighting.

[2] Tailors, considered effeminate, were stock objects of mockery.

[3] The letter Z (zed) was considered superfluous and was omitted from many dictionaries.

[4] A common English bird that takes its name from the up-and-down flicking of its tail; this, and its characteristic hopping from foot to foot, causes it to appear nervous.

[5] Bonds of kinship, affection, marriage, or rank.

[6] It was believed that the kingfisher (in Greek, halcyon) could be used as a weather vane when dead: if the bird were suspended by a thread, its beak would turn whatever way the wind blew.

A plague upon your epileptic° visage! distorted, grimacing
Smile you° my speeches, as° I were a fool? do you smile at / as if Goose, if I had you upon Sarum plain
I'ld drive ye cackling home to Camelot.[7]
CORNWALL What, art thou mad, old fellow?
GLOUCESTER How fell you out?° Say that. came you to KENT No contraries° hold more antipathy opposites
Than I and such a knave.
CORNWALL Why dost thou call him knave? What's his offense?
KENT His countenance likes° me not. pleases
CORNWALL No more, perchance,° does mine, nor his, nor hers. perhaps
KENT Sir, 'tis my occupation to be plain.
I have seen better faces in my time
Than stands on any shoulder that I see
Before me at this instant.
CORNWALL This is some fellow,
Who, having been praised for bluntness, doth affect
A saucy roughness, and constrains the garb
Quite from his nature.[8] He cannot flatter, he,
An honest mind and plain, he must speak truth!
An they will take it, so; if not, he's plain.[9]
These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness
Harbor more craft and more corrupter ends
Than twenty silly ducking observants
That stretch their duties nicely.[1]
KENT Sir, in good sooth, in sincere verity,
Under the allowance of your great aspect,[2]
Whose influence, like the wreath of radiant fire
On flickering Phoebus' front—° the sun god's forehead
CORNWALL What mean'st by this?
KENT To go out of my dialect,° which you discommend so much. I know, sir, I am no flatterer. He that beguiled you in a plain accent was a plain knave; which for my part I will not be, though I should win your displeasure to entreat me to't.[3] normal mode of speech
CORNWALL What was the offense you gave him?
OSWALD I never gave him any:
It pleased the king his master very late° lately
To strike at me, upon his misconstruction,° misunderstanding (me)
When he, conjunct,° and flattering his displeasure, in league with Tripped me behind; being down, insulted,° railed, I being down, he insulted
And put upon him such a deal of man,

[7] Comparing him to a cackling goose, Kent tells Oswald that if he had him on Salisbury Plain, he would drive him all the way to Camelot, legendary home of King Arthur.

[8] I.e., and assumes the appearance though it is untrue to his real self. Alternatively (with "his" meaning "its"), and distorts the true shape of plainness from what it naturally is (by turning it into disrespect).

[9] If they will accept (Kent's attitude), well and good; if not, he is a plainspoken man (and does not care).

[1] Than twenty obsequious attendants who constantly bow idiotically and who perform their functions with excessive diligence ("nicely").

[2] With the permission of your great countenance. "Aspect" also refers to the astrological position of a planet; Kent's bombastic language here raises Cornwall to the mock-heroic proportions of a heavenly body.

[3] The person who tried to hoodwink you with plain speaking was, indeed, a pure knave—something I won't be, even if you were to beg me to be one (a plain knave, or flatterer).

That worthied him,[4] got praises of the king
For him attempting who was self-subdued;[5]
And, in the fleshment° of this dread exploit, excitement; flush
Drew on me here again.
KENT None of these rogues and cowards
But Ajax is their fool.[6]
CORNWALL Fetch forth the stocks!
You stubborn miscreant knave, you reverent° braggart, old; revered
We'll teach you—
KENT Sir, I am too old to learn.
Call not your stocks for me. I serve the king;
On whose employment I was sent to you:
You shall do small respect, show too bold malice
Against the grace° and person° of my master, majesty / -personal honor
Stocking° his messenger. by stocking
CORNWALL Fetch forth the stocks! As I have life and honor,
There shall he sit till noon.
REGAN Till noon? Till night, my lord, and all night too!
KENT Why, madam, if I were your father's dog,
You should not use me so.
REGAN Sir, being° his knave, I will. since you are
CORNWALL This is a fellow of the self-same color° character
Our sister° speaks of. Come, bring away the stocks! sister-in-law
Stocks brought out
GLOUCESTER Let me beseech your grace not to do so.
His fault is much, and the good king his master
Will check° him for't. Your purposed° low correction reprimand / intended
Is such as basest and contemned'st wretches
For pilferings and most common trespasses
Are punished with: the king must take it ill,
That he, so slightly valued in his messenger,
Should have him thus restrained.
CORNWALL I'll answer° that. be responsible for
REGAN My sister may receive it much more worse,
To have her gentleman abused, assaulted,
For following° her affairs. Put in his legs. carrying out
KENT is put in the stocks
Come, my good lord, away.
Exeunt all but GLOUCESTER and KENT
GLOUCESTER I am sorry for thee, friend: 'tis the duke's pleasure,
Whose disposition, all the world well knows,
Will not be rubbed° nor stopped: I'll entreat for thee. obstructed
KENT Pray do not, sir. I have watched° and traveled hard; gone without sleep
Some time I shall sleep out, the rest I'll whistle.
A good man's fortune may grow out at heels:[7]

---

[4] And put on such a show of manliness that he was thought a worthy fellow.

[5] For attacking a man who had already surrendered.

[6] I.e., by their own account, such rogues and cowards are always vastly superior to Ajax (next to Achilles, the mightiest of the Greeks in the Iliad).

[7] The fortunes of even good men sometimes wear thin.

Give° you good morrow! God give
GLOUCESTER The duke's to blame in this; 'twill be ill-taken.
Exit
KENT Good king, that must approve° the common saw," prove I saying
Thou out of heaven's benediction comest
To the warm sun![8]
Approach, thou beacon[9] to this under globe,
That by thy comfortable beams I may
Peruse this letter! Nothing almost sees miracles
But misery.[1] I know 'tis from Cordelia,
Who hath most fortunately been informed
Of my obscured° course; (reads) "and shall find time hidden, disguised
From this enormous state,° seeking to give awful state of affairs
Losses their remedies." All weary and o'er-watched,° too long awake
Take vantage,° heavy eyes, not to behold the opportunity
This shameful lodging.
Fortune, good night; smile once more; turn thy wheel![2]

Enter EDGAR

EDGAR I heard myself proclaimed;° declared an outlaw
And by the happy° hollow of a tree opportune
Escaped the hunt. No port° is free; no place, seaport; exit
That guard, and most unusual vigilance,
Does not attend my taking.° Whiles° I may 'scape, await my capture / until
I will preserve myself; and am bethought° resolved
To take the basest and most poorest shape
That ever penury, in contempt of° man, for
Brought near to beast. My face I'll grime with filth,
Blanket my loins, elf[1] all my hair in knots,
And with presented° nakedness out-face exposed
The winds and persecutions of the sky.
The country gives me proof and precedent
Of Bedlam° beggars, who, with roaring voices, i.e., mad
Strike° in their numbed and mortified° bare arms stick / deadened
Pins, wooden pricks, nails, sprigs of rosemary;
And with this horrible object,° from low farms, spectacle
Poor pelting° villages, sheep-cotes, and mills, paltry, contemptible
Sometime with lunatic bans,° sometime with prayers, curses
Enforce their charity. Poor Turlygod![2] poor Tom!
That's something yet! Edgar I nothing am.[3] Exit

---

[8] You come from the blessing of heaven into the heat of the sun (go from good to bad).
[9] It is arguable whether Kent here refers to the sun or the moon.
[1] Only those suffering misery are granted miracles; any comfort seems miraculous to those who are miserable.
[2] The goddess Fortune was traditionally depicted with a wheel to signify her mutability and caprice. She was believed to take pleasure in arbitrarily lowering those at the top of her wheel and raising those at the bottom.

2.3 Location: As before.
[1] Tangle the hair into "elf locks," supposed to be a favorite trick of malicious elves.
[2] A word of unknown origin.
[3] Edgar, I am nothing; I am no longer Edgar.

2.4

Enter LEAR, FOOL, and GENTLEMAN[1]

LEAR 'Tis strange that they should so depart from home,
And not send back my messenger.
GENTLEMAN As I learned,
The night before there was no purpose in them° they had no intention
Of this remove.° change of residence
KENT Hail to thee, noble master!
LEAR Ha!
Makest thou this shame thy pastime?
KENT No, my lord.

FOOL Ha, ha! he wears cruel garters.[2] Horses are tied by the heads, dogs and bears by the neck, monkeys by the loins, and men by the legs. When a man's over-lusty at legs,[3] then he wears wooden nether-stocks.° knee socks

LEAR What's° he that hath so much thy place° mistook who's / position
To set thee here?
KENT It is both he and she;
Your son° and daughter. son-in-law
LEAR No.
KENT Yes.
LEAR No, I say.
KENT I say, yea.
LEAR No, no, they would not!
KENT Yes, yes, they have!
LEAR By Jupiter, I swear, no!
KENT By Juno,[4] I swear, aye!
LEAR They durst not do't;
They would not, could not do't. 'Tis worse than murder,
To do upon respect[5] such violent outrage.
Resolve° me, with all modest° haste, which way inform / reasonable
Thou mightst deserve, or they impose, this usage,
Coming from us.
KENT My lord, when at their home
I did commend° your highness' letters to them, deliver
Ere I was risen from the place that showed
My duty kneeling, came there a reeking° post, steaming
Stewed in his haste, half breathless, panting forth
From Goneril his mistress, salutations;
Delivered letters, spite of intermission,[6]
Which presently° they read; on whose contents, immediately
They summoned up their meiny,° straight° took horse; retinue / straightaway
Commanded me to follow, and attend
The leisure of their answer, gave me cold looks,
And meeting here the other messenger,

2.4 Location: As before.
[1] The Folio seems to reserve "a Gentleman" for this particular character, who returns in 5.B.
[2] Worsted garters, punning on "crewel," a thin yarn. The Fool is actually referring to the stocks in which Kent's feet are held.
[3] When a man's liable to run away.
[4] Queen of the Roman gods and wife of Jupiter, with whom she constantly quarreled.
[5] To do to one who deserves respect.
[6] Regardless of interrupting me; despite the interruptions in his account (as he gasped for breath).

Whose welcome, I perceived, had poisoned mine—
Being the very° fellow that of late same
Displayed so saucily° against your highness— acted so insolently
Having more man° than wit° about me, drew. courage /sense
He raised the house with loud and coward cries.
Your son and daughter found this trespass worth° deserving of
The shame which here it suffers.

FOOL Winter's not gone yet, if the wild-geese fly that way.[7]
Fathers that wear rags
Do make their children blind;[8]
But fathers that bear bags
Shall see their children kind.
Fortune, that arrant° whore, downright
Ne'er turns the key° to the poor. opens the door

But, for all this, thou shalt have as many dolors[9] for thy daughters as thou canst tell° in a year. count

LEAR O, how this mother° swells up toward my heart! hysteria
Hysterica passio, down, thou climbing sorrow,[1]
Thy element's° below! Where is this daughter? natural place is

KENT With the earl, sir, here within.

LEAR Follow me not; stay here. Exit

GENTLEMAN Made you no more offenses but what you speak of?

KENT None. How chance the king comes with so small a train?

FOOL An° thou hadst been set i' the stocks for that question, thou hadst well deserved it. if

KENT Why, fool?

FOOL We'll set thee to school to an ant, to teach thee there's no laboring i' the winter.[2] All that follow their noses are led by their eyes but blind men, and there's not a nose among twenty but can smell him that's stinking.° (as his fortunes decay) Let go thy hold when a great wheel runs down a hill,[3] lest it break thy neck with following it; but the great one that goes up the hill, let him draw thee after. When a wise man gives thee better counsel, give me mine again. I would have none but knaves follow it, since a fool gives it.

That sir which serves and seeks for gain,
And follows but for form,
Will pack° when it begins to rain, pack up and go
And leave thee in the storm.
But I will tarry; the fool will stay,

---

[7] That is, things will get worse before they get better.

[8] I.e., blind to their father's needs.

[9] Pains, sorrows; punning on "dollar," the English term for the German "thaler," a large silver coin.

[1] Hysterica passio (a Latin expression originating in the Greek steiros, "suffering in the womb") was an inflammation of the senses. In Renaissance medicine, vapors from the abdomen were thought to rise up through the body, and in women, the uterus itself to wander around.

[2] Ants, proverbially prudent, know they cannot work in winter. Implicitly, a wise person should know better than to look for sustenance to an old man who has fallen on wintry times.

[3] A great wheel is a figure for Lear and of Fortune's wheel itself, which has swung downward.

And let the wise man fly.
The knave turns fool that runs away;[4]
The fool no knave, perdy.° by God (from French pardieu)
KENT Where learned you this, fool?
FOOL Not i' the stocks, fool.

Re-enter LEAR, with GLOUCESTER

LEAR Deny to speak with me? They are sick? They are weary?
They have traveled all the night? Mere fetches;° ruses, pretexts
The images of revolt and flying off.[5]
Fetch me a better answer.
GLOUCESTER My dear lord,
You know the fiery quality° of the duke; disposition
How unremoveable and fixed he is
In his own course.
LEAR Vengeance! plague! death! confusion!° destruction
Fiery? what quality? Why, Gloucester, Gloucester,
I'd speak with the Duke of Cornwall and his wife.
GLOUCESTER Well, my good lord, I have informed them so.
LEAR Informed them! Dost thou understand me, man?
GLOUCESTER Ay, my good lord.
LEAR The king would speak with Cornwall; the dear father
Would with his daughter speak, commands her service.
Are they informed of this? My breath and blood!
Fiery? the fiery duke? Tell the hot duke that—
No, but not yet. May be he is not well.
Infirmity doth still° neglect all office° always / obligation
Whereto our health is bound; we are not ourselves
When nature, being oppressed, commands the mind
To suffer with the body. I'll forbear;
And am fallen out with my more headier will,[6]
To take° the indisposed and sickly fit mistake
For the sound man. Death on my state![7] Wherefore° why

looking on KENT

Should he sit here? This act persuades me
That this remotion° of the duke and her remoteness, aloofness
Is practice° only. Give me my servant forth.° trickery I i.e., release Kent
Go tell the duke and's wife I'd speak with them,
Now, presently!° Bid them come forth and hear me, at once
Or at their chamber-door I'll beat the drum
Till it cry sleep to death.[8]
GLOUCESTER I would have all well betwixt you. Exit
LEAR O me, my heart, my rising heart! but, down!
FOOL Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney° did to the eels Londoner (city woman)
when she put 'em i' the paste° alive; she knapped 'em o' pie, pastry
the coxcombs° with a stick, and cried "Down, wantons, heads / rogues down!" 'Twas her brother that, in pure kindness to his horse, buttered his hay.[9]

[4] The scoundrel who runs away is the real fool.
[5] Signs of revolt and of desertion or insurrection.
[6] And disagree with my (earlier) more rash intention.
[7] May my royal authority end (an oath). Ironically, this has already happened.
[8] Till the noise kills sleep.
[9] Like that of his sister (who wanted to make eel pie without killing the eels), his kindness was misplaced:

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GLOUCESTER, and servants
LEAR Good morrow to you both.
CORNWALL Hail to your grace!
KENT is set at liberty
REGAN I am glad to see your highness.
LEAR Regan, I think you are; I know what reason
I have to think so. If thou shouldst not be glad,
I would divorce me from thy mother's tomb,
Sepulchring° an adultress. (To KENT) O, are you free? because it entombed
Some other time for that. Beloved Regan,
Thy sister's naught.° O Regan, she hath tied wicked; nothing
Sharp-toothed unkindness, like a vulture, here!
Points to his heart
I can scarce speak to thee; thou'lt not believe
With how depraved a quality—O Regan!
REGAN I pray you, sir, take patience. I have hope
You less know how to value her desert
Than she to scant her duty.[1]
LEAR Say, how is that?
REGAN I cannot think my sister in the least
Would fail her obligation. If, sir, perchance
She have restrained the riots of your followers,
'Tis on such ground, and to such wholesome end,
As clears her from all blame.
LEAR My curses on her!
REGAN O, sir, you are old;
Nature° in you stands on the very verge life
Of her confine.° You should be ruled and led of its limit
By some discretion,° that discerns your state discreet person
Better than you yourself. Therefore, I pray you,
That to our sister you do make return;
Say you have wronged her, sir.
LEAR Ask her forgiveness?
Do you but mark how this becomes the house:[2]
"Dear daughter, I confess that I am old; (kneeling)
Age° is unnecessary. On my knees I beg an old man
That you'll vouchsafe me raiment,° bed, and food." grant me clothing
REGAN Good sir, no more! These are unsightly tricks.
Return you to my sister.
LEAR (rising) Never, Regan!
She hath abated° me of half my train; deprived
Looked black upon me; struck me with her tongue
Most serpent-like, upon the very heart.
All° the stored vengeances of heaven fall let all
On her ingrateful top!° Strike her young bones, head
You taking° airs, with lameness! infectious, malignant
CORNWALL Fie, sir, fie!

---

horses will not eat buttered hay. Lear's earlier kindness to his daughters was equally foolish.

[1] I expect that you are worse at valuing her deservings than she is at neglecting her duty. The double negative here ("less," "scant") is acceptable Jacobean usage.

[2] Do you see how appropriate this is among members of a family (spoken ironically)?

LEAR You nimble lightnings, dart your blinding flames
Into her scornful eyes! Infect her beauty,
You fen-sucked fogs, drawn by the powerful sun,[3]
To fall and blast her pride!
REGAN O the blest gods! so will you wish on me,
When the rash mood is on.
LEAR No, Regan, thou shalt never have my curse.
Thy tender-hafted[4] nature shall not give Thee o'er to harshness. Her eyes are fierce; but thine
Do comfort and not burn. 'Tis not in thee
To grudge my pleasures, to cut off my train,
To bandy hasty words, to scant my sizes, reduce my allowances
And in conclusion to oppose the bolt° to lock the door
Against my coming in. Thou better know'st
The offices° of nature, bond of childhood, duties
Effects° of courtesy, dues of gratitude; actions
Thy half o' the kingdom hast thou not forgot,
Wherein I thee endowed.
REGAN Good sir, to the purpose.° get to the point
LEAR Who put my man i' the stocks?
Tucket within
CORNWALL What trumpet's that?
REGAN I know't, my sister's. This approves° her letter, confirms
That she would soon be here.
Enter OSWALD
Is your lady come?
LEAR This is a slave, whose easy-borrowed pride[5]
Dwells in the fickle grace of her he follows.
Out varlet,° from my sight! wretch
CORNWALL What means your grace?
LEAR Who stocked my servant? Regan, I have good hope
Thou didst not know on 't.° of it
Enter GONERIL
Who comes here? O heavens,
If you do love old men, if your sweet sway
Allow obedience, if yourselves are old,
Make it your cause! Send down, and take my part!
(To GONERIL) Art not ashamed to look upon this beard?
O Regan, wilt thou take her by the hand?
GONERIL Why not by the hand, sir? How have I offended?
All's not offense that indiscretion finds
And dotage terms so.
LEAR O sides,[6] you are too tough!
Will you yet hold? How came my man i' the stocks?
CORNWALL I set him there, sir; but his own disorders° disorderly behavior
Deserved much less advancement.[7]

---

[3] The sun was thought to suck poisonous vapors from marshy ground.

[4] Tenderly placed; firmly set in a tender disposition (as a knife blade into its haft).

[5] Unmerited and unpaid-for arrogance; "pride" may also refer to Oswald's fine clothing received for his services to Goneril.

[6] Chest, where Lear's heart is swelling with emotion.

[7] Deserved far worse treatment.

LEAR You! did you?
REGAN I pray you, father, being weak, seem so.° behave so
If, till the expiration of your month,
You will return and sojourn with my sister,
Dismissing half your train, come then to me.
I am now from home, and out of that provision
Which shall be needful for your entertainment.
LEAR Return to her, and fifty men dismissed?
No, rather I abjure° all roofs, and choose renounce
To wage against the enmity o' the air;
To be a comrade with the wolf and owl—
Necessity's sharp pinch![8] Return with her?
Why, the hot-blooded France, that dowerless took
Our youngest born, I could as well be brought To knee° his throne, and, squire-like, pension beg kneel to
To keep base life afoot. Return with her?
Persuade me rather to be slave and sumpter° pack horse
To this detested groom. (Pointing at OSWALD)
GONERIL At your choice, sir.
LEAR I prithee, daughter, do not make me mad.
I will not trouble thee, my child; farewell.
We'll no more meet, no more see one another.
But yet thou art my flesh, my blood, my daughter;
Or rather a disease that's in my flesh,
Which I must needs call mine. Thou art a boil,
A plague-sore, an embossed carbuncle,° a swollen tumor
In my corrupted blood. But I'll not chide thee;
Let shame come when it will, I do not call° it. call upon
I do not bid the Thunder-bearer° shoot, i.e., Jove
Nor tell tales of thee to high-judging Jove.
Mend when thou canst; be better at thy leisure.
I can be patient, I can stay with Regan,
I and my hundred knights.
REGAN Not altogether so.
I looked not for° you yet, nor am provided I did not expect
For your fit welcome. Give ear, sir, to my sister;
For those that mingle reason with your passion[9]
Must be content to think you old, and so—
But she knows what she does.
LEAR Is this well° spoken? earnestly
REGAN I dare avouch° it, sir. What, fifty followers? vouch for
Is it not well? What should you need of more?
Yea, or so many, sith° that both charge° and danger since / expense
Speak 'gainst so great a number? How, in one house,
Should many people, under two commands,
Hold amity? 'Tis hard; almost impossible.
GONERIL Why might not you, my lord, receive attendance

---

[8] I.e., to counter, like predators, the harshness of the elements with the hardness brought on by the stress or pressure of necessity.

[9] For those who temper your passionate argument with their own calm reasoning,

From those that she calls servants, or from mine?
REGAN Why not, my lord? If then they chanced to slack° you, neglect
We could control them. If you will come to me—
For now I spy a danger—I entreat you
To bring but five-and-twenty. To no more
Will I give place or notice.° acknowledgment
LEAR I gave you all—
REGAN And in good time° you gave it. it was about time
LEAR Made you my guardians, my depositaries;° trustees
But kept a reservation° to be followed reserved a right
With such a number. What, must I come to you
With five-and-twenty, Regan? Said you so?
REGAN And speak't again, my lord; no more with me.
LEAR Those wicked creatures yet do look well-favored,° attractive
When others are more wicked; not being the worst
Stands in some rank of praise.[1] (To GONERIL) I'll go with thee:
Thy fifty yet doth double five-and-twenty,
And thou art twice her love.
GONERIL Hear me, my lord.
What need you five-and-twenty, ten, or five,
To follow in a house where twice so many
Have a command to tend you?
REGAN What need one?
LEAR O, reason not the need! Our basest beggars
Are in the poorest thing superfluous.[2]
Allow not° nature more than nature needs, if you don't allow Man's life's as cheap as beast's. Thou art a lady;
If only to go warm were gorgeous,
Why, nature needs not what thou gorgeous wear'st,
Which scarcely keeps thee warm.[3] But, for true need—
You heavens, give me that patience,° patience I need! endurance
You see me here, you gods, a poor old man,
As full of grief as age; wretched in both!
If it be you that stirs these daughters' hearts
Against their father, fool me not so much
To bear it tamely;[4] touch me with noble anger,
And let not women's weapons, water-drops,
Stain my man's cheeks! No, you unnatural hags,
I will have such revenges on you both,
That all the world shall—I will do such things—
What they are, yet I know not; but they shall be
The terrors of the earth! You think I'll weep;
No, I'll not weep.
I have full cause of weeping, but this heart
Shall break into a hundred thousand flaws° fragments
Or ere° I'll weep. O fool, I shall go mad! before ever

Exeunt LEAR, GLOUCESTER, KENT, and FOOL

[1] Deserves some degree ("rank") of praise.
[2] Even the lowliest beggars have something more than the barest minimum.
[3] If gorgeousness in clothes is measured by the warmth they provide, your elaborate clothes are superfluous, for they barely cover your body.
[4] Do not make me so foolish as to accept it meekly.

Storm and tempest

CORNWALL Let us withdraw; 'twill be a storm.
REGAN This house is little; the old man and his people
Cannot be well bestowed.°
GONERIL 'Tis his own blame; hath put himself from° rest, deprived himself of
And must needs taste his folly.
REGAN For his particular,° I'll receive him gladly, single self
But not one follower.
GONERIL So am I purposed.
Where is my lord of Gloucester?
CORNWALL Followed the old man forth. He is returned.
Re-enter GLOUCESTER
GLOUCESTER The king is in high rage.
CORNWALL Whither is he going?
GLOUCESTER He calls to horse, but will I know not whither.
CORNWALL 'Tis best to give him way; he leads himself.
GONERIL My lord, entreat him by no means to stay.
GLOUCESTER Alack, the night comes on, and the bleak winds
Do sorely ruffle.° For many miles about bluster
There's scarce a bush.
REGAN O, sir, to willful men,
The injuries that they themselves procure
Must be their schoolmasters. Shut up your doors.
He is attended with a desperate° train; violent
And what they may incense° him to, being apt incite

Storm still. Enter KENT and a GENTLEMAN, at several° doors different

KENT Who's there, besides foul weather?
GENTLEMAN One minded like the weather, most unquietly.
KENT I know you. Where's the king?
GENTLEMAN Contending with the fretful elements;
Bids the wind blow the earth into the sea,
Or swell the curled waters 'bove the main,° mainland
That things might change or cease; tears his white hair,
Which the impetuous blasts, with eyeless rage,
Catch in their fury, and make nothing of;
Strives in his little world of man to out-scorn
The to-and-fro-conflicting wind and rain.
This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,[1]
The lion and the belly-pinched wolf
Keep their fur dry, unbonneted° he runs, hatless; uncrowned
And bids what will take all.

3.1 Location: Bare, open country.

[1] In which even the bear, though starving, having been sucked dry ("drawn") by its cub, would not go out to forage.

KENT But who is with him?
GENTLEMAN None but the fool, who labors to out-jest
His heart-struck injuries.[2]
KENT Sir, I do know you;
And dare, upon the warrant of my note,[3]
Commend a dear° thing to you. There is division, entrust a crucial
Although as yet the face of it be covered
With mutual cunning, 'twixt Albany and Cornwall;
Who have—as who have not, that their great stars
Throned and set high?[4]—servants, who seem no less,° who appear as such
Which are to France the spies and speculations° observers
Intelligent of[5] our state. What hath been seen,
Either in snuffs and packings° of the dukes, quarrels and plots
Or the hard rein° which both of them have borne treatment
Against the old kind king; or something deeper,
Whereof perchance these are but furnishings;° pretexts
But, true it is, from France there comes a power° army
Into this scattered kingdom; who already,
Wise in° our negligence, have secret feet aware of
In some of our best ports, and are at point° ready
To show their open banner. Now to you:
If on my credit you dare build° so far if you trust me
To make your speed to Dover, you shall find
Some that will thank you, making just° report
Of how unnatural and bemadding° sorrow
The king hath cause to plain.° complain
I am a gentleman of blood° and breeding; good family
And, from some knowledge and assurance, offer
This office° to you. role; duty
GENTLEMAN I will talk further with you.
KENT No, do not.
For confirmation that I am much more
Than my out-wall,° open this purse, and take outward appearance
What it contains. If you shall see Cordelia—
As fear not but you shall—show her this ring,
And she will tell you who your fellow° is (Kent himself)
That yet you do not know. Fie on this storm!
I will go seek the king.
GENTLEMAN Give me your hand. Have you no more to say?
KENT Few words, but, to effect,° more than all yet; in importance
That, when we have found the king—in which your pain
That way, I'll this[6]—he that first lights on him
Holla the other.

Enter LEAR and FOOL. Storm still

LEAR Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!

Till you have drenched our steeples, drowned the cocks!° weather vanes
You sulphurous and thought-executing fires,[2]

Crack Nature's molds, all germens° spill at once, seeds
That make ingrateful man!

FOOL O nuncle, court holy-water[3] in a dry house is better than this rain-water out o' door. Good nuncle, in, and ask thy daughters' blessing! Here's a night pities neither wise man nor fool.

LEAR Rumble thy bellyful! Spit, fire! spout, rain!
Nor°1fain, wind, thunder, fire, are my daughters: neither
I tax° not you, you elements, with unkindness; blame
I never gave you kingdom, called you children,
You owe me no subscription.° Then let fall obedience, allegiance
Your horrible pleasure. Here I stand, your slave,
A poor, infirm, weak, and despised old man.
But yet I call you servile ministers,° agents
That have with two pernicious daughters joined
Your high engendered battles° 'gainst a head heaven-bred forces

FOOL He that has a house to put 's head in has a good headpiece.° hat; brain

The cod-piece that will house
 Before the head has any,
The head and he shall louse;
 So beggars marry many.[4]
The man that makes his toe
 What he his heart should make

 And turn his sleep to wake.[5]

For there was never yet fair woman but she made mouths in a glass.[6]

LEAR No, I will be the pattern of all patience; I will say nothing.

KENT Who's there?

FOOL Marry, here's grace and a cod-piece; that's a wise man and a fool.[7]

When nobles are their tailors' tutors;[4]
No heretics burned, but wenches' suitors;[5]
When every case in law is right;° just

When slanders do not live in tongues,
Nor cutpurses° come not to throngs; pick-pockets

Then comes the time, who lives to see't,
That going° shall be used° with feet. walking / practiced

Enter GLOUCESTER and EDMUND

GLOUCESTER Alack, alack, Edmund, I like not this unnatural dealing. When I desired their leave that I might pity° him, they took from me the use of mine own house; charged me, on pain of their perpetual displeasure, neither to speak of him, entreat for him, nor any way sustain him.

EDMUND Most savage and unnatural!

GLOUCESTER Go to;° say you nothing. There's a division betwixt the dukes, and a worse matter than that. I have received a letter this night; 'tis dangerous to be spoken; I have locked the letter in my closet.° These injuries the king now bears will be revenged home;° there's part of a power already footed;[1] we must incline to[2] the king. I will seek him, and privily° relieve him. Go you and maintain talk with the duke, that my charity be not of° him perceived. If he ask for me, I am ill, and gone to bed. Though I die for it, as no less is threatened me, the king my old master must be relieved. There is some strange thing toward,° Edmund; pray you, be careful. Exit

Enter LEAR, KENT, and FOOL

KENT Here is the place, my lord; good my lord, enter:

[4] When noblemen follow fashion more closely than their tailors do.

[5] When the only heretics burned are lovers, who burn from venereal disease.

[6] When usurers can count their profits openly (because they have no shady dealings to hide).

[7] Merlin was the great wizard at the legendary court of King Arthur. Lear's Britain is set in an even more distant past.

3.3 Location: At Gloucester's castle.

[1] Part of an army already landed.

[2] We must take the side of.

[3] Forbidden. "Courtesy": act of kindness.

[4] This seems an action that deserves to be rewarded.

3.4 Location: Open country, before a cattle shed.

The tyranny of the open night's too rough
For nature° to endure. i.e., human weakness
Storm still
LEAR Let me alone.
KENT Good my lord, enter here.
LEAR Wilt break my heart?
KENT I had rather break mine own. Good my lord, enter.
LEAR Thou think'st 'tis much that this contentious storm
Invades us to the skin. So 'tis to thee;
But where the greater malady is fixed,° rooted
The lesser is scarce felt. Thou'dst shun a bear;
But if thy flight lay toward the raging sea,
Thou'dst meet the bear i' the mouth. When the mind's free,° unburdened
The body's delicate.° The tempest in my mind sensitive
Doth from my senses take all feeling else Save° what beats there. Filial ingratitude! except
Is it not as° this mouth should tear this hand as if
For lifting food to't? But I will punish home.° thoroughly
No, I will weep no more. In such a night
To shut me out! Pour on; I will endure.
In such a night as this! O Regan, Goneril!
Your old kind father, whose frank heart gave all—
O, that way madness lies; let me shun that;
No more of that.
KENT Good my lord, enter here.
LEAR Prithee, go in thyself; seek thine own ease:
This tempest will not give me leave to° ponder allow me to
On things would hurt me more. But I'll go in.
(To the FOOL) In, boy; go first. You houseless poverty°— poor
Nay, get thee in. I'll pray, and then I'll sleep.
FOOL goes in
Poor naked wretches, whereso'er you are,
That bide° the pelting of this pitiless storm, endure; dwell in
How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,° starved ribs
Your looped and windowed[1] raggedness, defend you
From seasons such as these? O, I have ta'en
Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;[2]
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou mayst shake the superflux[3] to them,
And show the heavens more just.
EDGAR (within) Fathom and half,[4] fathom and half!
Poor Tom!
The FOOL runs out from the hovel
FOOL Come not in here, nuncle, here's a spirit.
Help me, help me!
KENT Give me thy hand. Who's there?
FOOL A spirit, a spirit! He says his name's poor Tom.
KENT What art thou that dost grumble there i' the straw?

---

[1] I.e., full of holes and vents; "windowed" could also refer to cloth worn through to semitransparency, like the oilcloth window "panes" of the poor.
[2] Cure yourself, pompous person.
[3] Superfluity; bodily discharge, suggested by "physic" (which also has the meaning of "purgative") in line 34.
[4] Nine feet: a sailor's cry when taking soundings to gauge the depth of water.

Come forth.

Enter EDGAR disguised as a madman

EDGAR Away! the foul fiend follows me!
Through the sharp hawthorn blows the cold wind.[5]
Humh! go to thy cold bed, and warm thee.[6]

LEAR Hast thou given all to thy two daughters? And art thou come to this?

EDGAR Who gives any thing to poor Tom? whom the foul fiend hath led through fire and through flame, through ford and whirlpool, o'er bog and quagmire; that hath laid knives under his pillow and halters° in his pew; set rats- nooses bane° by his porridge;[7] made him proud of heart, to ride rat poison on a bay trotting-horse over four-inched bridges,[8] to course° his own shadow for° a traitor. Bless thy five wits![9] hunt I as Tom's a-cold—O, do, de, do de, do de. Bless thee from whirlwinds, star-blasting, and taking![1] Do poor Tom some charity, whom the foul fiend vexes: there could I have him now—and there—and there again, and there.[2]

Storm still

LEAR What, has his daughters brought him to this pass?
Couldst thou save nothing? Didst thou give them all?

FOOL Nay, he reserved a blanket, else we had been all shamed.

LEAR Now, all the plagues that in the pendulous° air overhanging; portentous
Hang fated o'er men's faults light on thy daughters!

KENT He hath no daughters, sir.

LEAR Death, traitor! nothing could have subdued nature
To such a lowness but his unkind daughters.
Is it the fashion that discarded fathers
Should have thus little mercy on their flesh?
Judicious punishment! 'twas this flesh begot
Those pelican[3] daughters.

EDGAR Pillicock sat on Pillicock-hill.
Halloo, halloo, loo, loo![4]

FOOL This cold night will turn us all to fools and madmen.

EDGAR Take heed o' the foul fiend; obey thy parents; keep thy word justly; swear not; commit not with man's sworn spouse; set not thy sweet heart on proud array.[5] Tom's a-cold.

LEAR What hast thou been?

EDGAR A serving-man, proud in heart and mind; that curled my hair; wore gloves in my cap;[6] served the lust of [5] Perhaps a fragment from a ballad.

[6] This expression is also used by the drunken beggar Christopher Sly in Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew, Induction 1.

[7] These are all means by which the foul fiend tempts Tom to commit suicide.

[8] Impossibly narrow, and probably suicidal to attempt without diabolical help.

[9] The five wits were common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, and memory (from medieval and Renaissance cognitive theory).

[1] Infection; bewitchment. "Whirlwinds," "star-blasting": malign astrological influences capable of causing sickness or death.

[2] As Edgar speaks this sentence, he might kill vermin on his body as if they were devils.

[3] I.e., greedy. Young pelicans were reputed to feed on blood from the wounds they made in their mother's breast; in some versions, they first killed their father.

[4] A fragment of an old rhyme, followed by hunting cries or a ballad refrain; "Pillicock" was both a term of endearment and a euphemism for "penis."

[5] These are fragments from the Ten Commandments.

[6] Favors from his mistress. In Petrarchan poetry, wooers are "servants" to their ladies.

my mistress' heart, and did the act of darkness with her;
swore as many oaths as I spake words, and broke them in the sweet face of heaven: one that slept in the contriving of lust, and waked to do it. Wine loved I deeply, dice dearly; and in woman out-paramoured the Turk.[7]
False of heart, light of ear,° bloody of hand; hog in sloth, rumor-hungry fox in stealth, wolf in greediness, dog in madness, lion in prey. Let not the creaking of shoes[8] nor the rustling of silks betray thy poor heart to woman. Keep thy foot[9] out of brothels, thy hand out of plackets,[1] thy pen from lenders' books, and defy° the foul fiend. Still through the hawthorn renounce blows the cold wind: Says suum, mun, ha, no, nonny. Dolphin my boy, my boy, sessa! let him trot by.[2]

Storm still

LEAR Why, thou wert better in thy grave than to answer° encounter with thy uncovered body this extremity of the skies.° Is violent weather man no more than this? Consider him well. Thou owest the worm no silk, the beast no hide, the sheep no wool, the cat[3] no perfume. Ha! here's three on's° are sophisticated! of us
Thou art the thing itself; unaccommodated[4] man is no more but such a poor, bare, forked animal as thou art. Off, off, you lendings!° come unbutton here. borrowed clothes

Tearing off his clothes

FOOL Prithee, nuncle, be contented; 'tis a naughty° night foul to swim in. Now a little fire in a wild° field were like an barren; lustful old lecher's heart; a small spark, all the rest on's° body of his cold. Look, here comes a walking fire.

Enter GLOUCESTER, with a TORCH

EDGAR This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet.[5] He begins at curfew,° and walks till the first cock.° He gives the web 9:00 P.M. / midnight and the pin,° squinies[6] the eye, and makes the harelip; cataract mildews the white° wheat, and hurts the poor creature of near-ripe

St. Withold footed thrice the old;[7]
He met the night-mare[8] and her nine-fold;° nine familiars, demons
Bid her alight,
And her troth plight,° and give her word
And, aroint thee,° witch, aroint thee! begone

KENT How fares your grace?

LEAR What's° he? who's

KENT Who's there? What is't you seek?

GLOUCESTER What are you there? Your names?

EDGAR Poor Tom, that eats the swimming frog, the toad,

[3] Civet cat, in Shakespeare's time the major source of musk for perfume.

[4] Naked; without the trappings of civilization.

[5] A devil drawn from folk beliefs, but famous for his prominent place in Samuel Harsnett's Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures (1603); the frequent borrowings from Harsnett in King Lear set the earliest possible composition date for the play.

Have been Tom's food for seven long year.
Beware my follower. Peace, Smulkin;[0] peace, thou fiend! — a Harsnett devil
GLOUCESTER What, hath your grace no better company?
EDGAR The prince of darkness is a gentleman. Modo he's call'd, and Mahu.[2]
GLOUCESTER Our flesh and blood is grown so vile, my lord,
That it doth hate what gets[0] it. — begets
EDGAR Poor Tom's a-cold.
GLOUCESTER Go in with me. My duty cannot suffer[0] — permit me
To obey in all your daughters' hard commands:
Though their injunction be to bar my doors,
And let this tyrannous night take hold upon you
Yet have I ventured to come seek you out.
And bring you where both fire and food is ready.
LEAR First let me talk with this philosopher.
What is the cause of thunder?
KENT Good my lord, take his offer; go into the house.
LEAR I'll take a word with this same learned Theban.[0] — i.e., Greek sage
What is your study?[0] — field of expertise
EDGAR How to prevent the fiend, and to kill vermin.
LEAR Let me ask you one word in private.
KENT Importune[0] him once more to go, my lord;
His wits begin to unsettle.
GLOUCESTER Canst thou blame him?
Storm still
His daughters seek his death; ah, that good Kent!

Now outlawed[0] from my blood. He sought my life. — disowned
But lately, very late.[0] I loved him, friend; — recently

LEAR With him!
I will keep still° with my philosopher. stay
KENT Good my lord, soothe° him; let him take the fellow. humor
GLOUCESTER Take him you on.° on ahead-
KENT Sirrah, come on; go along with us.

GLOUCESTER No words, no words: hush.
EDGAR Child Rowland[3] to the dark tower came,

Enter CORNWALL and EDMUND

CORNWALL I will have my revenge ere I depart his house.

EDMUND How, my lord, I may be censured,° that nature° thus gives way to loyalty, something fears me° to think of. judged / kinship I am somewhat afraid

CORNWALL I now perceive, it was not altogether your brother's evil disposition made him seek his° death; but a provoking merit, set a-work by a reprovable badness in himself.[1] (Gloucester's)

EDMUND How malicious is my fortune, that I must repent to be just! This is the letter he spoke of, which approves him an intelligent party to the advantages of France.[2] O heavens! that this treason were not, or not I the detector!

CORNWALL Go with me to the duchess.

EDMUND If the matter of this paper be certain, you have mighty business in hand.

CORNWALL True or false, it hath made thee Earl of Gloucester. Seek out where thy father is, that he may be ready for our apprehension.° arrest

EDMUND (aside) If I find him comforting the king, it will stuff his° suspicion more fully.—I will persever in my course of loyalty, though the conflict be sore between that and my blood.° (Cornwall's) filial duty

CORNWALL I will lay trust upon thee, and thou shalt find foul fiend.

FOOL Prithee, nuncle, tell me whether a madman be a gentleman or a yeoman?[3]

LEAR A king, a king!

FOOL No, he's a yeoman that has a gentleman to his son;
for he's a mad yeoman that sees his son a gentleman
before him.

LEAR To have a thousand with red burning spits
Come hissing in upon 'em—

EDGAR The foul fiend bites my back.

FOOL He's mad that trusts in the tameness of a wolf, a horse's health, a boy's love, or a whore's oath.

LEAR It shall be done; I will arraign° them straight.° prosecute / immediately

LEAR I'll see their trial first. Bring in the evidence.
(To EDGAR) Thou robed man of justice, take thy place;
(to the FOOL) And thou, his yoke-fellow of equity,° partner of law
Bench° by his side. (To KENT) You are o' the commission,° sit / judiciary
Sit you too.

EDGAR Let us deal justly.
Sleepest or wakest thou, jolly shepherd?
Thy sheep be in the corn;° grain
And for one blast of thy minikin° mouth,
Thy sheep shall take no harm.
Purr! the cat[6] is gray.

LEAR Arraign her first; 'tis Goneril. I here take my oath before this honorable assembly, she kicked the poor king her father.

[1] Rage; inability to bear more suffering.

[2] In Chaucer's Monk's Tale, the infamously cruel Roman emperor Nero is found fishing in hell.

[3] A free landowner but not a member of the gentry, lacking official family arms and the distinctions they confer. Shakespeare seems to have procured a coat of arms for his father in 1596.

[4] From an old song.

[5] She has venereal disease; punning on "boat" as body and "burn" as genital discomfort.

[6] Purr the cat is another devil; such devils in the shape of cats were the familiars of witches.

FOOL Come hither, mistress. Is your name Goneril?
LEAR She cannot deny it.
FOOL Cry you mercy, I took you for a joint-stool.[7]
LEAR And here's another, whose warped looks proclaim
What store° her heart is made on.° Stop her there! material/of Arms, arms, sword, fire! Corruption in the place!
False justicer, why hast thou let her 'scape?
EDGAR Bless thy five wits!
KENT O pity! Sir, where is the patience now,
That you so oft have boasted to retain?
EDGAR (aside) My tears begin to take his part so much,
They'll mar my counterfeiting.
LEAR The little dogs and all,° even the little dogs
Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, see, they bark at me.

EDGAR Tom will throw his head at° them. Avaunt,° you curs! will threaten (?) / begone

Be thy mouth or° black or white, either
Tooth that poisons° if it bite; gives rabies
Mastiff, greyhound, mongrel grim,
Hound or spaniel, brach° or lym,° bitch / bloodhound
Or bobtail tike or trundle-tail,[8]
Tom will make them weep and wail:
For, with throwing thus my head,
Dogs leap the hatch,[9] and all are fled.

Do de, de, de. Sessa![1] Come, march to wakes° and fairs and market-towns. Poor Tom, thy horn is dry.[2] parish festivals

LEAR Then let them anatomize° Regan; see what breeds about her heart. Is there any cause in nature that makes these hard hearts? (To EDGAR*)* You, sir, I entertain° for one of my hundred; I do not like the fashion of your garments. You will say they are Persian;° but let them be changed. dissect oriental; splendid

KENT Now, good my lord, lie there and rest awhile.
LEAR Make no noise, make no noise; draw the curtains.° bed curtains
So, so, so. We'll go to supper i' the morning.
FOOL And I'll go to bed at noon.

[Re-enter GLOUCESTER]

GLOUCESTER Come hither, friend. Where is the king my master?
KENT Here, sir; but trouble him not; his wits are gone.
GLOUCESTER Good friend, I prithee, take him in thy arms;
I have o'erheard a plot of death upon° him: against
There is a litter ready; lay him in't
And drive° towards Dover, friend, where thou shalt meet hurry
Both welcome and protection. Take up thy master.
If thou shouldst dally half an hour, his life,
With thine, and all that offer to defend him,
Stand in assured loss.° Take up, take up! are certainly doomed

---

[7] "I beg your pardon, I mistook you for a stool." Here the part of Goneril is actually being played by a stool.
[8] Short-tailed mongrel or long-tailed.
[9] Dogs leap over the lower half of a divided door.
[1] Apparently nonsense, although "Sessa" may be a version of the French cessez ("stop" or "hush").
[2] A begging formula that refers to the horn vessel that vagabonds carried for drink; the covert sense is that Edgar has run out of Bedlamite inspiration.

And follow me, that will to some provision
Give thee quick conduct.[3]
KENT Oppressed nature sleeps:
This rest might yet have balmed° thy broken sinews,° soothed. / nerves
Which, if convenience will not allow,
Stand in hard cure.° (To the FOOL) Come, help to bear thy master: will he hard to cure
Thou must not stay behind.
GLOUCESTER Come come, away.

Exeunt all hut EDGAR

EDGAR When we our betters see bearing our° woes, our same
We scarcely think our miseries our foes.
Who alone suffers suffers most i' the mind,
Leaving free° things and happy shows° behind: carefree / scenes
But then the mind much sufferance doth o'erskip
When grief hath mates, and bearing° fellowship. pain, suffering
How light and portable° my pain seems now, supportable
When that which makes me bend makes the king bow;
He° childed as I fathered! Tom, away! he is Mark the high noises,° and thyself bewray° important rumors / reveal
When false opinion, whose wrong thought defiles thee,
In thy just proof repeals and reconciles thee.[4]
What° will hap° more tonight, safe 'scape the king! whatever / chance
Lurk, lurk. Exit

Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GONERIL, EDMUND, and servants

CORNWALL (to GONERIL) Post° speedily to my lord your husband; show him this letter. The army of France is landed. Seek out the villain Gloucester. ride

Exeunt some of the servants

REGAN Hang him instantly.
GONERIL Pluck out his eyes.
CORNWALL Leave him to my displeasure. Edmund, keep you our sister° company. The revenges we are bound[1] to take upon your traitorous father are not fit for your beholding. Advise the duke, where you are going, to a most festinate preparation.[2] We are bound° to the like. Our posts° shall be swift and intelligent° betwixt US. Farewell, dear sister: farewell, my lord of Gloucester. sister-in-law committed messengers/well-informed

Enter OSWALD

How now! Where's the king?
OSWALD My lord of Gloucester hath conveyed him hence.
Some five or six and thirty of his° knights, (Lear's)
Hot questrists° after him, met him at gate; searchers
Who, with some other of the lord's° dependants, (Gloucester's)
Are gone with him towards Dover; where they boast

---

[3] Who will quickly guide you to some supplies.

[4] When true evidence pardons you and reconciles you (with your father).

3.7 Location: At Gloucester's castle.

[1] Bound by duty.

[2] I.e., when you reach Albany, tell the duke to prepare quickly.

To have well-armed friends.
CORNWALL Get horses for your mistress.
GONERIL Farewell, sweet lord, and sister.
CORNWALL Edmund, farewell.
Exeunt GONERIL, EDMUND, and OSWALD
Go seek the traitor Gloucester,
Pinion him° like a thief, bring him before us. tie his arms
Exeunt other servants
Though well we may not pass° upon his life pass sentence
Without the form° of justice, yet our power official proceedings
Shall do a courtesy[3] to our wrath, which men
May blame, but not control. Who's there? the traitor?
Enter GLOUCESTER, brought in by two or three
REGAN Ingrateful fox! 'tis he.
CORNWALL Bind fast his corky° arms. withered
GLOUCESTER What mean your graces? Good my friends, consider
You are my guests. Do me no foul play, friends.
CORNWALL Bind him, I say.
Servants bind him
REGAN Hard, hard. O filthy traitor!
GLOUCESTER Unmerciful lady as you are, I'm none.
CORNWALL To this chair bind him. Villain, thou shalt find-
REGAN plucks his beard° (an extreme insult)
GLOUCESTER By the kind gods, 'tis most ignobly done
To pluck me by the beard.
REGAN So white,° and such a traitor! white-haired; venerable
GLOUCESTER Naughty° lady, wicked
These hairs, which thou dost ravish from my chin,
Will quicken,° and accuse thee. I am your host. come alive
With robbers' hands my hospitable favors° features
You should not ruffle° thus. What will you do? snatch at CORNWALL Come, sir, what letters had you late° from France? lately
REGAN Be simple answered,° for we know the truth. answer straightforwardly
CORNWALL And what confederacy have you with the traitors
Late footed° in the kingdom? landed
REGAN To whose hands have you sent the lunatic king? Speak.
GLOUCESTER I have a letter guessingly set down,[4]
Which came from one that's of a neutral heart,
And not from one opposed.
CORNWALL Cunning.
REGAN And false.
CORNWALL Where hast thou sent the king?
GLOUCESTER To Dover.
REGAN Wherefore° to Dover? Wast thou not charged° at peril— why / commanded [3] Shall allow a courtesy, or indulgence; shall bow to.

[4] Written without confirmation; speculative.

CORNWALL Wherefore to Dover? Let him first answer that.
GLOUCESTER I am tied to the stake, and I must stand the course.[5]
REGAN Wherefore to Dover?
GLOUCESTER Because I would not see thy cruel nails
Pluck out his poor old eyes; nor thy fierce sister
In his anointed[6] flesh stick boarish fangs.
The sea, with such a storm as his bare head
In hell-black night endured, would have buoyed° up, risen
And quenched the stelled° fires. stars'
Yet, poor old heart, he holp° the heavens to rage. helped
If wolves had at thy gate howled that dern° time, dreary; dreadful
Thou shouldst have said "Good porter, turn the key."° (to open the door)
All cruels else subscribed.[7] But I shall see
The winged vengeance[8] overtake such children.
CORNWALL See't shalt thou never. Fellows,° hold the servants
chair.
Upon these eyes of thine I'll set my foot.
GLOUCESTER He that will think° to live till he be old, whoever hopes
Give me some help! O cruel! O ye gods!
REGAN One side will mock another.° The other too! the other
CORNWALL If you see vengeance—
FIRST SERVANT Hold your hand, my lord:
I have served you ever since I was a child;
But better service have I never done you
Than now to bid you hold.
REGAN How now, you dog!
FIRST SERVANT If you did wear a beard upon your chin,
I'd shake it on this quarrel.[9]
REGAN What do you mean?° intend
CORNWALL My villain!° servant; villain
FIRST SERVANT Why, then, come on, and take the chance of anger.[1]
REGAN Give me thy sword. A peasant stand up thus!
CORNWALL is wounded.
Takes a sword, and runs at him behind
FIRST SERVANT O, I am slain! My lord, you have one eye left
To see some mischief° on him. O! Dies injury
CORNWALL Lest it see more, prevent it. Out, vile jelly!
Where is thy luster now?
GLOUCESTER All dark and comfortless. Where's my son Edmund?
Edmund, enkindle all the sparks of nature,[2]
To quit° this horrid act. requite, avenge
REGAN Out, treacherous villain!
Thou call'st on him that hates thee. It was he
That made the overture° of thy treasons to us; revelation

[5] An image from bearbaiting, in which a bear, sometimes blinded, on a short tether had to fight off the assault of dogs.

[6] Consecrated with holy oils (as part of a king's coronation).

[7] All other cruel creatures yielded to compassion.

[8] Swift or heaven-sent revenge; either an angel of God or the Furies, who were flying executors of divine vengeance in classical myth.

[9] I'd pluck it over this point; I'd issue a challenge.

[1] Take the risk of fighting when angry; take the fortune of one who is governed by his anger.

[2] All the warmth of filial love; all the anger that your father has received such treatment.

Who is too good to pity thee.
GLOUCESTER O my follies! Then Edgar was abused.° slandered
Kind gods, forgive me that, and prosper him!
REGAN Go thrust him out at gates, and let him smell
His way to Dover. Exit one with GLOUCESTER
How is't, my lord? how look you?° how do you feel
CORNWALL I have received a hurt. Follow me, lady;
Turn out that eyeless villain. Throw this slave
Upon the dunghill. Regan, I bleed apace.
Untimely comes this hurt. Give me your arm.
Exit CORNWALL led by REGAN
SECOND SERVANT I'll never care what wickedness I do,
If this man come to good.[3]
THIRD SERVANT If she live long,
And in the end meet the old° course of death, usual
Women will all turn monsters.
SECOND SERVANT Let's follow the old earl, and get the Bedlam° madman
To lead him where he would. His roguish madness
Allows itself to anything,
THIRD SERVANT Go thou; I'll fetch some flax and whites of eggs
To apply to his bleeding face. Now, heaven help him!
Exeunt severally

Enter EDGAR

EDGAR Yet better thus, and known to be contemned° despised
Than still° contemned and flattered. To be worst, always
The lowest and most dejected thing of fortune,
Stands still in esperance, lives not in fear.[1]
The lamentable change is from the best;
The worst returns to laughter.[2] Welcome, then,
Thou unsubstantial air that I embrace!
The wretch that thou hast blown unto the worst
Owes nothing° to thy blasts. But who comes here? (because he can't pay)
Enter GLOUCESTER, led by an OLD MAN
My father, parti-eyed?[3] World, world, O world!
But that thy strange mutations make us hate thee,
Life would not yield to age.[4]
OLD MAN O, my good lord, I have been your tenant, and your father's tenant, these fourscore years.
GLOUCESTER Away, get thee away! Good friend, be gone.
Thy comforts° can do me no good at all; assistance
Thee they may hurt.
OLD MAN Alack, sir, you cannot see your way.
GLOUCESTER I have no way, and therefore want no eyes;

---

[3] I.e., because this may be a sign that evil goes unpunished.

4.1 Location: Open country.

[1] Remains in hope ("esperance") because there is no fear of falling further.

[2] The change to be lamented is one that alters the best of circumstances; the worst luck can only improve.

[3] Multicolored like a fool's costume (red with blood under white dressings).

[4] If there were no strange reversals of fortune to make the world hateful, we would not consent to aging and death.

I stumbled when I saw. Full oft 'tis seen,
Our means secure us, and our mere defects
Prove our commodities.[5] O dear son Edgar,
The food° of thy abused° father's wrath! fuel; prey I despised,
Might I but live to see thee in° my touch, through
I'd say I had eyes again!
OLD MAN How now! Who's there?
EDGAR (aside) O gods! Who is't can say "I am at the worst"?
I am worse than e'er I was.
OLD MAN 'Tis poor mad Tom.
EDGAR (aside) And worse I may be yet: the worst is not
So long as we can say "This is the worst."
OLD MAN Fellow, where goest?
GLOUCESTER Is it a beggar-man?
OLD MAN Madman and beggar too.
GLOUCESTER He has some reason, else° he could not beg. otherwise
I' the last night's storm I such a fellow saw;
Which made me think a man a worm. My son
Came then into my mind, and yet my mind
Was then scarce friends with him. I have heard more since.
As flies to wanton° boys are we to the gods; playful; careless
They kill us for their sport.
EDGAR (aside) How should this be?
Bad is the trade that must play fool to sorrow,[6]
Angering itself and others.—Bless thee, master!
GLOUCESTER Is that the naked fellow?
OLD MAN Ay, my lord.
GLOUCESTER Then, prithee, get thee gone. If, for my sake,
Thou wilt o'ertake us, hence a mile or twain,
I' the way toward Dover, do it for ancient love;[7]
And bring some covering for this naked soul,
Who I'll entreat to lead me.
OLD MAN Alack, sir, he is mad.
GLOUCESTER 'Tis the times' plague, when[8] madmen lead the blind.
Do as I bid thee, or rather do thy pleasure;
Above the rest,° be gone. most important
OLD MAN I'll bring him the best 'parel° that I have, apparel
Come on't what will. Exit
GLOUCESTER Sirrah, naked fellow—
EDGAR Poor Tom's a-cold. (Aside) I cannot daub it further.[9]
GLOUCESTER Come hither, fellow.
EDGAR (aside) And yet I must.—Bless thy sweet eyes, they bleed.
GLOUCESTER Know'st thou the way to Dover?
EDGAR Both stile and gate, horse-way and foot-path. Poor
Tom hath been scared out of his good wits. Bless thee, good man's son, from the foul fiend! Five fiends have

---

[5] Our wealth makes us overconfident, and our utter deprivation proves to be beneficial.

[6] It is a bad business to have to play the fool in the face of sorrow.

[7] For the sake of our long and loyal relationship (as master and servant).

[8] The time is truly sick when.

[9] I cannot continue the charade. "Daub": plaster; i.e., mask.

been in Poor Tom at once; of lust, as Obidicut; Hobbi-didance, prince of dumbness; Mahu, of stealing; Modo, of murder; Flibbertigibbet, of mopping and mowing,[0] who making faces since possesses chambermaids and waiting-women. So, bless thee, master!

GLOUCESTER Here, take this purse, thou whom the heavens' plagues
Have humbled to all strokes.[0] That I am wretched to accept all blows
Makes thee the happier. Heavens, deal so still![0] always
Let the superfluous and lust-dieted man,[1]
That slaves your ordinance,[2] that will not see
Because he doth not feel, feel your power quickly;
So distribution should undo excess,
And each man have enough. Dost thou know Dover?

EDGAR Ay, master.

GLOUCESTER There is a cliff, whose high and bending[0] head overhanging
Looks fearfully in the confined deep.[3]
Bring me but to the very brim of it,
And I'll repair the misery thou dost bear
With something rich about me. From that place
I shall no leading need.

EDGAR Give me thy arm.
Poor Tom shall lead thee. Exeunt

4.2

Enter GONERIL and EDMUND

GONERIL Welcome, my lord. I marvel our mild husband
Not[0] met us on the way. has not

Enter OSWALD

Now where's your master?

OSWALD Madam, within, but never man so changed.
I told him of the army that was landed;
He smiled at it. I told him you were coming;
His answer was "The worse." Of Gloucester's treachery,
And of the loyal service of his son,
When I informed him, then he called me sot,° fool
And told me I had turned the wrong side out.[1]
What most he should dislike seems pleasant to him;
What like, offensive.

GONERIL (to EDMUND*)* Then shall you go no further.
It is the cowish[0] terror of his spirit, cowardly
That dares not undertake. He'll not feel wrongs
Which tie him to an answer.[2] Our wishes on the way
May prove effects.[3] Back, Edmund, to my brother;[0] brother-in-law
Hasten his musters[0] and conduct his powers.[0] call-up of troops / armies
I must change arms at home, and give the distaff[4]
Into my husband's hands. This trusty servant

[1] Let the overprosperous man who indulges his appetite.

[2] Makes your law subject to him.

[3] Looks fearsomely into the straits below.

4.2 Location: Before Albany's castle.

[1] I had reversed things (by mistaking loyalty for treachery).

[2] He'll ignore insults that should provoke him to retaliate.

[3] May be put into action.

[4] A device used in spinning and thus emblematic of the female role.

Shall pass between us. Ere long you are like° to hear, likely
If you dare venture in your own behalf,
A mistress's° command. Wear this; spare speech; (playing on "lover's") (giving a favor)
Decline your head. This kiss, if it durst speak,
Would stretch thy spirits up into the air.
Conceive,° and fare thee well. understand, my meaning
EDMUND Yours in° the ranks of death. even in GONERIL My most dear Gloucester!
Exit EDMUND
O, the difference of man and man!
To thee a woman's services are due:
My fool usurps my body.[5]
OSWALD Madam, here comes my lord. Exit
Enter ALBANY
GONERIL I have been worth the whistling.[6]
ALBANY O Goneril!
You are not worth the dust which the rude wind
Blows in your face. I fear your disposition.
That nature, which contemns it° origin, despises its
Cannot be bordered certain° in itself. be defended securely
She that herself will sliver and disbranch° split
From her material sap, perforce must wither
And come to deadly use.[7]
GONERIL No more; the text is foolish.
ALBANY Wisdom and goodness to the vile seem vile;
Filths savor but themselves. What have you done?
Tigers, not daughters, what have you performed?
A father, and a gracious aged man,
Whose reverence even the head-lugged° bear would lick, dragged by the head
Most barbarous, most degenerate, have you madded.
Could my good brother° suffer you to do it? brother-in-law
A man, a prince, by him so benefited!
If that the heavens do not their visible spirits
Send quickly down to tame these vild° offenses, vile
It will come,
Humanity must perforce° prey on itself, inevitably
Like monsters of the deep.
GONERIL Milk-livered° man! cowardly
That bear'st a cheek for blows, a head for wrongs:[8]
Who hast not in thy brows an eye discerning
Thine honor from thy suffering;[9] that not know'st
Fools do those villains pity who are punished
Ere they have done their mischief. Where's thy drum?° (to muster troops)
France spreads his banners in our noiseless° land, peaceful

---

[5] My idiot husband presumes to possess me.

[6] I.e., at one time, you would have come to welcome me home; referring to the proverb "It is a poor dog that is not worth the whistling."

[7] Be destroyed; be used for burning. The allusion is probably biblical: "But that which beareth thorns and briers is reproved, and is near unto cursing; whose end is to be burned" (Hebrews 6.8).

[8] Fit for abuse; ready for cuckold's horns.

[9] That can distinguish between an insult to your honor and something you should patiently endure.

With plumed helm thy state begins to threat;
Whiles thou, a moral° fool, sit'st still, and criest moralizing
"Alack, why does he so?"
ALBANY See thyself, devil!
Proper deformity shows not in the fiend
So horrid as in woman.[1]
GONERIL O vain° fool! useless
ALBANY Thou changed and self-covered[2] thing, for shame,
Be-monster not thy feature. Were't my fitness° if it were appropriate
To let these hands obey my blood,
They are apt enough to dislocate and tear
Thy flesh and bones. Howe'er° thou art a fiend, although
A woman's shape doth shield thee.
GONERIL Marry, your manhood! mew![3]

Enter a MESSENGER

ALBANY What news?
MESSENGER O, my good lord, the Duke of Cornwall's dead;
Slain by his servant, going to put out
The other eye of Gloucester.
ALBANY Gloucester's eyes?
MESSENGER A servant that he bred, thrilled with remorse, pierced by pity
Opposed against the act, bending° his sword directing
To° his great master; who, thereat enraged, against
Flew on him, and amongst them felled him dead;
But not without that harmful stroke, which since
Hath plucked him after.[4]
ALBANY This shows you are above,
You justicers,° that these our nether crimes judges
So speedily can venge! But, O poor Gloucester!
Lost he his other eye?
MESSENGER Both, both, my lord.
This letter, madam, craves a speedy answer;
'Tis from your sister.
GONERIL (aside) One way I like this well;[6]
But being° a widow, and my Gloucester with her, her being
May all the building in my fancy pluck
Upon my hateful life.[7] Another way,
The news is not so tart.°—I'll read, and answer. Exit bitter
ALBANY Where was his son when they did take his eyes?
MESSENGER Come with my lady hither.
ALBANY He is not here.
MESSENGER No, my good lord; I met him back° again. returning
ALBANY Knows he the wickedness?
MESSENGER Ay, my good lord; 'twas he informed against him;

---

[1] Deformity (of morals) is appropriate in the devil and so less horrid than in woman (from whom virtue is expected). Albany may hold a mirror in front of Goneril, since Jacobean women sometimes wore small mirrors attached to their dresses.

[2] Altered and with your true (womanly) self concealed.

[3] A derisive catcall. "Marry": By the Virgin Mary.

[4] Has sent him to follow his servant into death.

[5] Lower crimes, and so committed on earth, but also suggesting that the deeds smack of the netherworld of hell.

[6] Because a political rival has been eliminated.

[7] May pull down all of my built-up fantasies and thus make my life hateful.

And quit the house on purpose, that their punishment
Might have the freer course.
ALBANY Gloucester, I live
To thank thee for the love thou show'dst the king,
And to revenge thine eyes. Come hither, friend.
Tell me what more thou know'st. Exeunt

4.3

Enter KENT and a GENTLEMAN

KENT Why the King of France is so suddenly gone back know you the reason?

GENTLEMAN Something he left imperfect° in the state, which since his coming forth is thought of;° which imports° to the kingdom so much fear and danger, that his personal return was most required and necessary. unsetded remembered portends

KENT Who hath he left behind him general?

GENTLEMAN The Marshall of France, Monsieur LaFar.

KENT Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief?

GENTLEMAN Ay, sir. She took them, in my presence;
And now and then an ample tear trilled down
Her delicate cheek. It seemed she was a queen Over her passion, who,° most rebel-like, which Sought to be king o'er her.
KENT O, then it moved her.
GENTLEMAN Not to a rage. Patience and sorrow strove
Who should express her goodliest.[1] You have seen
Sunshine and rain at once: her smiles and tears
Were like a° better way. Those happy smilets, were similar in a
That played on her ripe lip, seemed not to know
What guests were in her eyes, which parted thence,
As pearls from diamonds dropped. In brief,
Sorrow would be a rarity° most beloved, gem
If all could so become it.[2]
KENT Made she no verbal question?
GENTLEMAN 'Faith, once or twice she heaved the name of "father"
Pantingly forth, as if it pressed her heart;
Cried "Sisters! sisters! Shame of ladies! sisters!
Kent! father! sisters! What, i' the storm? i' the night?
Let pity not be believed!"[3] There she shook
The holy water from her heavenly eyes,
And clamor moistened.[4] Then away she started° sprang
To deal with grief alone.
KENT It is the stars,
The stars above us, govern our conditions;
Else one self mate and make[5] could not beget
Such different issues.° You spoke not with her since? offspring
GENTLEMAN No.

4.3 Location: Near the French camp at Dover.
[1] Which should better express her feelings.
[2] If everyone wore it so beautifully.
[3] Never believe in pity; compassion cannot exist.
[4] And moistened her anguish (with tears).
[5] Or else the same pair of spouses.

KENT Was this before the king returned?
GENTLEMAN No, since.
KENT Well, sir, the poor distressed Lear's i' the town;
Who sometime, in his better tune,° remembers state of mind.
What we are come about, and by no means
Will yield° to see his daughter. consent
GENTLEMAN Why, good sir?
KENT A sovereign shame so elbows° him; his own unkindness, prods, nudges
That stripped her from his benediction, turned her
To foreign casualties,° gave her dear rights risks
To his dog-hearted daughters, these things sting
His mind so venomously, that burning shame
Detains him from Cordelia.
GENTLEMAN Alack, poor gentleman!
KENT Of Albany's and Cornwall's powers° you heard not? armies
GENTLEMAN 'Tis so, they are afoot.
KENT Well, sir, I'll bring you to our master Lear,
And leave you to attend him. Some dear cause° some important reason
Will in concealment wrap me up awhile;
When I am known aright, you shall not grieve° repent
Lending me this acquaintance.° I pray you, go news
Along with me. Exeunt

4.4

Enter, with drum and colors, CORDELIA, DOCTOR, and soldiers

CORDELIA Alack, 'tis he! Why, he was met even now
As mad as the vexed sea; singing aloud;
Crowned with rank fumiter and furrow-weeds,[1]
With hor-docks, hemlock, nettles, cuckoo-flowers,
Darnel, and all the idle° weeds that grow useless
In our sustaining corn.° A century° send forth; grain / battalion (100 men)
Search every acre in the high-grown field,
And bring him to our eye. Exit an officer
What can man's wisdom
In the restoring° his bereaved sense? do to restore
He that helps him take all my outward° worth. material
DOCTOR There is means, madam.
Our foster-nurse of nature[2] is repose,
The which he lacks. That to provoke in him,
Are many simples operative,[3] whose power
Will close the eye of anguish.
CORDELIA All blest secrets,
All you unpublished virtues° of the earth, obscure healing plants
Spring with my tears! be aidant and remediate° healing and remedial
In the good man's distress! Seek, seek for him;
Lest his ungoverned rage dissolve the life

4.4 Location: The French camp at Dover.

[1] Fumiter was used against brain sickness. Furrow-weeds, like the other weeds in the following lines, grow in the furrows of plowed fields.

[2] That which comforts and nourishes human nature.

[3] To induce that ("repose") in him, there are many effective medicinal herbs.

That wants° the means to lead it. lacks
Enter a MESSENGER
MESSENGER News, madam;
The British powers° are marching hitherward.
CORDELIA 'Tis known before; our preparation stands
In expectation of them. O dear father,
It is thy business that I go about;[4]
Therefore great France
My mourning and importuned° tears hath pitied. importunate; solicitous
No blown° ambition doth our arms incite, inflated
But love, dear love, and our aged father's right.
Soon may I hear and see him! Exeunt

Enter REGAN and OSWALD
REGAN But are my brother's powers° set forth? (Albany's forces)
OSWALD Ay, madam.
REGAN Himself in person there?
OSWALD Madam, with much ado.° trouble
Your sister is the better soldier.
REGAN Lord Edmund spake not with your lord at home?
OSWALD No, madam.
REGAN What might import° my sister's letter to him?
OSWALD I know not, lady.
REGAN Faith, he is posted° hence on serious matter. hurried
It was great ignorance, Gloucester's eyes being out,
To let him live. Where he arrives he moves
All hearts against us. Edmund, I think, is gone,
In pity of his misery,[3] to dispatch (ironic)
His nighted° life; moreover, to descry° darkened / investigate
The strength o' the enemy.
OSWALD I must needs after° him, madam, with my letter. go after
REGAN Our troops set forth tomorrow. Stay with us;
The ways are dangerous.
OSWALD I may not, madam:
My lady charged° my duty in this business. commanded
REGAN Why should she write to Edmund? Might not you Transport her purposes by word? Belike,° perhaps Something—I know not what. I'll love° thee much, reward
Let me unseal the letter.
OSWALD Madam, I had rather—
REGAN I know your lady does not love her husband;
I am sure of that; and at her late° being here recently
She gave strange oeillades° and most speaking looks amorous glances
To noble Edmund. I know you are of her bosom.° in her confidence
OSWALD I, madam?
REGAN I speak in understanding;° y'are, I know't. with certainty
Therefore I do advise you, take this note:° take note of this
My lord is dead; Edmund and I have talked;

[4] The line echoes Christ's explanation of his mission in Luke 2.49: "I must be about my Father's business."

4.5 Location: At Gloucester's castle,

And more convenient° is he for my hand appropriate
Than for your lady's. You may gather° more. infer
If you do find him, pray you, give him this;[1]
And when your mistress hears thus much from you,
I pray, desire her call her wisdom to her.[2]
So, fare you well.
If you do chance to hear of that blind traitor,
Preferment falls on him that cuts him off.° cuts his life short
OSWALD Would I could meet him, madam! I should show
What party I do follow.
REGAN Fare thee well. Exeunt

Enter GLOUCESTER, and EDGAR dressed like a peasant

GLOUCESTER When shall we come to the top of that same° hill? agreed-upon
EDGAR You do climb up it now. Look how we labor.
GLOUCESTER Methinks the ground is even.
EDGAR Horrible steep.
Hark, do you hear the sea?
GLOUCESTER No, truly.
EDGAR Why, then, your other senses grow imperfect
By your eyes' anguish.
GLOUCESTER So may it be, indeed.
Methinks thy voice is altered, and thou speakest
In better phrase and matter° than thou didst. sense
EDGAR Y'are much deceived. In nothing am I changed
But in my garments.
GLOUCESTER Methinks y'are better spoken.
EDGAR Come on, sir; here's the place. Stand still. How fearful
And dizzy 'tis, to cast one's eyes so low!
The crows and choughs° that wing the midway air jackdaws
Show° scarce so gross° as beetles. Halfway down appear / big Hangs one that gathers sampire,[1] dreadful trade!
Methinks he seems no bigger than his head.
The fishermen, that walk upon the beach,
Appear like mice; and yond tall anchoring bark,° ship
Diminished to her cock;° her cock, a buoy dinghy
Almost too small for sight. The murmuring surge,
That on the unnumbered° idle pebble chafes, innumerable
Cannot be heard so high. I'll look no more,
Lest my brain turn, and the° deficient sight my
Topple° down headlong. topple me
GLOUCESTER Set me where you stand.
EDGAR Give me your hand. You are now within a foot
Of th' extreme verge. For all beneath the moon
Would I not leap upright.[2]
GLOUCESTER Let go my hand.

[1] This information, but possibly another letter or token.
[2] Tell her to come to her senses.
4.6 Location: Near Dover.
[1] Samphire: a plant that grows on rocks by the sea; used in making pickles.
[2] I would not jump up and down (for fear of losing my balance).

Here, friend, 's another purse; in it a jewel
Well worth a poor man's taking. Fairies and gods
Prosper it[3] with thee! Go thou farther off;
Bid me farewell, and let me hear thee going.
EDGAR Now fare you well, good sir.
GLOUCESTER With all my heart.
EDGAR (aside) Why I do trifle thus with his despair
Is done to cure it.
GLOUCESTER (kneeling) O you mighty gods!
This world I do renounce, and, in your sights,
Shake patiently my great affliction off.
If I could bear it longer, and not fall
To quarrel[0] with your great opposeless wills, into conflict
My snuff and loathed part of nature[4] should Burn itself out. If Edgar live, O, bless him!
Now, fellow, fare thee well.
He falls forward and swoons
EDGAR Gone, sir; farewell.—
And yet I know not how conceit may rob
The treasury of life, when life itself
Yields to the theft.[5] Had he been where he thought,
By this[0] had thought been past. Alive or dead? now
Ho, you sir! friend! Hear you, sir? speak!
Thus might he pass[0] indeed. Yet he revives. pass away
What are you, sir?
GLOUCESTER Away, and let me die.
EDGAR Hadst thou been aught[0] but gossamer, feathers, air, anything
So many fathom down precipitating,[0] plunging
Thou'dst shivered[0] like an egg; but thou dost breathe; shattered
Hast heavy substance; bleed'st not; speak'st; art sound.
Ten masts at each[0] make not the altitude end to end
Which thou hast perpendicularly fell.
Thy life's a miracle. Speak yet again.
GLOUCESTER But have I fallen, or no?
EDGAR From the dread summit of this chalky bourn.[6]
Look up a-height; the shrill-gorged[0] lark so far shrill-throated
Cannot be seen or heard. Do but look up.
GLOUCESTER Alack, I have no eyes.
Is wretchedness deprived[0] that benefit, deprived of
To end itself by death? 'Twas yet some comfort,
When misery could beguile[0] the tyrant's rage, cheat
And frustrate his proud will.
EDGAR Give me your arm.
Up—so. How is't? Feel you your legs? You stand.
GLOUCESTER Too well, too well.
EDGAR This is above all strangeness.

---

[3] Make it increase. Fairies were sometimes held to hoard and multiply treasure.

[4] The scorched and hateful remnant of my lifetime. "Snuff": end of a candle wick.

[5] Edgar worries that the imagined scenario ("conceit") he has invented may be enough to kill his father, particularly as Gloucester wishes for ("yields to") his own death.

[6] The white chalk cliffs of Dover, which make a boundary ("bourn") between land and sea.

Upon the crown o' the cliff, what thing was that
Which parted from you?
GLOUCESTER A poor unfortunate beggar.
EDGAR As I stood here below, methought his eyes
Were two full moons; he had a thousand noses,
Horns whelked° and waved like the enridged sea: twisted
It was some fiend. Therefore, thou happy father,° lucky old man
Think that the clearest° gods, who make them honors purest; most illustrious
Of men's impossibilities,[7] have preserved thee.
GLOUCESTER I do remember now. Henceforth I'll bear
Affliction till it do cry out itself
"Enough, enough," and die. That thing you speak of,
I took it for a man; often 'twould say
"The fiend, the fiend"—he led me to that place.
EDGAR Bear free and patient thoughts. But who comes here?

Enter LEAR, fantastically dressed with wild flowers

The safer sense will ne'er accommodate
His master thus.[8]

LEAR NO, they cannot touch me for coining;[9] I am the king himself.

EDGAR O thou side-piercing sight!

LEAR Nature's above art in that respect.[1] There's your press-money.[2] That fellow handles his bow like a crow-keeper.[3] Draw me a clothier's yard.[4] Look, look, a mouse! Peace, peace; this piece of toasted cheese will do't.° (lure the mouse) There's my gauntlet; I'll prove it on a giant.[5] Bring up the brown bills.[6] O, well flown, bird!° i' the clout,° i' the clout. arrow / bull's-eye Hewgh! Give the word.° password

EDGAR Sweet marjoram.[7]

LEAR Pass.

GLOUCESTER I know that voice.

LEAR Ha! Goneril, with a white beard! They flattered me like a dog;° fawningly and told me I had white hairs in my beard ere the black ones were there.[8] To say "aye" and "no" to everything that I said!—"Aye" and "no" too was no good divinity.[9] When the rain came to wet me once, and the wind to make me chatter; when the thunder would not peace at my bidding; there I found° 'em, there I smelt 'em out. understood Go to, they are not men o' their words! They told me I was everything. 'Tis a lie, I am not ague-proof.° immune to illness

[7] Who attain honor for themselves by performing deeds impossible to men.

[8] A sane mind would never allow its possessor to dress up this way.

[9] Cannot equal me (or, perhaps, censure me), because minting money was the prerogative of the king.

[1] My true feelings will always outvalue others' hypocrisy; my natural supremacy surpasses any attempt to create a false new reign. This image may also be based on coining (see preceding note).

[2] Fee paid to a soldier impressed, or forced, into the army.

[3] A person hired as a scarecrow, and thus unfit for anything else.

[4] Draw the bowstring the full length of the arrow (a standard English arrow was a cloth yard—thirty-seven inches—long).

[5] I'll defend my stand even against a giant. To throw down an armored glove ("gauntlet") was to issue a challenge.

[6] Brown painted pikes; or, the soldiers carrying them.

[7] Used medicinally against madness.

[8] I.e., told me I had wisdom before age.

[9] I.e., poor theology (because insincere); from James 5.12, "Let your yea be yea; nay, nay."

GLOUCESTER The trick° of that voice I do well remember. peculiarity
Is't not the king?
LEAR Aye, every inch a king!
When I do stare, see how the subject quakes.
I pardon that man's life. What was thy cause?°
Adultery?
Thou shalt not die. Die for adultery? No.
The wren goes to't, and the small gilded fly
Does lecher in my sight.
Let copulation thrive; for Gloucester's bastard son
Was kinder to his father than my daughters
Got 'tween the lawful sheets. To't luxury,° pell-mell! lechery
For I lack soldiers. Behold yond simpering dame,
Whose face between her forks presages snow;[1]
That minces° virtue, and does shake the head affects
To hear of° pleasure's name; even of
The fitchew, nor the soiled horse,[2] goes to't
With a more riotous appetite.
Down from the waist they are Centaurs,[3]
Though women all above.
But° to the girdle° do the gods inherit.° only / waist / own
Beneath is all the fiends'; there's hell,[4] there's darkness,
There's the sulphurous pit, burning, scalding,
Stench, consumption! Fie, fie, fie! pah! pah!
Give me an ounce of civet,[5] good apothecary,
To sweeten my imagination.
There's money for thee.
GLOUCESTER O, let me kiss that hand!
LEAR Let me wipe it first; it smells of mortality.
GLOUCESTER O ruined piece° of nature! This great world masterpiece
Shall so wear out to nought.[6] Dost thou know me?
LEAR I remember thine eyes well enough. Dost thou squiny° at me? No, do thy worst, blind Cupid; I'll not love. squint
Read thou this challenge; mark but the penning of it.
GLOUCESTER Were all the letters suns, I could not see one.
EDGAR (aside) I would not take° this from report. It is, believe
And my heart breaks at it.
LEAR Read.
GLOUCESTER What, with the case° of eyes? socket
LEAR O, ho, are you there with me?[7] No eyes in your head, nor no money in your purse? Your eyes are in a heavy case,[8] your purse in a light. Yet you see how this world goes.
GLOUCESTER I see it feelingly.° by touch; painfully

[1] Whose expression implies cold chastity. "Face" refers to the area between her legs ("forks"), as well as to her literal facial expression as framed by the aristocratic lady's starched headpiece, also called a "fork."

[2] Neither the polecat nor a horse full of fresh grass.

[3] Lecherous mythological creatures that have a human body to the waist and the legs and torso of a horse below.

[4] Shakespeare's frequent term for female genitals.

[5] Exotic perfume derived from the sex glands of the civet cat.

[6] Shall decay to nothing in the same way. In Renaissance philosophy, humans were perfectly analogous to the cosmos, standing for the whole in miniature.

[7] Is that what you are telling me?

[8] In a sad condition; playing on "case" as "sockets."

LEAR What, art mad? A man may see how this world goes with no eyes. Look with thine ears. See how yond justice rails upon yond simple[0] thief. Hark, in thine ear. Change lowly; innocent places and, handy-dandy,[9] which is the justice, which is the thief? Thou hast seen a farmer's dog bark at a beggar?

GLOUCESTER Aye, sir.

LEAR And the creature[0] run from the cur? There thou wretch mightst behold the great image of authority: a dog's obeyed in office.
Thou rascal beadle,[1] hold[0] thy bloody hand! restrain
Why dost thou lash that whore? Strip thine own back;
Thou hotly lusts to use her in that kind[0] way
For which thou whipp'st her. The usurer hangs the cozener.[2]
Through tattered clothes small vices do appear;
Robes and furred gowns hide all. Plate[0] sin with gold, armor; gild
And the strong lance of justice hurtless[0] breaks; harmlessly
Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw does pierce it.
None does offend, none, I say, none; I'll able[0] 'em; authorize
Take that of me, my friend, who have the power
To seal the accuser's lips. Get thee glass eyes;
And, like a scurvy politician,[3] seem
To see the things thou dost not. Now, now, now, now!
Pull off my boots. Harder, harder! So.

EDGAR O, matter and impertinency[0] mixed! and nonsense
Reason in madness!

LEAR If thou wilt weep my fortunes, take my eyes.
I know thee well enough; thy name is Gloucester:
Thou must be patient. We came crying hither^
Thou knows't, the first time that we smell the air,
We wail and cry. I will preach to thee. Mark.[0] give heed

LEAR takes off his crown of weeds and flowers[4]

GLOUCESTER Alack, alack the day!

LEAR When we are born, we cry that we are come
To this great stage of fools. This'[0] a good block;[5] this is
It were a delicate[0] stratagem, to shoe subtle
A troop of horse with felt.[6] I'll put't in proof;[0] to the test
And when I have stol'n upon these sons-in-law,
Then, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!

Enter a GENTLEMAN, with attendants

GENTLEMAN O, here he is; lay hand upon him. Sir,
Your most dear daughter—

LEAR NO rescue? What, a prisoner? I am even
The natural fool[7] of fortune. Use° me well;

---

[9] Pick a hand, as in a child's game.

[1] The parish officer responsible for whippings.

[2] The ruinous moneylender, prosperous enough to be made a judge, convicts the ordinary cheat.

[3] A vile schemer. In early modern England, "politician" meant an ambitious, even Machiavellian, upstart.

[4] Like a preacher, removing his hat in the pulpit.

[5] Stage (often called "scaffold" and hence linked to executioner's block); block used to shape a felt hat (such as the hat removed by a preacher before a sermon); mounting block (such as the stump or stock Lear may have sat on to remove his boots).

[6] Hat material, to muffle the sound of the approaching cavalry.

[7] Born plaything; playing on "natural" as "mentally deficient."

You shall have ransom. Let me have surgeons;
I am cut to the brains.
GENTLEMAN You shall have anything.
LEAR No seconds?° all myself? sup-porters
Why, this would make a man a man of salt,[8]
To use his eyes for garden water-pots,
Aye, and laying° autumn's dust. settling
GENTLEMAN Good sir—
LEAR I will die bravely,[9] like a smug° bridegroom. What! an elegant
I will be jovial. Come, come; I am a king,
My masters, know you that?
GENTLEMAN You are a royal one, and we obey you.
LEAR Then there's life° in't. Nay, if you get it, you shall get hope it with running. Sa, sa, sa, sa.[1]
(Exit running; attendants follow)
GENTLEMAN A sight most pitiful in the meanest wretch,
Past speaking of in a king! Thou hast one daughter,
Who redeems nature from the general curse
Which twain have brought her to.[2]
EDGAR Hail, gentle° sir. noble
GENTLEMAN Sir, speed you.° What's your will? God speed you
EDGAR Do you hear aught, sir, of a battle toward?° coming
GENTLEMAN Most sure and vulgar.° Everyone hears that, commonly known
Which° can distinguish sound. who
EDGAR But, by your favor,
How near's the other army?
GENTLEMAN Near and on speedy foot. The main descry° appearance
Stands on the hourly thought.° is expected forthwith
EDGAR I thank you, sir. That's all.
GENTLEMAN Though that the queen on° special cause° is for/reason
here,
Her army is moved on.
EDGAR I thank you, sir.
Exit GENTLEMAN
GLOUCESTER You ever-gentle gods, take my breath from me;
Let not my worser spirit[3] tempt me again
To die before you please!
EDGAR Well pray you, father.[4]
GLOUCESTER Now, good sir, what are you?
EDGAR A most poor man, made tame to fortune's blows;
Who, by the art of known and feeling° sorrows, profound
Am pregnant to° good pity. Give me your hand, disposed to feel
I'll lead you to some biding.° resting place
GLOUCESTER Hearty thanks.
The bounty and the benison of heaven

---

[8] A man reduced to nothing but the salt his tears deposit.

[9] With courage; showily. "Die" plays on the Renaissance sense of "have an orgasm."

[1] A cry to encourage dogs in the hunt.

[2] I.e., who restores proper meaning and order to a universe plagued by the crimes of the other two daughters; alluding to the fall of humankind and the natural world caused by the sin of Adam and Eve and to the universal redemption brought about by Christ's sacrifice.

[3] Wicked inclination; bad angel.

[4] A term of respect for an elderly man.

To boot, and boot!° as well, what's more

Enter OSWALD

OSWALD A proclaimed prize![5] Most happy!° lucky
That eyeless head of thine was first framed° flesh made of
To raise my fortunes. Thou old unhappy traitor,
Briefly thyself remember.[6] The sword is out
That must destroy thee.

GLOUCESTER Now let thy friendly hand
Put strength enough to't.

EDGAR interposes

OSWALD Wherefore, bold peasant,
Darest thou support a published° traitor? Hence, •proclaimed
Lest that the infection° of his fortune take (deathly) sickness
Like° hold on thee. Let go his arm. the same

EDGAR Chill[7] not let go, zir, without vurther 'casion.° further occasion

OSWALD Let go, slave, or thou diest!

EDGAR Good gentleman, go your gait,° and let poor volk pass. An chud ha'° bin zwaggered out of my life, 'twould not ha' bin zo long as 'tis by a vortnight. Nay, come not near th'old man; keep out, che vor ye, or ise try whether your costard or my ballow be the harder.[8] Chill be plain with you. walk on if I could have

OSWALD Out, dunghill!

EDGAR Chill pick your teeth, zir. Come! No matter vor your foins.° sword thrusts

They fight, and EDGAR knocks him down

OSWALD Slave, thou hast slain me. Villain, take my purse.
If ever thou wilt° thrive, bury my body; you wish to
And give the letters which thou find'st about me
To Edmund earl of Gloucester. Seek him out Upon° the British party. O, untimely death! within Death! He dies

EDGAR I know thee well: a serviceable° villain; an officious
As duteous to the vices of thy mistress
As badness would desire.

GLOUCESTER What, is he dead?

EDGAR Sit you down, father; rest you.
Let's see his pockets; the letters that he speaks of
May be my friends. He's dead; I am only sorry
He had no other death'sman.° Let us see. executioner
Leave,° gentle wax;[9] and manners, blame us not. by your leave
To know our enemies' minds, we'd rip their hearts;
Their° papers, is more lawful. to rip their (Reads) "Let our reciprocal vows be remembered. You have many opportunities to cut him off. If your will want° not, time and place will be fruitfully offered. There is nothing done,° if he return the conqueror. Then am I the lacks accomplished

[5] A wanted man, with a bounty on his life.
[6] Recollect and pray forgiveness for your sins.
[7] I will; dialect from Somerset was a stage convention for peasant dialogue.
[8] I warn you, or I shall test whether your head or my cudgel is harder. "Costard": a kind of apple.
[9] The wax seal on the letter.

whereof deliver me, and supply° the place for your labor.[1] fill
Your—wife, so I would say—
Affectionate servant,
Goneril."

0 undistinguished space of woman's will![2]
A plot upon her virtuous husband's life;
And the exchange° my brother! Here, in the sands, svibstitute
Thee I'll rake up,° the post unsanctified° cover up / unholy messenger
Of murderous lechers; and in the mature time° when the time is ripe
With this ungracious° paper strike the sight ungodly
Of the death-practiced duke.[3] For him 'tis well
That of thy death and business I can tell.
GLOUCESTER The king is mad. How stiff is my vile sense,[4]
That I stand up, and have ingenious feeling[5]
Of my huge sorrows! Better I were distract;° mad
So should my thoughts be severed from my griefs,
And woes by wrong° imaginations lose false
The knowledge of themselves.
Drum afar off
EDGAR Give me your hand.
Far off, methinks, I hear the beaten drum.
Come, father, I'll bestow° you with a friend. Exeunt lodge

4.7

Enter CORDELIA, KENT, DOCTOR, and a GENTLEMAN
CORDELIA O thou good Kent, how shall I live and work,
To match thy goodness? My life will be too short,
And every measure° fail me. attempt
KENT To be acknowledged, madam, is o'erpaid.° is more than enough
All my reports go[1] with the modest truth;
Nor more, nor clipped, but so.[2]
CORDELIA Be better suited.° attired
These weeds° are memories of those worser hours. clothes
1 prithee, put them off.
KENT Pardon me, dear madam;
Yet to be known shortens my made intent.[3]
My boon I make it,[4] that you know° me not acknowledge
Till time and I think meet.° suitable
CORDELIA Then be't so, my good lord. (To the DOCTOR)
How does the king?
DOCTOR Madam, sleeps still.
CORDELIA O you kind gods,
Cure this great breach in his abused nature!
The untuned and jarring senses, O, wand up[5]

---

[1] As a reward for your endeavors; for sexual exertion.
[2] Limitless extent of woman's willfullness. As with "hell" in line 125, "will" might also refer to a woman's genitals.
[3] Of the duke whose death is plotted.
[4] How obstinate is my unwanted power of reason.
[5] That I remain upright and firm in my sanity and have rational perceptions.

4.7 Location: The French camp at Dover.
[1] May all accounts of me agree.
[2] Not greater or less, but exactly the modest amount I deserve.
[3] Revealing myself now would abort my designs.
[4] The reward I beg is.
[5] Reorder his confused and delirious mind. The image is of tightening the strings of a lute.

Of this child-changed[6] father!
DOCTOR So please your majesty
That we may wake the king? He hath slept long.
CORDELIA Be governed by your knowledge, and proceed
I' the sway° of your own will. Is he arrayed?° by the authority /clothed
Enter LEAR in a chair carried by servants
GENTLEMAN Aye, madam. In the heaviness of his sleep
We put fresh garments on him.
DOCTOR Be by, good madam, when we do awake him;
I doubt not of his temperance.° calmness
CORDELIA Very well.
Music
DOCTOR Please you, draw near. Louder the music there!
CORDELIA O my dear father! Restoration hang
Thy medicine on my lips; and let this kiss
Repair those violent harms that my two sisters
Have in thy reverence° made! aged dignity
KENT Kind and dear princess!
CORDELIA Had you not° been their father, these white even if you had not flakes° locks of hair
Had challenged° pity of them. Was this a face would have provoked
To be opposed against the warring winds?
To stand against the deep dread-bolted thunder?
In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick, cross lightning? to watch°—poor perdu![7]— to stand guard
With this thin helm?° Mine enemy's dog, helmet (of hair)
Though he had bit me, should have stood that night
Against my fire; and wast thou fain,° poor father,
To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn,
In short° and musty straw? Alack, alack! scant; broken
'Tis wonder that thy life and wits at once
Had not concluded all.° He wakes; speak to him. altogether
DOCTOR Madam, do you; 'tis fittest.
CORDELIA How does my royal lord? How fares your majesty?
LEAR You do me wrong to take me out o' the grave.
Thou art a soul in bliss; but I am bound
Upon a wheel of fire, that mine own tears
Do scald like molten lead.[8]
CORDELIA Sir, do you know me?
LEAR You are a spirit, I know. When did you die?
CORDELIA Still, Still, far wide!° unbalanced
DOCTOR He's scarce awake. Let him alone awhile.
LEAR Where have I been? Where am I? Fair daylight?
I am mightily abused.° I should e'en die with pity, wronged; deceived
To see another thus. I know not what to say.
I will not swear these are my hands. Let's see.
I feel this pin prick. Would I were assured
Of my condition!

---

[6] Changed by his children; changed into a child; playing on a musical key-change.

[7] Lost one; in military terminology, a dangerously exposed sentry.

[8] Lear puts himself in either hell or purgatory, both places of such punishment in medieval accounts.

CORDELIA O, look upon me, sir,
And hold your hands in benediction o'er me:
No, sir, you must not kneel.
LEAR Pray, do not mock me.
I am a very foolish fond° old man, silly
Fourscore and upward, not an hour more nor less;
And, to deal plainly,
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.
Methinks I should know you, and know this man;
Yet I am doubtful; for I am mainly° ignorant entirely
What place this is; and all the skill I have Remembers not these garments; nor I know not
Where I did lodge last night. Do not laugh at me;
For, as I am a man, I think this lady
To be my child Cordelia.
CORDELIA And so I am, I am.
LEAR Be your tears wet?[9] Yes, faith. I pray, weep not.
If you have poison for me, I will drink it.
I know you do not love me; for your sisters
Have, as I do remember, done me wrong.
You have some cause, they have not.
CORDELIA No cause, no cause.
LEAR Am I in France?
KENT In your own kingdom, sir.
LEAR Do not abuse° me. deceive; mock
DOCTOR Be comforted, good madam. The great rage,
You see, is killed in him; and yet it is danger
To make him even o'er° the time he has lost. go over
Desire him to go in. Trouble him no more
Till further settling.° until his mind eases
CORDELIA Will't please your highness walk?
LEAR You must bear with me:
Pray you now, forget and forgive. I am old and foolish.
Exeunt all but KENT and GENTLEMAN
GENTLEMAN Holds it true, sir, that the Duke of Cornwall was so slain?
KENT Most certain, sir.
GENTLEMAN Who is conductor° of his people? commander
KENT As 'tis said, the bastard son of Gloucester.
GENTLEMAN They say Edgar, his banished son, is with the Earl of Kent in Germany.
KENT Report° is changeable. 'Tis time to look about.° rumor / prepare defenses
The powers of the kingdom approach apace.
GENTLEMAN The arbitrement° is like to be bloody. Fare you well, sir. Exit encounter
KENT My point and period[1] will be throughly° wrought, thoroughly
Or° well or ill, as this day's battle's fought. Exit for

---

[9] Are your tears real? Is this really happening?
[1] The purpose and end of my life; literally, the full stop.

5.1

Enter, with drum and colors, EDMUND, REGAN, gentleman, and soldiers

EDMUND Know° of the duke if his last purpose hold,[1] inquire
Or whether since he is advised by aught[2]
To change the course. He's full of alteration° indecision
And self-reproving. Bring his constant pleasure.° his settled intent
To a GENTLEMAN, who goes out
REGAN Our sister's man is certainly miscarried.[3]
EDMUND 'Tis to be doubted,° madam. feared
REGAN Now, sweet lord,
You know the goodness I intend upon you.
Tell me—but truly—but then speak the truth,
Do you not love my sister?
EDMUND In honored° love. honorable
REGAN But have you never found my brother's way
To the forfended[4] place?
EDMUND That thought abuses° you. deceives
REGAN I am doubtful° that you have been conjunct° I fear / complicit
And bosomed with° her, as far as we call hers.[5] enamored of EDMUND No, by mine honor, madam.
REGAN I never shall endure her. Dear my lord,
Be not familiar° with her. intimate
EDMUND Fear° me not. doubt
She and the duke her husband!
Enter, with drum and colors, ALBANY, GONERIL, and soldiers
GONERIL (aside) I had rather lose the battle than that sister
Should loosen° him and me. disunite
ALBANY Our very loving sister, well be-met.
Sir, this I hear: the king is come to his daughter,
With others whom the rigor° of our state° harshness / government
Forced to cry out. Where I could not be honest,° honorable
I never yet was valiant. For this business,
It toucheth° us, as France invades our land, concerns
Not bolds the king, with others, whom, I fear,
Most just and heavy causes make oppose.[6]
EDMUND Sir, you speak nobly.
REGAN Why is this reasoned?[7]
GONERIL Combine together 'gainst the enemy;
For these domestic and particular broils° minor quarrels
Are not the question here.
ALBANY Let's then determine
With the ancient° of war on our proceeding. experienced officer
EDMUND I shall attend you presently° at your tent. in a moment

5.1 Location: The British camp near Dover.

[1] If his previous intention (to wage war) remains firm.

[2] Since then anything has persuaded him.

[3] Has surely come to grief by some accident.

[4] Forbidden (to Edmund, because it is adulterous).

[5] In total intimacy; all the way.

[6] This is of concern to us because France lands on our soil, not because it emboldens the king and others, who, I am afraid, have been provoked for good and solid reasons.

[7] What is the point of this kind of speech?

REGAN Sister, you'll go with us?[8]
GONERIL No.
REGAN 'Tis most convenient;° pray you, go with us. suitable
GONERIL (aside) O, ho, I know the riddle.°—I will go. disguised meaning
As they are going out, enter EDGAR disguised
EDGAR If e'er your grace had speech with man so poor,
Hear me one word.
ALBANY I'll overtake you. Speak.
Exeunt all but ALBANY and EDGAR
EDGAR Before you fight the battle, ope this letter.
If you have victory, let the trumpet sound
For him that brought it. Wretched though I seem,
I can produce a champion that will prove defend
What is avouched° there. If you miscarry,° maintained / perish
Your business of the world hath so an end,
And machination° ceases. Fortune love you! plotting
ALBANY Stay till I have read the letter.
EDGAR I was forbid it.
When time shall serve, let but the herald cry,
And I'll appear again.
ALBANY Why, fare thee well. I will o'erlook thy paper.
Exit EDGAR
Re-enter EDMUND
EDMUND The enemy's in view; draw up your powers.° troops
Here is the guess° of their true strength and forces estimate
By diligent discovery;° but your haste spying
Is now urged on you.
ALBANY We will greet the time.[9] Exit
EDMUND To both these sisters have I sworn my love;
Each jealous° of the other, as the stung suspicious
Are of the adder. Which of them shall I take?
Both? one? or neither? Neither can be enjoyed,
If both remain alive. To take the widow
Exasperates, makes mad her sister Goneril;
And hardly° shall I carry out my side,° with difficulty / plan
Her husband being alive. Now then we'll use
His countenance[1] for the battle; which being done,
Let her who would be rid of him devise
His speedy taking off. As for the mercy
Which he intends to Lear and to Cordelia,
The battle done, and they within our power,
Shall° never see his pardon; for my state° they shall / condition
Stands on° me to defend, not to debate. Exit

5.2

Alarum within.[1] Enter, with drum and colors, LEAR,
CORDELIA, and soldiers, over the stage; and exeunt

---

[8] Regan wants Goneril to go with Albany and her, rather than with Edmund.

[9] We will be ready to meet the occasion.

[1] Authority or backing; also suggesting "face," to be used like a mask for Edmund's ambition.

5.2 Location: The rest of the play takes place near the battlefield.

[1] Trumpet call to battle (backstage).

Enter EDGAR and GLOUCESTER

EDGAR Here, father,[2] take the shadow of this tree
For your good host;[0] pray that the right may thrive: shelter
If ever I return to you again,
I'll bring you comfort.
GLOUCESTER Grace go with you, sir!
Exit EDGAR

Alarum and retreat[0] within. Re-enter EDGAR trumpet signal

EDGAR Away, old man! give me thy hand! away!
King Lear hath lost, he and his daughter ta'en.
Give me thy hand! come on!
GLOUCESTER No farther, sir; a man may rot even[0] here. right
EDGAR What, in ill thoughts again? Men must endure
Their going hence, even as their coming hither;
Ripeness is all.[3] Come on!
GLOUCESTER And that's true, too. Exeunt

5.3

Enter, in conquest, with drum and colors, EDMUND; LEAR and CORDELIA, prisoners; CAPTAIN, soldiers, &c.

EDMUND Some officers take them away. Good guard,
Until their greater pleasures' first be known
That are to censure[0] them. judge
CORDELIA We are not the first
Who, with best meaning,[0] have incurred the worst. intention
For thee, oppressed king, am I cast down;[0] (into unhappiness)
Myself could else out-frown false Fortune's frown.[2]
Shall we not see these daughters and these sisters?
LEAR No, no, no, no! Come, let's away to prison.
We two alone will sing like birds i' the cage.
When thou dost ask me blessing, I'll kneel down,
And ask of thee forgiveness. So we'll live,
And pray, and sing, and tell old tales, and laugh
At gilded butterflies,[3] and hear poor rogues
Talk of court news; and we'll talk with them too,
Who loses and who wins; who's in, and who's out;
And take upon's the mystery of things,
As if we were God's spies; and we'll wear out,[0] outlast
In a walled prison, packs and sects of great ones,
That ebb and flow by the moon.[4]
EDMUND Take them away.
LEAR Upon such sacrifices,[5] my Cordelia,
The gods themselves throw incense. Have I caught thee?
He that parts us shall bring a brand from heavens,

[2] See note to 4.6.217.

[3] I.e., to await the destined time is the most important thing, as fruit falls only when ripe (playing on Gloucester's "rot," line 8); readiness for death is our only duty (compare Hamlet 5.2.160, "The readiness is all").

5.3

[1] Guard them well until the desires of those greater persons.

[2] Otherwise, I could be defiant in the face of bad fortune.

[3] I.e., gaudy and ephemeral courtiers; trivial matters.

[4] Followers and factions of important people whose positions at court vary as the tide.

[5] Upon such sacrifices as we are, or as you have made.

And fire us hence like foxes.[6] Wipe thine eyes;
The good-years shall devour them, flesh and fell,[7]
Ere they shall make us weep! We'll see 'em starved first.
Come. Exeunt LEAR and CORDELIA guarded
EDMUND Come hither, captain; hark.
Take thou this note {giving a paper). Go follow them to prison:
One step I have advanced° thee. If thou dost promoted
As this instructs thee, thou dost make thy way
To noble fortunes. Know thou this, that men
Are as the time is. To be tender-minded
Does not become a sword.° Thy great employment befit a swordsman-
Will not bear question.° Either say thou'lt do't, discussion
Or thrive by other means.
CAPTAIN I'll do't, my lord.
EDMUND About it; and write happy when thou hast done.[8]
Mark, I say, instantly; and carry it° so carry it out
As I have set it down.
CAPTAIN I cannot draw a cart, nor eat dried oats;° (like a horse)
If it be a man's work, I'll do it. Exit
Flourish. Enter ALBANY, GONERIL, REGAN, another CAPTAIN, and soldiers
ALBANY Sir, you have showed today your valiant strain,° qualities; birth
And fortune led you well. You have the captives
That were the opposites° of this day's strife. opponents
I do require them of you, so to use° them treat
As we shall find their merits and our safety
May equally determine.
EDMUND Sir, I thought it fit
To send the old and miserable king
To some retention° and appointed guard; confinement
Whose° age has charms in it, whose title more, (Lear's)
To pluck the common bosom[9] on his side,
And turn our impressed lances° in our eyes conscripted lancers
Which[1] do command them. With him I sent the queen;
My reason all the same; and they are ready
Tomorrow, or at further space,° t'appear at a future point
Where you shall hold your session.° At this time court of judgment
We sweat and bleed; the friend hath lost his friend;
And the best quarrels, in the heat, are cursed
By those that feel their sharpness.[2]
The question of Cordelia and her father
Requires a fitter place.
ALBANY Sir, by your patience,
I hold you but a subject of° this war, in waging
Not as a brother.° an equal

---

[6] I.e., must have divine aid to do so. The image is of using a torch to smoke foxes out of their holes, or, in the case of Lear and Cordelia, prison cells.

[7] Meat and skin; entirely. The precise meaning of "good-years" has not been explained; it may signify simply the passage of time or may suggest some ominous, destructive power.

[8] Go to it, and call yourself happy when you are done.

[9] To garner the affection of the populace.

[1] In the eyes of us who.

[2] And in the heat of battle, even the most just wars are cursed by those who must suffer the fighting.

REGAN That's as we list° to grace him. like
Methinks our pleasure might have been demanded,[3]
Ere you had spoken so far. He led our powers;° armies
Bore the commission of my place and person;
The which immediacy° may well stand up, close connection
And call itself your brother.
GONERIL Not so hot!° not so fast
In his own grace° he doth exalt himself, merit
More than in your addition.[4]
REGAN In my rights,
By me invested, he compeers° the best. equals
GONERIL That were the most,[5] if he should husband you.
REGAN Jesters do oft prove prophets.
GONERIL Holla, holla!
That eye that told you so looked but a-squint.[6]
REGAN Lady, I am not well; else I should answer
From a full-flowing stomach.° General, anger
Take thou my soldiers, prisoners, patrimony:
Dispose of them, of me; the walls° are thine. fortress of my heart
Witness the world, that I create thee here
My lord and master.
GONERIL Mean you to enjoy him?
ALBANY The let-alone° lies not in your good will. veto
EDMUND Nor in thine, lord.
ALBANY Half-blooded° fellow, yes. bastard
REGAN (to EDMUND) Let the drum strike,[7] and prove my title thine.
ALBANY Stay yet; hear reason. Edmund, I arrest thee
On capital treason; and, in thine attaint,[8]
This gilded serpent (pointing to GONERIL). For your claim, fair sister,° sister-in-law
I bar it in the interest of my wife;
'Tis she is sub-contracted to this lord,
And I, her husband, contradict your banns.° announced intent to marry
If you will marry, make your loves to me,
My lady is bespoke.
GONERIL An interlude!° a farce
ALBANY Thou art armed, Gloucester. Let the trumpet sound.
If none appear to prove upon thy head
Thy heinous, manifest, and many treasons,
There is my pledge (throwing down a glove); I'll prove it on thy heart,
Ere I taste bread, thou art in nothing less° in no way less guilty
Than I have proclaimed thee.
REGAN Sick, O, sick!
GONERIL (aside) If not, I'll ne'er trust medicine.° poison (euphemistic)

---

3. I think you should have inquired into my wishes.
4. In the honors you confer upon him.
5. That investiture would be complete.
6. Only looked sideways. "Looking asquint" was a proverbial effect of jealousy, because of the tendency to look suspiciously at potential rivals.
7. Perhaps to announce the betrothal or a challenge.
8. And in order to accuse you; and as one who shares your corruption or crime.

EDMUND There's my exchange (throwing down a glove).
What° in the world he is whoever
That names me traitor, villain-like he lies.
Call by thy trumpet. He that dares approach,
On him, on you, who not? I will maintain
My truth and honor firmly.
ALBANY A herald, ho!
EDMUND A herald, ho, a herald!
ALBANY Trust to thy single virtue;° for thy soldiers, your unassisted power
All levied in my name, have in my name
Took their discharge.
REGAN My sickness grows upon me.
ALBANY She is not well; convey her to my tent.
Exit REGAN, led
Enter a HERALD
Come hither, herald—Let the trumpet sound—
And read out this.
CAPTAIN Sound, trumpet! (A trumpet sounds)

HERALD (reads) "If any man of quality or degree within the lists of the army will maintain upon Edmund, supposed earl of Gloucester, that he is a manifold traitor, let him appear by the third sound of the trumpet. He is bold in his defense."

EDMUND Sound! (First trumpet)
HERALD Again! (Second trumpet)
HERALD Again! (Third trumpet)
Trumpet answers within
Enter EDGAR, at the third sound, armed, with a trumpet before him
ALRANY Ask him his purposes, why he appears
Upon this call o' the trumpet.
HERALD What° are you? who
Your name, your quality?° and why you answer degree, rank
This present summons?
EDGAR Know, my name is lost;
By treason's tooth bare-gnawn and canker-bit.° worm-eaten
Yet am I noble as the adversary
I come to cope.° to encounter
ALBANY Which is that adversary?
EDGAR What's he that speaks for Edmund earl of Gloucester?
EDMUND Himself. What say'st thou to him?
EDGAR Draw thy sword,
That,° if my speech offend a noble heart, so that
Thy arm may do thee justice. Here is mine.
Behold, it is the privilege of mine honors,
My oath, and my profession. I protest,
Maugre° thy strength, youth, place, and eminence, despite
Despite thy victor sword and fire-new° fortune, newly minted
Thy valor and thy heart,° thou art a traitor; courage
False to thy gods, thy brother, and thy father;
Conspirant 'gainst this high-illustrious prince;
And, from the extremest upward° of thy head top

To the descent° and dust below thy foot, lowest part; sole
A most toad-spotted[9] traitor. Say thou "No,"° if you say no
This sword, this arm, and my best spirits, are bent° ready
To prove upon thy heart, whereto I speak,
Thou liest.
EDMUND In wisdom I should ask thy name;
But, since thy outside looks so fair and warlike
And that thy tongue some say of breeding° breathes, good upbringing
What safe and nicely I might well delay
By rule of knighthood, I disdain and spurn.[1]
Back do I toss these treasons to thy head;
With the hell-hated° lie o'erwhelm thy heart; hated as much as hell
Which, for° they yet glance by and scarcely bruise, since
This sword of mine shall give them instant way,° access
Where they shall rest for ever. Trumpets, speak!
Alarums. They fight, EDMUND falls
ALBANY Save° him, save him! spare
GONERIL This is practice,° Gloucester: trickery
By the law of arms thou wast not bound to answer
An unknown opposite.° Thou art not vanquished, opponent
But cozened and beguiled.° cheated and deceived
ALBANY Shut your mouth, dame,
Or with this paper shall I stople° it. plug
Thou worse than any name, read thine own evil.
No tearing, lady! I perceive you know it.
Gives the letter to EDMUND
GONERIL Say, if I do, the laws are mine, not thine.
Who can arraign° me for't? prosecute
ALBANY Most monstrous! oh!
Know'st thou this paper?
GONERIL Ask me not what I know. Exit
ALBANY Go after her: she's desperate; govern° her. restrain
EDMUND What you have charged me with, that have I done;
And more, much more; the time will bring it out.
'Tis past, and so am I. But what art thou
That hast this fortune on me?[2] If thou'rt noble,
I do forgive thee.
EDGAR Let's exchange charity.° forgiveness
I am no less in blood than thou art, Edmund;
If more, the more thou hast wronged me.
My name is Edgar, and thy father's son.
The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices
Make instruments to plague us.
The dark and vicious place where thee he got° begot
Cost him his eyes.
EDMUND Thou hast spoken right, 'tis true;
The wheel° is come full circle! I am here.[3] fortune's wheel
ALBANY Methought thy very gait did prophesy
A royal nobleness. I must embrace thee.

---

[9] Venomous, like a toad; spotted with disgrace.

[1] I.e., and since your speech may suggest high birth, I will not stick safely and meticulously to the rules of knighthood by refusing to fight you.

[2] Who have this good fortune at my expense.

[3] Back at the lowest point.

Let sorrow split my heart, if ever I
Did hate thee or thy father!
EDGAR Worthy prince. I know't.
ALBANY Where have you hid yourself?
How have you known the miseries of your father?
EDGAR By nursing them, my lord. List° a brief tale; listen to
And when 'tis told, O, that my heart would burst!
The bloody proclamation to escape,[4]
That followed me so near—O, our lives' sweetness!
That we the pain of death would hourly die
Rather than die at once![5]—taught me to shift
Into a madman's rags; to assume a semblance
That very° dogs disdained; and in this habit° even / guise
Met I my father with his bleeding rings,° sockets
Their precious stones new lost; became his guide,
Led him, begged for him, saved him from despair;
Never—O fault!—revealed myself unto him
Until some half-hour past, when I was armed:
Not sure, though hoping, of this good success,° conclusion
I asked his blessing, and from first to last
Told him my pilgrimage. But his flawed° heart— cracked
Alack, too weak the conflict to support!—
'Twixt two extremes of passion, joy and grief,
Burst smilingly.
EDMUND This speech of yours hath moved me,
And shall perchance do good; but speak you on;
You look as you had something more to say.
ALBANY If there be more, more woeful, hold it in;
For I am almost ready to dissolve,° melt into tears
Hearing of this.
EDGAR This would have seemed a period° conclusion
To such as love not sorrow; but another,
To amplify° too much would make much more, enlarge, extend
And top extremity.
Whilst I was big in clamor° came there in a man, lamenting loudly
Who, having seen me in my worst estate,
Shunned my abhorred society; but then, finding
Who 'twas that so endured, with his strong arms
He fastened on my neck, and bellowed out
As he'd burst heaven; threw him on my father;
Told the most piteous tale of Lear and him° himself
That ever ear received; which in recounting
His grief grew puissant,° and the strings of life powerful
Began to crack. Twice then the trumpets sounded,
And there I left him tranced.
ALBANY But who was this?
EDGAR Kent, sir, the banished Kent; who in disguise
Followed his enemy king,[6] and did him service

---

[4] In order to escape the sentence of death.

[5] How sweet must life be that we prefer the constant pain of dying to death itself.

[6] "Enemy"—that is, hostile—because Lear had previously banished him.

Improper° for a slave. unfit even
Enter a GENTLEMAN, with a bloody knife
GENTLEMAN Help, help, O, help!
EDGAR What kind of help?
ALBANY Speak, man.
EDGAR What means that bloody knife?
GENTLEMAN 'Tis hot, it smokes,
It came even from the heart of—O, she's dead!
ALBANY Who dead? speak, man.
GENTLEMAN Your lady, sir, your lady! and her sister
By her is poisoned; she hath confessed it.
EDMUND I was contracted to them both. All three
Now marry° in an instant. unite (in death)
Enter KENT
EDGAR Here comes Kent.
ALBANY Produce their bodies, be they alive or dead:
This judgment of the heavens, that makes us tremble,
Touches us not with pity. Exit GENTLEMAN
O, is this he?
The time will not allow the compliment
Which very manners urges.[7]
KENT I am come
To bid my king and master aye° good night. forever
Is he not here?
ALBANY Great thing of° us forgot! by
Speak, Edmund, where's the king? and where's Cordelia?
See'st thou this object,° Kent? spectacle
The bodies of GONERIL and REGAN are brought in KENT Alack, why thus?
EDMUND Yet° Edmund was beloved. despite all
The one the other poisoned for my sake,
And after slew herself.
ALBANY Even so. Cover their faces.
EDMUND I pant for life. Some good I mean to do,
Despite of mine own nature. Quickly send,
Be brief° in it, to the castle; for my writ° speedy / order for execution
Is on the life of Lear and on Cordelia:
Nay, send in time.
ALBANY Run, run, O, run!
EDGAR To who, my lord? Who hath the office?° Send commission
Thy token of reprieve.
EDMUND Well thought on. Take my sword,
Give it the° captain. to the
ALBANY Haste thee for thy life. Exit EDGAR
EDMUND He hath commission from thy wife and me
To hang Cordelia in the prison, and
To lay the blame upon her own despair,
That she fordid herself.[8]
ALBANY The gods defend her! Bear him hence awhile.
EDMUND is borne off

---

[7] The ceremony that barest custom demands.

[8] Destroyed herself. In most of Shakespeare's source texts for the play, Cordelia does in fact kill herself, but only after reigning for some years.

Re-enter LEAR, with CORDELIA dead in his arms; EDGAR,
CAPTAIN, and others following

LEAR Howl, howl, howl, howl! O, you are men of stones:
Had I your tongues and eyes, I'd use them so
That heaven's vault should crack. She's gone forever!
I know when one is dead, and when one lives;
She's dead as earth. Lend me a looking-glass;
If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,[9]
Why, then she lives.
KENT Is this the promised end?[1]
EDGAR Or image of that horror?
ALBANY Fall, and cease![2]
LEAR This feather stirs; she lives! If it be so,
It is a chance which does redeem all sorrows
That ever I have felt.
KENT (kneeling)[3] O my good master!
LEAR Prithee, away.
EDGAR Tis noble Kent, your friend.
LEAR A plague upon you, murderers, traitors all!
I might have saved her; now she's gone for ever!
Cordelia, Cordelia! stay a little. Ha!
What is't thou say'st? Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle, and low, an excellent thing in woman.
I killed the slave that was a-hanging thee.
CAPTAIN 'Tis true, my lords, he did.
LEAR Did I not, fellow?
I have seen the day, with my good biting falchion° light sword.
I would have made them skip: I am old now,
And these same crosses spoil me.[4] Who are you?
Mine eyes are not o' the best. I'll tell you straight.° recognize you soon
KENT If fortune brag of two she loved and hated,
One of them we behold.[5]
LEAR This is a dull sight.[6] Are you not Kent?
KENT The same,
Your servant Kent. Where is your servant Caius?° (Kent's pseudonym)
LEAR He's a good fellow, I can tell you that;
He'll strike, and quickly too. He's dead and rotten.
KENT No, my good lord; I am the very man—
LEAR I'll see that straight.[7]
KENT That, from your first of difference and decay,[8]
Have followed your sad steps.
LEAR You are welcome hither.
KENT Nor no man else.[9] All's cheerless, dark, and deadly.° deathly

---

[9] Mica, or stone polished to a mirror finish.

[1] Doomsday; expected end of the play. In no version of the story previous to Shakespeare's does Cordelia die at this point.

[2] Let the world collapse and end.

[3] Lear probably kneels over Cordelia's body during most of the scene, and Kent kneels here partly in submission, partly to catch Lear's attention.

[4] And these recent adversities have weakened me; and these parries I could once match would now destroy me.

[5] If there were only two supreme examples in the world of Fortune's ability to raise up and cast down, Lear would be one; alternatively, we are each of us one (Lear and Kent are here looking at each other).

[6] This is a sad sight; my vision is failing.

[7] I'll attend to that shortly; I'll comprehend that in a moment.

[8] Who from the beginning of your alteration and deterioration.

[9] No, neither I nor anyone else is welcome—that is, this is not a welcoming sight.

Your eldest daughters have fordone° themselves, destroyed
And desperately° are dead. in despair
LEAR Aye, so I think.
ALBANY He knows not what he says; and vain° it is in vain
That we present us to him.
EDGAR Very bootless.° futile
Enter a CAPTAIN
CAPTAIN Edmund is dead, my lord.
ALBANY That's but a trifle here.
You lords and noble friends, know our intent.
What comfort to this great decay° may come ruin, destruction
Shall be applied. For us, we will resign,
During the life of this old majesty,
To him our absolute power; (to EDGAR and KENT) you, to your rights;
With boot,° and such addition as your honors good measure
Have more than merited. All friends shall taste
The wages of their virtue, and all foes
The cup of their deserving. O, see, see!
LEAR And my poor fool[1] is hanged! No, no, no life!
Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life,
And thou no breath at all? Thou'lt come no more,
Never, never, never, never, never!
Pray you, undo this button. Thank you, sir.
Do you see this? Look on her, look, her lips,
Look there, look there! Dies
EDGAR He faints! My lord, my lord!
KENT Break, heart; I prithee,° break! pray you
EDGAR Look up, my lord.
KENT Vex not his ghost.[2] O, let him pass! He hates him much
That would upon the rack[3] of this tough world
Stretch him out longer.
EDGAR He is gone, indeed.
KENT The wonder is, he hath endured so long.
He but usurped his life.[4]
ALBANY Bear them from hence. Our present business Is general woe. (To KENT and EDGAR) Friends of my soul, you twain
Rule in this realm, and the gored° state sustain. wounded; bloody
KENT I have a journey, sir, shortly to go;
My master calls me, I must not say no.
EDGAR The weight of this sad time we must obey;
Speak what we feel, not what we ought to say.
The oldest hath borne most; we that are young
Shall never see so much, nor live so long.
Exeunt, with dead march[5]

The Two Texts of King Lear The following excerpts enable readers to compare, on facing pages, a sample passage from the quarto History of King Lear (1608) and the Folio Tragedy of King Lear (1623). (On the relation between the two texts, see above, p. 1142.) The quarto version of this scene seems to emphasize a French invasion of the kingdom, while the Folio text seems to emphasize an impending civil war.

THOMAS CAMPION
1567-1620

Thomas Campion was a law student, a physician, a composer, a writer of masques, and a poet. His first poetic attempts were in Latin, and he believed that the principles of Latin quantitative versification could be applied to English poetry. In his Observations in the Art of English Poesy, he defended quantitative verse and disparaged the "vulgar and unartificial [i.e., unartistic] custom of rhyming." Yet, as with Jonson and Milton, two other poets who denounced rhyming, many of his best works feature rhyme. His finest achievements as a lyric poet arose from the fact that he was both poet and composer. In the preface to one of his books, he wrote, "I have chiefly aimed to couple my words and notes lovingly together, which will be much for him to do that hath not power over both." That Campion's songs are still loved and sung today, and available in numerous recordings, is testimony to his gentle power.*

My sweetest Lesbia[1]

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love,
And though the sager sort our deeds reprove,
Let us not weigh° them. Heav'n's great lamps do dive heed,
Into their west, and straight° again revive, at once
But soon as once set is our little light,
Then must we sleep one ever-during night.

If all would lead their lives in love like me,
Then bloody swords and armor should not be;
No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleeps should move,
Unless alarm° came from the camp of love. warning sound
But fools do live, and waste their little light,
And seek with pain their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortune ends,
Let not my hearse be vexed with mourning friends,
But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come
And with sweet pastimes grace my happy tomb;
And Lesbia, close up thou my little light,
And crown with love my ever-during night.

[1] Imitated and partly translated from a poem by Catullus (87-ca. 54 B.C.E.), the Latin lyric poet who often celebrated the charms of Lesbia in his verses. This and the two lyrics that follow appeared, with musical settings, in A Book of Airs, which contains Campion's first work as a composer.

Give me kind Amaryllis,
The wanton country[1] maid.
Nature art disdaineth;
Her beauty is her own.
Her when we court and kiss,
She cries "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
She never will say no.

If I love Amaryllis,
She gives me fruit and flowers;
But if we love these ladies,
We must give golden showers.
Give them gold that sell love,
Give me the nutbrown lass,
Who when we court and kiss,
She cries "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
She never will say no.

These ladies must have pillows,
And beds by strangers wrought° i.e., imported
Give me a bower of willows,
Of moss and leaves unbought,
And fresh Amaryllis,
With milk and honey fed,
Who when we court and kiss,
She cries "Forsooth, let go!"
But when we come where comfort is,
She never will say no.

When to her lute Corinna sings

When to her lute[1] Corinna sings,
Her voice revives the leaden° strings, i.e., heavy
And doth in highest notes appear
As any challenged° echo clear; aroused
But when she doth of mourning speak,
Ev'n with her sighs the strings do break

And as her lute doth live or die,
Led by her passion, so must I:
For when of pleasure she doth sing,
My thoughts enjoy a sudden spring;
But if she doth of sorrow speak,
Ev'n from my heart the strings do break.

There is a garden in her face

There is a garden in her face,
Where roses and white lilies grow;
A heav'nly paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits do flow.
There cherries grow, which none may buy

Those cherries fairly do enclose

Which when her lovely laughter shows,

Her eyes like angels watch them still;

Fain would I wed[1]

Fain would I wed a fair young man that night and day could please me,
When my mind or body grieved, that had the power to ease me.
Maids are full of longing thoughts that breed a bloodless sickness,
And that, oft I hear men say, is only cured by quickness.° liveliness, motion
Oft have I been wooed and praised, but never could be moved;
Many for a day or so I have most dearly loved,
But this foolish mind of mine straight° loathes the thing resolved; at once
If to love be sin in me, that sin is soon absolved.
Sure I think I shall at last fly to some holy order;
When I once am settled there, then can I fly no farther.
Yet I would not die a maid, because I had a mother,
As I was by one brought forth, I would bring forth another.

THOMAS NASHE
1567-1601

Thomas Nashe, a Cambridge graduate, was a versatile writer of satires, plays, a novel, lyric verse, and controversial pamphlets. He was one of the so-called "University Wits" who in the late 1580s came to London and wrote for the stage and the press. They lived precarious and short lives; Nashe was about thirty-three when he died; his friend Christopher Marlowe died at twenty-nine; George Peele, at thirty; and Robert Greene, at thirty-two. In his brief career, Nashe won fame for his brilliant, idiosyncratic style, and notoriety for the vituperative and slanderous pamphlet war he conducted with Spenser's friend the scholar Gabriel Harvey.

Nashe's best-known prose work is a picaresque narrative, The Unfortunate Traveler, or the Life of Jack Wilton, which recounts the rambling adventures of the young hero all over Europe, including Active encounters with Erasmus and the poet Surrey, the massacre of the Protestant radicals in Germany, and harrowing, melodramatic exploits in seductive, corrupt, and plague-ridden Italy. In this tale, and in satirical pamphlets like Pierce Penniless, His Supplication to the Devil, Nashe's prose, which sometimes sounds like modern experimental fiction, is headlong, exuberant, surrealistic, and intensely vivid. His tone routinely mingles the beautiful and the grotesque, laughter and horror. His dance-of-death poem, "A Litany in Time of Plague," comes paradoxically from one of his most light-hearted works, a festive comedy called Summer's Last Will and Testament.

Nashe's general outlook, like that of many satirists, was conservative; he attacked innovation and praised the purported stability and order of the past. But in his vision of the world, as in the manner of his writing, there is something wild and extreme. Those in power seem to have recognized that Nashe's style in itself, regardless of the content to which it was wedded, might constitute a threat to established order. In June 1599 the ecclesiastical authorities ordered that "all Nashe's books and Doctor Harvey's books be taken wheresoever they may be found and that none of their books be ever printed hereafter."*

Dust hath closed Helen's° eye. Helen of Troy
I am sick, I must die.
  Lord, have mercy on us!

"Come, come!" the bells[3] do cry.
I am sick, I must die.
  Lord, have mercy on us!

[1] This lyric is from A Pleasant Comedy Called Summer's Last Will and Testament, acted before the archbishop of Canterbury in his palace at Croydon in 1592 and published in 1600. Literally, a litany is an appointed form of public prayer in which each of a series of supplications by the clergy is followed by a response by the congregation, with the same formula of response being repeated several times.

RICHARD BARNFIELD
1574-1627

The eldest son in a family of landed gentry, Richard Barnfield was born in Norbury, Staffordshire, in 1574 and educated at Oxford. In 1594 and 1595, he published two collections of pastoral verses, The Affectionate Shepherd, Containing the Complaint of Daphnis for the Love of Ganymede, and Cynthia, with Certain Sonnets. These volumes earned him admiring attention: in a 1598 survey of the literary scene, Francis Meres praised him as one of England's chief poets for pastoral. But 1598 also marked the end of Barnfield's literary career: in that year he published another poem, The Encomium of Lady Pecunia, or The Praise of Money, and then fell silent for the rest of his life. For reasons that remain unknown, Barnfield was disinherited by his father. It is thought that he returned to Staffordshire, where he died in 1627.

Both The Affectionate Shepherd and Cynthia have overt homoerotic themes. These themes—also found in the work of other Elizabethan poets, including Spenser, Marlowe, and Shakespeare—were relatively conventional at the time, being modeled on Greek and Roman poetry. But the passionate explicitness of Barnfield's verses evidently raised eyebrows, for he felt it necessary in a dedicatory letter to explain his intention: "being nothing else," he insisted, "but an imitation of Virgil."

This appeal to a prestigious classical model for sanction is not surprising: by law, sodomitical acts were strictly forbidden in Elizabethan England and punishable by death. The literary convention enables Barnfield to articulate desires that might otherwise have been silenced:

> Then shouldst thou suck my sweet and my fair flower
> That now is ripe, and full of honey-berries:
> Then would I lead thee to my pleasant Bower
> Filled full of grapes, of mulberries, and cherries;
> Then shouldst thou be my wasp or else my bee,
> I would thy hive, and thou my honey be.
> The Affectionate Shepherd

But Elizabethan homophobia, though real enough, is easy to misunderstand. The laws were draconian, but actual trials for sodomy were extremely rare, and English culture in many ways encouraged male intimacy. Unmarried men routinely shared beds; male friends kissed and caressed each other openly; and, on the stage as well as on the page, the seductive beauty of boys was actively celebrated.

From Cynthia[1]

Sonnet 9

Diana (on a time) walking the wood
To sport herself, of her fair train forlorn,[2]
Chanced for to prick her foot against a thorn,
And from thence issued out a stream of blood.
No sooner she was vanished out of sight,
But love's fair queen° came there away by chance, Venus
And having of this hap° a glimm'ring glance, accident, happenstance
She put the blood into a crystal° bright. vessel of crystal
When being now come unto Mount Rhodope,[3]
With her fair hands she forms a shape of snow,
And blends it with this blood; from whence doth grow
A lovely creature, brighter than the day.
And being christened in fair Paphos'[4] shrine,
She called him Ganymede,[5] as all divine.

1595

Sonnet 11

Sighing, and sadly sitting by my love,
He asked the cause of my heart's sorrowing,
Conjuring me by heaven's eternal king
To tell the cause which me so much did move.
Compelled (quoth I), to thee will I confess
Love is the cause, and only love it is
That doth deprive me of my heavenly bliss;
Love is the pain that doth my heart oppress.
And what is she (quoth he) whom thou dost love?
Look in this glass° (quoth I), there shalt thou see mirror
The perfect form of my felicity.
When, thinking that it would strange magic prove,° show
He opened it: and taking off the cover,
He straight perceived himself to be my lover.

The Early Seventeenth Century

1603-1660

1603: Death of Elizabeth I; accession of James I, first Stuart king of England
1605: The Gunpowder Plot, a failed effort by Catholic extremists to blow up Parliament and the king
1607: Establishment of first permanent English colony in the New World at Jamestown, Virginia
1625: Death of James I; accession of Charles I
1642: Outbreak of civil war; theaters closed
1649: Execution of Charles I; beginning of Commonwealth and Protectorate, known inclusively as the Interregnum (1649—60)
1660: End of the Protectorate; restoration of Charles II

Queen Elizabeth died on March 24, 1603, after ruling England for more than four decades. The Virgin Queen had not, of course, produced a child to inherit her throne, but her kinsman, the thirty-six-year old James Stuart, James VI of Scotland, succeeded her as James I without the attempted coups that many had feared. Many welcomed the accession of a man in the prime of life, supposing that he would prove more decisive than his notoriously vacillating predecessor. Worries over the succession, which had plagued the reigns of the Tudor monarchs since Henry VIII, could finally subside: James already had several children with his queen, Anne of Denmark. Writers and scholars jubilantly noted that their new ruler had literary inclinations. He was the author of treatises on government and witchcraft, and some youthful efforts at poetry.

Nonetheless, there were grounds for disquiet. James had come to maturity in Scotland, in the seventeenth century a foreign land with a different church, different customs, and different institutions of government. Two of his books, The True Law of Free Monarchies (1598) and Basilikon Doron (1599), expounded authoritarian theories of kingship: James's views seemed incompatible with the English tradition of "mixed" government, in which power was shared by the monarch, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons. As Thomas Howard wrote in 1611, while Elizabeth "did talk of her subjects' love and good affection," James "talketh of his subjects' fear and subjection." James liked to imagine himself as a modern version of the wise, peace-loving Roman Augustus Caesar, who autocratically governed a vast empire. The Romans had deified their emperors, and while the Christian James could not expect the same, he insisted on his closeness to divinity. Kings, he believed, derived their powers from God rather than from the people. As God's specially chosen delegate, surely he deserved his subjects' reverent, unconditional obedience.

Yet unlike the charismatic Elizabeth, James was personally unprepossessing. One contemporary, Anthony Weldon, provides a barbed description: "His tongue too large for his mouth, which ever made him speak full in the mouth, and drink very uncomely as if eating his drink ... he never washed his hands . . . his walk was ever circular, his fingers ever in that walk fiddling about his codpiece." Unsurprisingly, James did not always inspire in his subjects the deferential awe to which he thought himself entitled.

The relationship between the monarch and his people and the relationship between England and Scotland would be sources of friction throughout James's reign. James had hoped to unify his domains as a single nation, "the empire of Britain." But the two realms' legal and ecclesiastical systems proved difficult to reconcile, and the English Parliament, traditionally a sporadically convened advisory body to the monarch, offered robustly xenophobic opposition. The failure of unification was only one of several clashes with the English Parliament, especially with the House of Commons, which had authority over taxation. After James died in 1625 and his son, Charles I, succeeded him, tensions persisted and intensified. Charles, indeed, attempted to rule without summoning Parliament at all between 1629 and 1638. By 1642 England was up in arms, in a civil war between the king's forces and armies loyal to the House of Commons. The conflict ended with Charles's defeat and beheading in 1649.

Although in the early 1650s the monarchy as an institution seemed as dead as the man who had last worn the crown, an adequate replacement proved difficult to devise. Executive power devolved upon a "Lord Protector," Oliver Cromwell, former general of the parliamentary forces, who wielded power nearly as autocratically as Charles had done. Yet without an institutionally sanctioned method of transferring power upon Cromwell's death in 1658, the attempt to fashion a commonwealth without a hereditary monarch eventually failed. In 1660 Parliament invited the eldest son of the old king home from exile. He succeeded to the throne as King Charles II.

As James's accession marks the beginning of "the early seventeenth century," his grandson's marks the end. Literary periods often fail to correlate neatly with the reigns of monarchs, and the period 1603—60 can seem especially arbitrary. Many of the most important cultural trends in seventeenth-century Europe neither began nor ended in these years but were in the process of unfolding slowly, over several centuries. The Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century was still ongoing in the seventeenth, and still producing turmoil. The printing press, invented in the fifteenth century, made books ever more widely available, contributing to an expansion of literacy and to a changed conception of authorship. Although the English economy remained primarily agrarian, its manufacturing and trade sectors were expanding rapidly. England was beginning to establish itself as a colonial power and as a leading maritime nation. From 1550 on, London grew explosively as a center of population, trade, and literary endeavor. All these important developments got under way before James came to the throne, and many of them would continue after the 1714 death of James's great-granddaughter Queen Anne, the last of the Stuarts to reign in England.

From a literary point of view, 1603 can seem a particularly capricious dividing line because at the accession of James I so many writers happened to be in midcareer. The professional lives of William Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, John Donne, Francis Bacon, Walter Ralegh, and many less important writers—

Thomas Dekker, George Chapman, Samuel Daniel, Michael Drayton, and Thomas Heywood, for instance—straddle the reigns of Elizabeth and James. The Restoration of Charles II, with which this section ends, is likewise a more significant political than literary milestone: John Milton completed Paradise Lost and wrote two other major poems in the 1660s. Nonetheless, recognizing the years 1603—60 as a period sharpens our awareness of some important political, intellectual, cultural, and stylistic currents that bear directly upon literary production. It helps focus attention too upon the seismic shift in national consciousness that, in 1649, could permit the formal trial, conviction, and execution of an anointed king at the hands of his former subjects.

STATE AND CHURCH, 1603-40

In James's reign, the most pressing difficulties were apparently financial, but money troubles were merely symptoms of deeper quandaries about the proper relationship between the king and the people. Compared to James's native Scotland, England seemed a prosperous nation, but James was less wealthy than he believed. Except in times of war, the Crown was supposed to fund the government not through regular taxation but through its own extensive land revenues and by exchanging Crown prerogatives, such as the collection of taxes on luxury imports, in return for money or services. Yet the Crown's independent income had declined throughout the sixteenth century as inflation eroded the value of land rents. Meanwhile, innovations in military technology and shipbuilding dramatically increased the expense of port security and other defenses, a traditional Crown responsibility. Elizabeth had responded to straitened finances with parsimony, transferring much of the expense of her court, for instance, onto wealthy subjects, whom she visited for extended periods on her annual "progresses." She kept a tight lid on honorific titles too, creating new knights or peers very rarely, even though the years of her reign saw considerable upward social mobility. In consequence, by 1603 there was considerable pent-up pressure both for "honors" and for more tangible rewards for government officials. As soon as James came to power, he was immediately besieged with supplicants.

James responded with what seemed to him appropriate royal munificence, knighting and ennobling many of his courtiers and endowing them with opulent gifts. His expenses were unavoidably higher than Elizabeth's, because he had to maintain not only his own household, but also separate establishments for his queen and for the heir apparent, Prince Henry. Yet he quickly became notorious for his financial heedlessness. Compared to Elizabeth's, his court was disorderly and wasteful, marked by hard drinking, gluttonous feasting, and a craze for hunting. "It is not possible for a king of England . . . to be rich or safe, but by frugality," warned James's lord treasurer, Robert Cecil, but James seemed unable to restrain himself. Soon he was deep in debt and unable to convince Parliament to bankroll him by raising taxes.

The king's financial difficulties set his authoritarian assertions about the monarch's supremacy at odds with Parliament's control over taxation. How were his prerogatives as a ruler to coexist with the rights of his subjects? Particularly disturbing to many was James's tendency to bestow high offices upon favorites apparently chosen for good looks rather than for good judgment. James's openly romantic attachment first to Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and then to George Villiers, Duke of Ruckingham, gave rise to widespread rumors of homosexuality at court. The period had complex attitudes toward same-sex relationships; on the one hand, "sodomy" was a capital crime (though it was very rarely prosecuted); on the other hand, passionately intense male friendship, sometimes suffused with eroticism, constituted an important cultural ideal. In James's case, at least, contemporaries considered his susceptibility to lovely, expensive youths more a political than a moral calamity. For his critics, it crystallized what was wrong with unlimited royal power: the ease with which a king could confuse his own whim with a divine mandate.

Despite James's ungainly demeanor, his frictions with Parliament, and his chronic problems of self-management, he was politically astute. Often, like Elizabeth, he succeeded not through decisiveness but through canny inaction. Cautious by temperament, he characterized himself as a peacemaker and, for many years, successfully kept England out of the religious wars raging on the Continent. His 1604 peace treaty with England's old enemy, Spain, made the Atlantic safe for English ships, a prerequisite for the colonization of the New World and for regular long-distance trading expeditions into the Mediterranean and down the African coast into the Indian Ocean. During James's reign the first permanent English settlements were established in North America, first at Jamestown, then in Bermuda, at Plymouth, and in the Caribbean. In 1611 the East India Company established England's first foothold in India. Even when expeditions ended disastrously, as did Henry Hudson's 1611 attempt to find the Northwest Passage and Walter Ralegh's 1617 expedition to Guiana, they often asserted territorial claims that England would exploit in later decades.

Although the Crown's deliberate attempts to manage the economy were often misguided, its frequent inattention or refusal to interfere had the unintentional effect of stimulating growth. Early seventeenth-century entrepreneurs undertook a wide variety of schemes for industrial or agricultural improvement. Some ventures were almost as loony as Sir Politic Would-be's ridiculous moneymaking notions in Ben Jonson's Volpone (1606), but others were serious, profitable enterprises. In the south, domestic industries began manufacturing goods like pins and light woolens that had previously been imported. In the north, newly developed coal mines provided fuel for England's growing cities. In the east, landowners drained wetlands, producing more arable land to feed England's rapidly growing population. These endeavors gave rise to a new respect for the practical arts, a faith in technology as a means of improving human life, and a conviction that the future might be better than the past: all important influences upon the scientific theories of Francis Bacon and his seventeenth-century followers. Economic growth in this period owed more to the initiative of individuals and small groups than to government policy, a factor that encouraged a reevaluation of the role of self-interest, the profit motive, and the role of business contracts in the betterment of the community. This reevaluation was a prerequisite for the secular, contractual political theories proposed by Thomas Hobbes and John Locke later in the seventeenth century.

On the vexations faced by the Church of England, James was likewise often most successful when he was least activist. Since religion cemented sociopolitical order, it seemed necessary to English rulers that all of their subjects belong to a single church. Yet how could they do so when the Reformation had discredited many familiar religious practices and had bred disagreement over many theological issues? Sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English people argued over many religious topics. How should public worship be conducted, and what sorts of qualifications should ministers possess? How should Scripture be understood? How should people pray? What did the sacrament of Communion mean? What happened to people's souls after they died? Elizabeth's government had needed to devise a common religious practice when actual consensus was impossible. Sensibly, it sought a middle ground between traditional and reformed views. Everyone was legally required to attend Church of England services, and the form of the services themselves was mandated in the Elizabethan Book of Common Prayer. Yet the Book of Common Prayer deliberately avoided addressing abstruse theological controversies. The language of the English church service was carefully chosen to be open to several interpretations and acceptable to both Protestant- and Catholic-leaning subjects.

The Elizabethan compromise effectively tamed many of the Reformation's divisive energies and proved acceptable to the majority of Elizabeth's subjects. To staunch Catholics on one side and ardent Protestants on the other, however, the Elizabethan church seemed to have sacrificed truth to political expediency. Catholics wanted to return England to the Roman fold; while some of them were loyal subjects of the queen, others advocated invasion by a foreign Catholic power. Meanwhile the Puritans, as they were disparagingly called, pressed for more thoroughgoing reformation in doctrine, ritual, and church government, urging the elimination of "popish" elements from worship services and "idolatrous" religious images from churches. Some, the Presbyterians, wanted to separate lay and clerical power in the national church, so that church leaders would be appointed by other ministers, not by secular authorities. Others, the separatists, advocated abandoning a national church in favor of small congregations of the "elect."

The resistance of religious minorities to Elizabeth's established church opened them to state persecution. In the 1580s and 1590s, Catholic priests and the laypeople who harbored them were executed for treason, and radical Protestants for heresy. Both groups greeted James's accession enthusiastically; his mother had been the Catholic Mary, Queen of Scots, while his upbringing had been in the strict Reformed tradition of the Scottish Presbyterian Kirk.

James began his reign with a conference at Hampton Court, one of his palaces, at which advocates of a variety of religious views could openly debate them. Yet the Puritans failed to persuade him to make any substantive reforms. Practically speaking, the Puritan belief that congregations should choose their leaders diminished the monarch's power by stripping him of authority over ecclesiastical appointments. More generally, allowing people to choose their leaders in any sphere of life threatened to subvert the entire system of deference and hierarchy upon which the institution of monarchy itself seemed to rest. "No bishop, no king," James famously remarked.

Nor did Catholics fare well in the new reign. Initially inclined to lift Elizabeth's sanctions against them, James hesitated when he realized how entrenched was the opposition to toleration. Then, in 1605, a small group of disaffected Catholics packed a cellar adjacent to the Houses of Parliament with gunpowder, intending to detonate it on the day that the king formally opened Parliament, with Prince Henry, the Houses of Lords and Commons, and the leading justices in attendance. The conspirators were arrested before they could effect their plan. If the "Gunpowder Plot" had succeeded, it would have eliminated much of England's ruling class in a single tremendous explosion, leaving the land vulnerable to invasion by a foreign, Catholic power. Not surprisingly, the Gunpowder Plot dramatically heightened anti-Catholic paranoia in England, and its apparently miraculous revelation was widely seen as a sign of God's care for England's Protestant governors.

By and large, then, James's ecclesiastical policies continued along the lines laid down by Elizabeth. By appointing bishops of varying doctrinal views, he restrained any single faction from controlling church policy. The most important religious event of James's reign was a newly commissioned translation of the Bible. First published in 1611, it was a typically moderating document. A much more graceful rendering than its predecessor, the Geneva version produced by Puritan expatriates in the 1550s, the King James Bible immediately became the standard English Scripture. Its impressive rhythms and memorable phrasing would influence writers for centuries. On the one hand, the new translation contributed to the Protestant aim of making the Bible widely available to every reader in the vernacular. On the other hand, unlike the Geneva Bible, the King James Version translated controversial and ambiguous passages in ways that bolstered conservative preferences for a ceremonial church and for a hierarchically organized church government.

James's moderation was not universally popular. Some Protestants yearned for a more confrontational policy toward Catholic powers, particularly toward Spain, England's old enemy. In the first decade of James's reign, this party clustered around James's eldest son and heir apparent, Prince Henry, who cultivated a militantly Protestant persona. When Henry died of typhoid fever in 1612, those who favored his policies were forced to seek avenues of power outside the royal court. By the 1620s, the House of Commons was developing a vigorous sense of its own independence, debating policy agendas often quite at odds with the Crown's and openly attempting to use its power to approve taxation as a means of exacting concessions from the king.

James's second son, Prince Charles, came to the throne upon James's death in 1625. Unlike his father, Charles was not a theorist of royal absolutism, but he acted on that principle with an inflexibility that his father had never been able to muster. By 1629 he had dissolved Parliament three times in frustration with its recalcitrance, and he then began more than a decade of "personal rule" without Parliament. Charles was more prudent in some respects than his father had been—he not only restrained the costs of his own court, but paid off his father's staggering debts by the early 1630s. Throughout his reign, he conscientiously applied himself to the business of government. Yet his refusal to involve powerful individuals and factions in the workings of the state inevitably alienated them, even while it cut him off dangerously from important channels of information about the reactions of his people. Money was a constant problem, too. Even a relatively frugal king required some funds for ambitious government initiatives; but without parliamentary approval, any taxes Charles imposed were widely perceived as illegal. As a result, even wise policies, such as Charles's effort to build up the English navy, spawned misgivings among many of his subjects.

Religious conflicts intensified. Charles's queen, the French princess Henrietta Maria, supported an entourage of Roman Catholic priests, protected English Catholics, and encouraged several noblewomen in her court to convert to the Catholic faith. While Charles remained a staunch member of the Church of England, he loved visual splendor and majestic ceremony in all aspects of life, spiritual and otherwise—proclivities that led his Puritan subjects to suspect him of popish sympathies. Charles's profound attachment to his wife, so different from James's neglect of Anne, only deepened their qualms. Like many fellow Puritans, Lucy Hutchinson blamed the entire debacle of Charles's reign on his wife's influence.

Charles's appointment of William Laud as archbishop of Canterbury, the ecclesiastical head of the English Church, further alienated Puritans. Laud subscribed to a theology that most Puritans rejected. As followers of the sixteenth-century reformer John Calvin, Puritans held that salvation depended upon faith in Christ, not "works." Works were meaningless because the deeds of sinful human beings could not be sanctified in the absence of faith; moreover, the Fall had so thoroughly corrupted human beings that they could not muster this faith without the help of God's grace. God chose (or refused) to extend grace to particular individuals on grounds that human beings were incapable of comprehending, and his decision had been made from eternity, before the individuals concerned were even born. In other words, Puritans believed, God predestined people to be saved or damned, and Christ's redemptive sacrifice was designed only for the saved group, the "elect." Laud, by contrast, advocated the Arminian doctrine that through Christ, God made redemption freely available to all human beings. Individuals could choose whether or not to respond to God's grace, and they could work actively toward their salvation by acts of charity, ritual devotion, and generosity to the church.

Although Laud's theology appears more generously inclusive than the Calvinist alternative, his ecclesiastical policies were uncompromising. Stripping many Puritan ministers of their posts, Laud aligned the doctrine and ceremonies of the English church with Roman Catholicism, which like Arminianism held works in high regard. In an ambitious project of church renovation, Laud installed religious paintings and images in churches; he thought they promoted reverence in worshippers, but the Puritans believed they encouraged idolatry. He rebuilt and resituated altars, making them more ornate and prominent: another change that dismayed Puritans, since it implied that the Eucharist rather than the sermon was the central element of a worship service. In the 1630s thousands of Puritans departed for the New England colonies, but many more remained at home, deeply discontented.

As the 1630s drew to a close, Archbishop Laud and Charles attempted to impose a version of the English liturgy and episcopal organization upon Presbyterian Scotland. Unlike his father, Charles had little acquaintance with his northern realm, and he drastically underestimated the difficulties involved. The Scots objected both on nationalist and on religious grounds, and they were not shy about expressing their objections: the bishop of Rrechin, obliged to conduct divine service in the prescribed English style, mounted the pulpit armed with two pistols against his unruly congregation, while his wife, stationed on the floor below, backed him up with a blunderbuss. In the conflict that followed, the Bishops' Wars of 1639 and 1640, Charles's forces met with abject defeat. Exacerbating the situation, Laud was simultaneously insisting upon greater conformity within the English church. Riots in the London streets and the Scots' occupation of several northern English cities forced Charles to call the so-called Long Parliament, which would soon be managing a revolution.

LITERATURE AND CULTURE, 1603-40

Old Ideas and New

In the first part of the seventeenth century, exciting new scientific theories were in the air, but the older ways of thinking about the nature of things had not yet been superseded. Writers such as John Donne, Robert Burton, and Ben Jonson often invoked an inherited body of concepts even though they were aware that those concepts were being questioned or displaced. The Ptolemaic universe, with its fixed earth and circling sun, moon, planets, and stars, was a rich source of poetic imagery. So were the four elements—fire, earth, water, and air—that together were thought to comprise all matter, and the four bodily humors—choler, blood, phlegm, and black bile—which were supposed to determine a person's temperament and to cause physical and mental disease when out of balance. Late Elizabethans and Jacobeans (so called from Jacobus, Latin for James) considered themselves especially prone to melancholy, an ailment of scholars and thinkers stemming from an excess of black bile. Shakespeare's Hamlet is melancholic, as is Bosola in John Webster's Duchess of Malfi and Milton's title figure in "Il Penseroso" ("the serious-minded one"). In his panoramic Anatomy of Melancholy, Burton argued that melancholy was universal.

Key concepts of the inherited system of knowledge were analogy and order. Donne was especially fond of drawing parallels between the macrocosm, or "big world," and the microcosm, or "little world," of the individual human being. Also widespread were versions of the "chain of being" that linked and ordered various kinds of beings in hierarchies. The order of nature, for instance, put God above angels, angels above human beings, human beings above animals, animals above plants, plants above rocks. The social order installed the king over his nobles, nobles over the gentry, gentry over yeomen, yeomen over common laborers. The order of the family set husband above wife, parents above children, master and mistress above servants, the elderly above the young. Each level had its peculiar function, and each was connected to those above and beneath in a tight network of obligation and dependency. Items that occupied similar positions in different hierarchies were related by analogy: thus a monarch was like God, and he was also like a father, the head of the family, or like a lion, most majestic of beasts, or like the sun, the most excellent of heavenly bodies. A medieval or Renaissance poet who calls a king a sun or a lion, then, imagines himself not to be forging a metaphor in his own creative imagination, but to be describing something like an obvious fact of nature. Many Jacobean tragedies, Shakespeare's King Lear perhaps most comprehensively, depict the catastrophes that ensue when these hierarchies rupture, and both the social order and the natural order disintegrate.

Yet this conceptual system was itself beginning to crumble. Francis Bacon advocated rooting out of the mind all the intellectual predilections that had made the old ideas so attractive: love of ingenious correlations, reverence for tradition, and a priori assumptions about what was possible in nature. Instead, he argued, groups of collaborators ought to design controlled experiments to find the truths of nature by empirical means. Even as Bacon was promoting his views in The Advancement of Learning, Novum Organum, and The New Atlantis, actual experiments and discoveries were calling the old verities into question. From the far-flung territories England was beginning to colonize or to trade with, collectors brought animal, plant, and ethnological novelties, many of which were hard to subsume under old categories of understanding. William Harvey's discovery that blood circulated in the body shook received views on the function of blood, casting doubt on the theory of the humors. Galileo's telescope provided evidence confirming Copernican astronomical theory, which dislodged the earth from its stable central position in the cosmos and, in defiance of all ordinary observation, set it whirling around the sun. Galileo found evidence as well of change in the heavens, which were supposed to be perfect and incorruptible above the level of the moon. Donne, like other writers of his age, responded with a mixture of excitement and anxiety to such novel ideas as these:

> And new philosophy calls all in doubt:
> The element of fire is quite put out;
> The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit
> Can well direct him where to look for it.

Several decades later, however, Milton embraced the new science, proudly recalling a visit during his European tour to "the famous Galileo, grown old, a prisoner to the Inquisition for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought.'' In Paradise Lost, he would make complex poetic use of the astronomical controversy, considering how, and how far, humans should pursue scientific knowledge.

Patrons, Printers, and Acting Companies

The social institutions, customs, and practices that had supported and regulated writers in Tudor times changed only gradually before 1640. As it had under Elizabeth, the church promoted writing of several kinds: devotional treatises; guides to meditation; controversial tracts; "cases of conscience," which work out difficult moral issues in complex situations; and especially sermons. Since everyone was required to attend church, everyone heard sermons at least once and often twice on Sunday, as well as on religious or national holidays. The essence of a sermon, Protestants agreed, was the careful exposition of Scripture, and its purpose was to instruct and to move. Yet styles varied; while some preachers, like Donne, strove to enthrall their congregations with all the resources of artful rhetoric, others, especially many Puritans, sought an undecorated style that would display God's word in its own splendor. Printing made it easy to circulate many copies of sermons, blurring the line between oral delivery and written text and enhancing the role of printers and booksellers in disseminating God's word.

Many writers of the period depended in one way or another upon literary patronage. A Jacobean or Caroline aristocrat, like his medieval forebears, was expected to reward dependents in return for services and homage. Indeed, his status was gauged partly on the size of his entourage (that is one reason why in King Lear the hero experiences his daughters' attempts to dismiss his retainers as so intensely humiliating). In the early seventeenth century, although commercial relationships were rapidly replacing feudal ones, patronage pervaded all walks of life: governing relationships between landlords and tenants, masters and servants, kings and courtiers. Writers were assimilated into this system partly because their works reflected well on the patron, and partly because their all-around intelligence made them useful members of a great man's household. Important patrons of the time included the royal family—especially Queen Anne, who sponsored the court masques, and Prince

Henry—the members of the intermarried Sidney/Herbert family, and the Countess of Bedford, Queen Anne's confidante.

Because the patronage relationship often took the form of an exchange of favors rather than a simple financial transaction, its terms were very variable and are difficult to recover with any precision at this historical remove. A poet might dedicate a poem or a work to a patron in the expectation of a simple cash payment. But a patron might provide a wide range of other benefits: a place to live; employment as a secretary, tutor, or household servant; or gifts of clothing (textiles were valuable commodities). Donne, for instance, received inexpensive lodging from the Drury family, for whom he wrote the Anniversaries; a suit of clerical attire from Lucy Russell, Countess of Bedford, when he took orders in the Church of England; and advancement in the church from King James. Ben Jonson lived for several years at the country estates of Lord Aubigny and of Robert Sidney, in whose honor he wrote "To Penshurst"; he received a regular salary from the king in return for writing court masques; and he served as chaperone to Sir Walter Ralegh's son on a Continental tour. Aemilia Lanyer apparently resided for some time in the household of Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland. Andrew Marvell lived for two years with Thomas Fairfax, tutored his daughter and wrote "Upon Appleton House" for him. All these quite different relationships and forms of remuneration fall under the rubric of patronage.

The patronage system required the poets involved to hone their skills at eulogizing their patrons' generosity and moral excellence. Jonson's epigrams and many of Lanyer's dedicatory poems evoke communities of virtuous poets and patrons joined by bonds of mutual respect and affection. Like the line between sycophantic flattery and truthful depiction, the line between patronage and friendship could be a thin one. Literary manuscripts circulated among circles of acquaintances and supporters, many of whom were, at least occasionally, writers as well as readers. Jonson esteemed Mary Wroth both as a fellow poet and as a member of the Sidney family to whom he owed so much. Donne became part of a coterie around Queen Anne's closest confidante, Lucy Russell, Countess of Bedford, who was also an important patron for Ben Jonson, Michael Drayton, and Samuel Daniel. The countess evidently wrote poems herself, although only one attributed to her has apparently survived.

Presenting a poem to a patron, or circulating it among the group of literary people who surrounded the patron, did not require printing it. In early-seventeenth-century England, the reading public for sophisticated literary works was tiny and concentrated in a few social settings: the royal court, the universities, and the Inns of Court, or law schools. In these circumstances, manuscript circulation could be an effective way of reaching one's audience. So a great deal of writing remained in manuscript in early-seventeenth-century England. The collected works of many important writers of the period—most notably John Donne, George Herbert, William Shakespeare, and Andrew Marvell—appeared in print only posthumously, in editions produced by friends or admirers. Other writers, like Robert Herrick, collected and printed their own works long after they were written and (probably) circulated in manuscript. In consequence, it is often difficult to date accurately the composition of a seventeenth-century poem. In addition, when authors do not participate in the printing of their own works, editorial problems multiply—when, for instance, the printed version of a poem is inconsistent with a surviving manuscript copy.

Nonetheless, the printing of all kinds of literary works was becoming more common. Writers such as Francis Bacon or Robert Rurton, who hoped to reach large numbers of readers with whom they were not acquainted, usually arranged for the printing of their texts soon after they were composed. The sense that the printing of lyric poetry, in particular, was a bit vulgar began to fade when the famous Ben Jonson collected his own works in a grand folio edition.

Until 1640 the Stuart kings kept in place the strict controls over print publication originally instituted by Henry VIII, in response to the ideological threat posed by the Reformation. King Henry had given the members of London's Stationer's Company a monopoly on all printing; in return for their privilege, they were supposed to submit texts to prepublication censorship. In the latter part of the sixteenth century, presses associated with the universities at Oxford and Cambridge would begin operation as well, but they were largely concerned with scholarly and theological books. As a result, with a very few exceptions (such as George Herbert's The Temple, published by Cambridge University Press), almost all printed literary texts were produced in London. Most of them were sold there as well, in the booksellers' stalls set up outside St. Paul's Cathedral.

The licensing system located not only primary responsibility for a printed work, but its ownership, with the printer rather than with the author. Printers typically paid writers a onetime fee for the use of their work, but the payment was scanty, and the authors of popular texts realized no royalties from the many copies sold. As a result, no one could make a living as a writer in the early seventeenth century by producing best sellers. The first writer formally to arrange for royalties was apparently John Milton, who received five pounds up front for Paradise Lost, and another five pounds and two hundred copies at the end of each of the first three impressions. Still, legal ownership of and control over a printed work remained with the printer: authorial copyright would not become a reality until the early eighteenth century.

In monetary terms, a more promising outlet for writers was the commercial theater, which provided the first literary market in English history. Profitable and popular acting companies, established successfully in London in Elizabeth's time, continued to play a very important cultural role under James and Charles. Because the acting companies staged a large number of different plays and paid for them at a predictable, if not generous, rate, they enabled a few hardworking writers to support themselves as full-time professionals. One of them, Thomas Dekker, commented bemusedly on the novelty of being paid for the mere products of one's imagination: "the theater," he wrote, "is your poet's Royal Exchange upon which their muses—that are now turned to merchants—meeting, barter away that light commodity of words." In James's reign, Shakespeare was at the height of his powers: Othello, King Lear, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, The Winter's Tale, The Tempest, and other important plays were first staged during these years. So were Jonson's major comedies: Volpone, Epicene, The Alchemist, and Bartholomew Fair. The most important new playwright was John Webster, whose dark tragedies The White Devil and The Duchess of Malfi combined gothic horror with stunningly beautiful poetry.

Just as printers were legally the owners of the texts they printed, so theater companies, not playwrights, were the owners of the texts they performed. Typically, companies guarded their scripts closely, permitting them to be printed only in times of financial distress or when they were so old that printing them seemed unlikely to reduce the paying audience. As a result, many Jacobean and Caroline plays are lost to us or available only in corrupt or posthumous versions. For contemporaries, though, a play was "published" not by being printed but by being performed. Aware of the dangerous potential of plays in arousing the sentiments of large crowds of onlookers, the Stuarts, like the Tudors before them, instituted tight controls over dramatic performances. Acting companies, like printers, were obliged to submit works to the censor before public presentation.

Authors, printers, and acting companies who flouted the censorships laws were subject to imprisonment, fines, or even bodily mutilation. Queen Elizabeth cut off the hand of a man who disagreed in print with her marriage plans, King Charles the ears of a man who inveighed against court masques. Jonson and his collaborators found themselves in prison for ridiculing King James's broad Scots accent in one of their comedies. The effects of censorship on writers' output were therefore far reaching across literary genres. Since overt criticism or satire of the great was so dangerous, political writing was apt to be oblique and allegorical. Writers often employed animal fables, tales of distant lands, or long-past historical events to comment upon contemporary issues.

While the commercial theaters were profitable businesses that made most of their money from paying audiences, several factors combined to bring writing for the theater closer to the Stuart court than it had been in Elizabeth's time. The Elizabethan theater companies had been officially associated with noblemen who guaranteed their legitimacy (in contrast to unsponsored traveling players, who were subject to punishment as vagrants). Early in his reign, James brought the major theater companies under royal auspices. Shakespeare's company, the most successful of the day, became the King's Men: it performed not only all of Shakespeare's plays but also Volpone and The Duchess of Malfi. Queen Anne, Prince Henry, Prince Charles, and Princess Elizabeth sponsored other companies of actors. Royal patronage, which brought with it tangible rewards and regular court performances, naturally encouraged the theater companies to pay more attention to courtly taste. Shakespeare's Macbeth put onstage Scots history and witches, two of James's own interests; in King Lear, the hero's disastrous division of his kingdom may reflect controversies over the proposed union of Scotland and England. In the first four decades of the seventeenth century, court-affiliated theater companies such as the King's Men increasingly cultivated audiences markedly more affluent than the audiences they had sought in the 1580s and 1590s, performing in intimate, expensive indoor theaters instead of, or as well as, in the cheap popular amphitheaters. The Duchess of Malfi, for instance, was probably written with the King's Men's indoor theater at Blackfriars in mind, because several scenes depend for their effect upon a control over lighting that is impossible outdoors. Partly because the commercial theaters seemed increasingly to cater to the affluent and courtly elements of society, they attracted the ire of the king's opponents when civil war broke out in the 1640s.

Jacobean Writers and Genres

The era saw important changes in poetic fashion. Some major Elizabethan genres fell out of favor—long allegorical or mythological narratives, sonnet sequences, and pastoral poems. The norm was coming to be short, concentrated, often witty poems. Poets and prose writers alike often preferred the jagged rhythms of colloquial speech to the elaborate ornamentation and near-musical orchestration of sound that many Elizabethans had sought. The major poets of these years, Jonson, Donne, and Herbert, led this shift and also promoted a variety of "new" genres: love elegy and satire after the classical models of Ovid and Horace, epigram, verse epistle, meditative religious lyric, and country-house poem. Although these poets differed enormously from one another, all three exercised an important influence on the poets of the next generation.

A native Londoner, Jonson first distinguished himself as an acute observer of urban manners in a series of early, controversial satiric plays. Although he wrote two of his most moving poems to his dead children, Jonson focused rather rarely on the dynamics of the family relationships that so profoundly concerned his contemporary Shakespeare. When generational and dynastic matters do figure in his poetry, as they do at the end of "To Penshurst," they seem part of the agrarian, feudal order that Jonson may have romanticized but that he suspected was rapidly disappearing. By and large, Jonson interested himself in relationships that seemed to be negotiated by the participants, often in a bustling urban or courtly world in which blood kinship no longer decisively determined one's social place. Jonson's poems of praise celebrate and exemplify classical and humanist ideals of friendship: like-minded men and women elect to join in a community that fosters wisdom, generosity, civic responsibility, and mutual respect. In the plays and satiric poems, Jonson stages the violation of those values with such riotous comprehensiveness that the very survival of such ideals seem endangered: the plays swarm with voracious swindlers and their eager victims, social climbers both adroit and inept, and a dizzying assortment of morons and misfits. In many of Jonson's plays, rogues or wits collude to victimize others; their stormy, self-interested alliances, apparently so different from the virtuous friendships of the poems of praise, in fact resemble them in one respect: they are connections entered into by choice, not by law, inheritance, or custom.

Throughout his life, Jonson earned his living entirely from his writing, composing plays for the public theater while also attracting patronage as a poet and a writer of court masques. His acute awareness of his audience was partly, then, a sheerly practical matter. Yet Jonson's yearning for recognition ran far beyond any desire for material reward. A gifted poet, Jonson argued, was a society's proper judge and teacher, and he could only be effective if his audience understood and respected the poet's exalted role. Jonson set out unabashedly to create that audience and to monumentalize himself as a great English author. In 1616 he took the unusual step, for his time, of collecting his poems, plays, and masques in an elegant folio volume.

Jonson's influence upon the next generation of writers, and through them into the Restoration and the eighteenth century, was an effect both of his poetic mastery of his chosen modes and of his powerful personal example. Jonson mentored a group of younger poets, known as the Tribe, or Sons, of Ben, meeting regularly with some of them in the Apollo Room of the Devil Tavern in London. Many of the royalist, or Cavalier, poets—Robert Herrick, Thomas Carew, Richard Lovelace, Sir John Suckling, Edmund Waller, Henry Vaughan in his secular verse—proudly acknowledged their relationship to Jonson or gave some evidence of it in their verse. Most of them absorbed too Jonson's attitude toward print and in later decades supervised the publication of their own poems.

Donne, like Jonson, spent most of his life in or near London, often in the company of other writers and intellectuals—indeed, in the company of many of the same writers and intellectuals, since the two men were friends and shared some of the same patrons. Yet, unlike Jonson's, most of Donne's poetry concerns itself not with a crowded social panorama, but with a dyad—with the relationship between the speaker and one single other being, a woman or God—that in its intensity blots out the claims of lesser relationships. Love for Donne encompasses an astonishing range of emotional experiences, from the lusty impatience of "To His Mistress Going to Bed" to the cheerful promiscuity of "The Indifferent" to the mysterious platonic telepathy of "Air and Angels," from the vengeful wit of "The Apparition" to the postcoital tranquility of "The Good Morrow." While for Jonson the shared meal among friends often becomes an emblem of communion, for Donne sexual consummation has something of the same highly charged symbolic character, a moment in which the isolated individual can, however temporarily, escape the boundaries of selfhood in union with another:

> The phoenix riddle hath more with
> By us: we two being one, are it.
> So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit.

In the religious poems, where Donne both yearns for a physical relationship with God and knows it is impossible, he does not abandon his characteristic bodily metaphors. The doctrine of the Incarnation—God's taking material form in the person of Jesus Christ—and the doctrine of the bodily resurrection of the dead at the Last Day are Christian teachings that fascinate Donne, to which he returns again and again in his poems, sermons, and devotional writings. While sexual and religious love had long shared a common vocabulary, Donne delights in making that overlap seem new and shocking. He likens conjoined lovers to saints; demands to be raped by God; speculates, after his wife's death, that God killed her because He was jealous of Donne's divided loyalty; imagines Christ encouraging his Bride, the church, to "open" herself to as many men as possible.

Throughout Donne's life, his faith, like his intellect, was anything but quiet. Born into a family of devout Roman Catholics just as the persecution of Catholics was intensifying in Elizabethan England, Donne eventually became a member of the Church of England. If "Satire 3" is any indication, the conversion was attended by profound doubts and existential crisis. Donne's restless mind can lead him in surprising and sometimes unorthodox directions, to a qualified defense of suicide, for instance, in Biathanatos. At the same time, overwhelmed with a sense of his own unworthiness, he courts God's punishment, demanding to be spat upon, flogged, burnt, broken down, in the expectation that suffering at God's hand will restore him to grace and favor.

In both style and content, Donne's poems were addressed to a select few rather than to the public at large. His style is demanding, characterized by learned terms, audaciously far-fetched analogies, and an intellectually sophisticated play of ironies. Even Donne's sermons, attended by large crowds, share the knotty difficulty of the poems, and something too of their quality of intimate address. Donne circulated his poems in manuscript and largely avoided print publication (most of his poems were printed after his death in 1631). By some critics Donne has been regarded as the founder of a Metaphysical school of poetry. We find echoes of Donne's style in many later poets: in Thomas Carew, who praised Donne as a "monarch of wit," George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, John Cleveland, Sir John Suckling, Abraham Cowley, and Andrew Marvell.

Herbert, the younger son of a wealthy, cultivated, and well-connected family, seemed destined in early adulthood for a brilliant career as a diplomat or government servant. Yet he turned his back on worldly greatness to be ordained a priest in the Church of England. Moreover, eschewing a highly visible career as an urban preacher, he spent the remaining years of his short life ministering to the tiny rural parish of Bemerton. Herbert's poetry is shot through with the difficulty and joy of this renunciation, with all it entailed for him. Literary ambition—pride in one's independent creativity—appears to Herbert a temptation that must be resisted, whether it takes the form of Jonson's openly competitive aspiration for literary preeminence or Donne's brilliantly ironic self-displaying performances. Instead, Herbert seeks other models for poetic agency: the secretary taking dictation from a master, the musician playing in harmonious consort with others, the member of a church congregation who speaks with and for a community.

Herbert destroyed his secular verse in English and he turned his volume of religious verse over to a friend only on his deathbed, desiring him to print it if he thought it would be useful to "some dejected poor soul," but otherwise to burn it. The 177 lyrics contained in that volume, The Temple, display a complex religious sensibility and great artistic subtlety in an amazing variety of stanza forms. Herbert was the major influence on the next generation of religious lyric poets and was explicitly recognized as such by Henry Vaughan and Richard Crashaw.

The Jacobean period also saw the emergence of what would become a major prose genre, the familiar essay. The works of the French inventor of the form, Michel de Montaigne, appeared in English translation in 1603, influencing Shakespeare as well as such later writers as Sir Thomas Rrowne. Yet the first essays in English, the work of Francis Bacon, attorney general under Elizabeth and eventually lord chancellor under James, bear little resemblance to Montaigne's intimate, tentative, conversational pieces. Bacon's essays present pithy, sententious, sometimes provocative claims in a tone of cool objectivity, tempering moral counsel with an awareness of the importance of prudence and expediency in practical affairs. In Novum Organum Bacon adapts his deliberately discontinuous mode of exposition to outline a new scientific method, holding out the tantalizing prospect of eventual mastery over the natural world and boldly articulating the ways in which science might improve the human condition. In his fictional Utopia, described in The New Atlantis, Bacon imagines a society that realizes his dream of carefully orchestrated collaborative research, so different from the erratic, uncoordinated efforts of alchemists and amateurs in his own day. Bacon's philosophically revolutionary approach to the natural world profoundly impacted scientifically minded people over the next several generations. His writings influenced the materialist philosophy of his erstwhile secretary, Thomas Hobbes, encouraged Oliver Cromwell to attempt a large-scale overhaul of the university curriculum during the 1650s, and inspired the formation of the Royal Society, an organization of experimental scientists, after the Restoration.

The reigns of the first two Stuart kings mark the entry of Englishwomen, in some numbers, into authorship and publication. Most female writers of the period were from the nobility or gentry; all were much better educated than most women of the period, many of whom remained illiterate. In 1611 Aemilia

Lanyer was the first Englishwoman to publish a substantial volume of original poems. It contained poetic dedications, a long poem on Christ's passion, and a country-house poem, all defending women's interests and importance. In 1613 Elizabeth Cary, Lady Falkland, was the first Englishwoman to publish a tragedy, Mariam, a closet drama that probes the situation of a queen subjected to her husband's domestic and political tyranny. In 1617 Rachel Speght, the first female polemicist who can be securely identified, published a defense of her sex in response to a notorious attack upon "Lewd, Idle, Froward, and Unconstant Women"; she was also the author of a long dream-vision poem. Lady Mary Wroth, niece of Sir Philip Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke, wrote a long prose romance, Urania (1612), which presents a range of women's experiences as lovers, rulers, counselors, scholars, storytellers, poets, and seers. Her Petrarchan sonnet sequence Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, published with Urania, gives poetic voice to the female in love.

THE CAROLINE ERA, 1625-40

When King Charles came to the throne in 1625, "the fools and bawds, mimics and catamites of the former court grew out of fashion," as the Puritan Lucy Hutchinson recalled. The changed style of the court directly affected the arts and literature of the Caroline period (so called after Carolus, Latin for Charles). Charles and his queen, Henrietta Maria, were art collectors on a large scale and patrons of such painters as Peter Paul Rubens and Sir Anthony Van Dyke; the latter portrayed Charles as a heroic figure of knightly romance, mounted on a splendid stallion. The conjunction of chivalric virtue and divine beauty or love, symbolized in the union of the royal couple, was the dominant theme of Caroline court masques, which were even more extravagantly hyperbolic than their Jacobean predecessors. Even as Henrietta Maria encouraged an artistic and literary cult of platonic love, several courtier-poets, such as Carew and Suckling, wrote playful, sophisticated love lyrics that both alluded to this fashion and sometimes urged a more licentiously physical alternative.

The religious tensions between the Caroline court's Laudian church and the Puritan opposition produced something of a culture war. In 1633 Charles reissued the Book of Sports, originally published by his father in 1618, prescribing traditional holiday festivities and Sunday sports in every parish. Like his father, he saw these recreations as the rural, downscale equivalent of the court masque: harmless, healthy diversions for people who otherwise spent most of their waking hours hard at work. Puritans regarded masques and rustic dances alike as occasions for sin, the Maypole as a vestige of pagan phallus worship, and Sunday sports as a profanation of the Sabbath. In 1632 William Prynne staked out the most extreme Puritan position, publishing a tirade of over one thousand pages against stage plays, court masques, Maypoles, Laudian church rituals, stained-glass windows, mixed dancing, and other outrages, all of which he associated with licentiousness, effeminacy, and the seduction of popish idolatry. For this cultural critique, Prynne was stripped of his academic degrees, ejected from the legal profession, set in the pillory, sentenced to life imprisonment, and had his books burned and his ears cut off. The severity of the punishments indicates the perceived danger of the book and the inextricability of literary and cultural affairs from politics.

Milton's astonishingly virtuosic early poems also respond to the tensions of the 1630s. Milton repudiated both courtly aesthetics and also Prynne's whole-sale prohibitions, developing reformed versions of pastoral, masque, and hymn. In "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," the birth of Christ coincides with a casting out of idols and a flight of false gods, stanzas that suggest contemporary Puritan resistance to Archbishop Laud's policies. Milton's magnificent funeral elegy "Lycidas" firmly rejects the poetic career of the Cavalier poet, who disregards high artistic ambition to "sport with Amaryllis in the shade / Or with the tangles of Neaera's hair." The poem also vehemently denounces the establishment clergy, ignorant and greedy "blind mouths" who rob their flocks of spiritual nourishment.

THE REVOLUTIONARY ERA, 1640-60

Early in the morning on January 30, 1649, Charles Stuart, the dethroned king Charles I, set off across St. James Park for his execution, surrounded by a heavy guard. He wore two shirts because the weather was frigid, and he did not want to look as if he were shivering with fear to the thousands who had gathered to watch him be beheaded. The black-draped scaffold had been erected just outside James I's elegant Banqueting House, inside of which so many court masques, in earlier decades, had celebrated the might of the Stuart monarchs and assured them of their people's love and gratitude. To those who could not attend, newsbooks provided eyewitness accounts of the dramatic events of the execution, as they had of Charles's trial the week before. Andrew Marvell also memorably describes the execution scene in "An Horatian Ode."

The execution of Charles I was understood at the time, and is still seen by many historians today, as a watershed event in English history. How did it come to pass? Historians do not agree over what caused "the English revolution," or, as it is alternatively called, the English civil war. One group argues that long-term changes in English society and the English economy led to rising social tensions and eventually to violent conflict. New capitalist modes of production in agriculture, industry, and trade were often incompatible with older feudal norms. The gentry, an affluent, highly educated class below the nobility but above the artisans, mechanics, and yeomen, played an increasingly important part in national affairs, as did the rich merchants in London; but the traditional social hierarchies failed to grant them the economic, political, and religious freedoms they believed they deserved. Another group of historians, the "revisionists," emphasize instead short-term and avoidable causes of the war—unlucky chances, personal idiosyncrasies, and poor decisions made by a small group of individuals.

Whatever caused the outbreak of hostilities, there is no doubt that the twenty-year period between 1640 and 1660 saw the emergence of concepts central to bourgeois liberal thought for centuries to come: religious toleration, separation of church and state, freedom from press censorship, and popular sovereignty. These concepts developed out of bitter disputes centering on three fundamental questions: What is the ultimate source of political power? What kind of church government is laid down in Scripture, and therefore ought to be settled in England? What should be the relation between the church and the state? The theories that evolved in response to these questions contained the seeds of much that is familiar in modern thought, mixed with much that is forbiddingly alien. It is vital to recognize that the participants in the disputes were not haphazardly attempting to predict the shape of modern liberalism, but were responding powerfully to the most important problems of their day. The need to find right answers seemed particularly urgent for the Millenarians among them, who, interpreting the upheavals of the time through the lens of the apocalyptic Book of Revelation, believed that their day was very near to being the last day of all.

When the so-called Long Parliament convened in 1640, it did not plan to execute a monarch or even to start a war. It did, however, want to secure its rights in the face of King Charles's perceived absolutist tendencies. Refusing merely to approve taxes and go home, as Charles would have wished, Parliament insisted that it could remain in session until its members agreed to disband. Then it set about abolishing extralegal taxes and courts, reining in the bishops' powers, and arresting (and eventually trying and executing) the king's ministers, the Earl of Strafford and Archbishop Laud. The collapse of effective royal government meant that the machinery of press censorship, which had been a Crown responsibility, no longer restrained the printing of explicit commentary on contemporary affairs of state. As Parliament debated, therefore, presses poured forth a flood of treatises arguing vociferously on all sides of the questions about church and state, creating a lively public forum for political discussion where none had existed before. The suspension of censorship permitted the development of weekly newsbooks that reported, and editorialized on, current domestic events from varying political and religious perspectives.

As the rift widened between Parliament and the king in 1641, Charles sought to arrest five members of Parliament for treason, and Londoners rose in arms against him. The king fled to York, while the queen escaped to the Continent. Negotiations for compromise broke down over the issues that would derail them at every future stage: control of the army and the church. On July 12, 1642, Parliament voted to raise an army, and on August 22 the king stood before a force of two thousand horse and foot at Nottingham, unfurled his royal standard, and summoned his liege men to his aid. Civil war had begun. Regions of the country, cities, towns, social classes, and even families found themselves painfully divided. The king set up court and an alternative parliament in Oxford, to which many in the House of Lords and some in the House of Commons transferred their allegiance.

In the First Civil War (1642—46), Parliament and the Presbyterian clergy that supported it had limited aims. They hoped to secure the rights of the House of Commons, to limit the king's power over the army and the church—but not to depose him—and to settle Presbyterianism as the national established church. As Puritan armies moved through the country, fighting at Edgehill, Marston Moor, Naseby, and elsewhere, they also undertook a crusade to stamp out idolatry in English churches, smashing religious images and stained-glass windows and lopping off the heads of statues as an earlier generation had done at the time of the English Reformation. Their ravages are still visible in English churches and cathedrals.

The Puritans were not, however, a homogeneous group, as the 1643 Toleration Controversy revealed. The Presbyterians wanted a national Presbyterian church, with dissenters punished and silenced as before. But Congregationalists, Independents, Baptists, and other separatists opposed a national church and pressed for some measure of toleration, for themselves at least. The religious radical Roger Williams, just returned from New England, argued that Christ mandated the complete separation of church and state and the civic toleration of all religions, even Roman Catholics, Jews, and Muslims. Yet to most people, the civil war itself seemed to confirm that people of different faiths could not coexist peacefully. Thus even as sects continued to proliferate—Seekers, Finders, Antinomians, Fifth Monarchists, Quakers, Muggletonians, Ranters—even the most broad-minded of the age often attempted to draw a line between what was acceptable and what was not. Predictably, their lines failed to coincide. In Areopagitica (1644), John Milton argues vigorously against press censorship and for toleration of most Protestants—but for him, Catholics are beyond the pale. Robert Herrick and Sir Thomas Rrowne regarded Catholic rites, and even some pagan ones, indulgently but could not stomach Puritan zeal.

In 1648, after a period of negotiation and a brief Second Civil War, the king's army was definitively defeated. His supporters were captured or fled into exile, losing position and property. Yet Charles, imprisoned on the Isle of Wight, remained a threat. He was a natural rallying point for those disillusioned by parliamentary rule—many people disliked Parliament's legal but heavy taxes even more than they had the king's illegal but lighter ones. Charles repeatedly attempted to escape and was accused of trying to open the realm to a foreign invasion. Some powerful leaders of the victorious New Model Army took drastic action. They expelled royalists and Presbyterians, who still wanted to come to an accommodation with the king, from the House of Commons and abolished the House of Lords. With consensus assured by the purgation of dissenting viewpoints, the army brought the king to trial for high treason in the Great Hall of Westminster.

After the king's execution, the Rump Parliament, the part of the House of Commons that had survived the purge, immediately established a new government "in the way of a republic, without king or House of Lords." The new state was extremely fragile. Royalists and Presbyterians fiercely resented their exclusion from power and pronounced the execution of the king a sacrilege. The Rump Parliament and the army were at odds, with the army rank and file arguing that voting rights ought not be restricted to men of property. The Levelers, led by John Lilburne, called for suffrage for all adult males. An associated but more radical group, called the Diggers or True Levelers, pushed for economic reforms to match the political ones. Their spokesman, Gerrard Winstanley, wrote eloquent manifestos developing a Christian communist program. Meanwhile, Millenarians and Fifth Monarchists wanted political power vested in the regenerate "saints" in preparation for the thousand-year reign of Christ on earth foretold in the biblical Book of Revelation. Quakers defied both state and church authority by refusing to take oaths and by preaching incendiary sermons in open marketplaces. Most alarming of all, out of proportion to their scant numbers, were the Ranters, who believed that because God dwelt in them none of their acts could be sinful. Notorious for sexual license and for public nudity, they got their name from their deliberate blaspheming and their penchant for rambling prophecy. In addition to internal disarray, the new state faced serious external threats. After Charles I s execution, the Scots and the Irish—who had not been consulted about the trial—immediately proclaimed his eldest son, Prince Charles, the new king. The prince, exiled on the Continent, was attempting to enlist the support of a major European power for an invasion.

The formidable Oliver Cromwell, now undisputed leader of the army, crushed external threats, suppressing rebellions in Ireland and Scotland. The Irish war was especially bloody, as Cromwell's army massacred the Catholic natives in a frenzy of religious hatred. When trade rivalries erupted with the Dutch over control of shipping lanes in the North Sea and the English Channel, the new republic was again victorious. Yet the domestic situation remained unstable. Given popular disaffection and the unresolved disputes between Parliament and the army, the republic's leaders dared not call new elections. In 1653 power effectively devolved upon Cromwell, who was sworn in as Lord Protector for life under England's first written constitution. Many property owners considered Cromwell the only hope for stability, while others, including Milton, saw him as a champion of religious liberty. Although persecution of Quakers and Ranters continued, Cromwell sometimes intervened to mitigate the lot of the Quakers. He also began a program to readmit Jews to England, partly in the interests of trade but also to open the way for their conversion, supposedly a precursor of the Last Day as prophesied in the Book of Revelation.

The problem of succession remained unresolved, however. When Oliver Cromwell died in 1658, his son, Richard, was appointed in his place, but he had inherited none of his father's leadership qualities. In 1660 General George Monck succeeded in calling elections for a new "full and free" parliament, open to supporters of the monarchy as well as of the republic. The new Parliament immediately recalled the exiled prince, officially proclaiming him King Charles II on May 8, 1660. The period that followed, therefore, is called the Restoration: it saw the restoration of the monarchy and with it the royal court, the established Church of England, and the professional theater.

Over the next few years, the new regime executed some of the regicides that had participated in Charles I s trial and execution and harshly repressed radical Protestants (the Baptist John Bunyan wrote Pilgrim's Progress in prison). Yet Charles II, who came to the throne at Parliament's invitation, could not lay claim to absolute power as his father had done. After his accession, Parliament retained its legislative supremacy and complete power over taxation, and exercised some control over the king's choice of counselors. It assembled by its own authority, not by the king's mandate. During the Restoration years, the journalistic commentary and political debates that had first flourished in the 1640s remained forceful and open, and the first modern political parties developed out of what had been the royalist and republican factions in the civil war. In London and in other cities, the merchant classes, filled with dissenters, retained their powerful economic leverage. Although the English revolution was apparently dismantled in 1660, its long-term effects profoundly changed English institutions and English society.

The English civil war was disastrous for the English theater. One of Parliament's first acts after hostilities began in 1642 was to abolish public plays and sports, as "too commonly expressing lascivious mirth and levity." Some drama continued to be written and published, but performances were rare and would-be theatrical entrepreneurs had to exploit loopholes in the prohibitions by describing their works as "operas" or presenting their productions in semiprivate circumstances.

As the king's government collapsed, the patronage relationships centered upon the court likewise disintegrated. Many leading poets were staunch royalists, or Cavaliers, who suffered considerably in the war years. Robert Herrick lost his position; Richard Lovelace was imprisoned; Margaret Cavendish went into exile. With their usual networks of manuscript circulation disrupted, many royalist writers printed their verse. Volumes of poetry by Thomas Carew, John Denham, John Suckling, James Shirley, Richard Lovelace, and Robert Herrick appeared in the 1640s. Their poems, some dating from the 1620s or 1630s, celebrate the courtly ideal of the good life: good food, plenty of wine, good verse, hospitality, and high-spirited loyalty, especially to the king. One characteristic genre is the elegant love lyric, often with a carpe diem theme. In Herrick's case especially, apparent ease and frivolity masks a frankly political subtext. The Puritans excoriated May Day celebrations, harvest-home festivities, and other time-honored holidays and "sports" as unscriptural, idolatrous, or frankly pagan. For Herrick, they sustained a community that strove neither for ascetic perfection nor for equality among social classes, but that knew the value of pleasure in cementing social harmony and that incorporated everyone—rich and poor, unlettered and learned—as the established church had traditionally tried to do.

During the 1 640s and 1650s, as they faced defeat, the Cavaliers wrote movingly of the relationship between love and honor, of fidelity under duress, of like-minded friends sustaining one another in a hostile environment. They presented themselves as amateurs, writing verse in the midst of a life devoted to more important matters: war, love, the king's service, the endurance of loss. Rejecting the radical Protestant emphasis on the "inner light," which they considered merely a pretext for presumptuousness and violence, the Cavalier poets often cultivated a deliberately unidiosyncratic, even self-deprecating poetic persona. Thus the poems of Richard Lovelace memorably express sentiments that he represents not as the unique insights of an isolated genius, but as principles easily grasped by all honorable men. When in "The Vine" Herrick relates a wet dream, he not only laughs at himself but at those who mistake their own fantasies for divine inspiration.

During the 1650s, royalists wrote lyric poems in places far removed from the hostile centers of parliamentary power. In Wales, Henry Vaughan wrote religious verse expressing his intense longing for past eras of innocence and for the perfection of heaven or the millennium. Also in Wales, Katherine Philips wrote and circulated in manuscript poems that celebrate female friends in terms normally reserved for male friendships. The publication of her poems after the Restoration brought Philips some celebrity as "the Matchless Orinda." Richard Crashaw, an exile in Paris and Rome and a convert to Roman Catholicism, wrote lush religious poetry that attempted to reveal the spiritual by stimulating the senses. Margaret Cavendish, also in exile, with the queen in Paris, published two collections of lyrics when she returned to England in 1653; after the Restoration she published several dramas and a remarkable Utopian romance, The Blazing World.

Several prose works by royalist sympathizers have become classics in their respective genres. Thomas Hobbes, the most important English philosopher of the period, another exile in Paris, developed his materialist philosophy and psychology there and, in Leviathan (1651), his unflinching defense of absolute sovereignty based on a theory of social contract. Some royalist writing seems to have little to do with the contemporary scene, but in fact carries a political charge. In Religio Medici (1642—43), Sir Thomas Rrowne presents himself as a genial, speculative doctor who loves ritual and ceremony not for complicated theological reasons, but because they move him emotionally. While he can sympathize with all Christians, even Roman Catholics, and while he recognizes in himself many idiosyncratic views, he willingly submits his judgment to the Church of England, in sharp contrast to Puritans bent on ridding the church of its errors. Izaak Walton's treatise on fishing, The Complete Angler (1653), presents a dialogue between Walton's persona, Piscator the angler, and Venator the hunter. Piscator, speaking like many Cavalier poets for the values of warmheartedness, charity, and inclusiveness, converts the busy, warlike Venator, a figure for the Puritan, to the tranquil and contemplative pursuit of fishing.

The revolutionary era gave new impetus to women's writing. The circumstances of war placed women in novel, occasionally dangerous situations, giving them unusual events to describe and prompting self-discovery. The autobiographies of royalists Lady Anne Halkett and Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle, published after the Restoration, report their experiences and their sometimes daring activities during those trying days. Lucy Hutchinson's memoir of her husband, Colonel John Hutchinson, first published in 1806, narrates much of the history of the times from a republican point of view. Leveler women offered petitions and manifestos in support of their cause and of their imprisoned husbands. The widespread belief that the Holy Spirit was moving in unexpected ways encouraged a number of female prophets: Anna Trapnel, Mary Cary, and Lady Eleanor Davies. Their published prophecies often carried a strong political critique of Charles or of Cromwell. Quaker women came into their own as preachers and sometimes as writers of tracts, authorized by the Quaker belief in the spiritual equality of women and men, and by the conviction that all persons should testify to whatever the inner light communicates to them. Many of their memoirs, such as Dorothy Waugh's "Relation," were originally published both to call attention to their sufferings and to inspire other Quakers to similar feats of moral fortitude.

While most writers during this period were royalists, two of the best, Andrew Marvell and John Milton, sided with the republic. Marvell wrote most of the poems for which he is still remembered while at Nunappleton in the early 1650s, tutoring the daughter of the retired parliamentary general Thomas Fairfax; in 1657 he joined his friend Milton in the office of Cromwell's Latin Secretariat. In Marvell's love poems and pastorals, older convictions about ordered harmony give way to wittily unresolved or unresolvable oppositions, some playful, some painful. Marvell's conflictual worldview seems unmistakably the product of the unsettled civil war decades. In his country-house poem "Upon Appleton House," even agricultural practices associated with regular changes of the season, like the flooding of fallow fields, become emblems of unpredictability, reversal, and category confusion. In other poems Marvell eschews an authoritative poetic persona in favor of speakers that seem limited or even a bit unbalanced: a mower who argues for the values of pastoral with disconcerting belligerence, a nymph who seems to exemplify virginal innocence but also immature self-absorption and possibly unconscious sexual perversity. Marvell's finest political poem, "An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland," celebrates Cromwell's providential victories even while inviting sympathy for the executed king and warning about the potential dangers of Cromwell's meteoric rise to power.

A promising, prolific young poet in the 1630s, Milton committed himself to the English republic as soon as the conflict between the king and Parliament began to take shape. His loyalty to the revolution remained unwavering despite his disillusion when it failed to realize his ideals: religious toleration for all Protestants and the free circulation of ideas without prior censorship. First as a self-appointed adviser to the state, then as its official defender, he addressed the great issues at stake in the 1640s and the 1650s. In a series of treatises he argued for church disestablishment and for the removal of bishops, for a republican government based on natural law and popular sovereignty, for the right of the people to dismiss from office and even execute their rulers, and, most controversial even to his usual allies, in favor of divorce on the grounds of incompatibility. Milton was a Puritan, but both his theological heterodoxies and his poetic vision mark him as a distinctly unusual one.

During his years as a political polemicist, Milton also wrote several sonnets, revising that small, love-centered genre to accommodate large private and public topics: a Catholic massacre of proto-Protestants in the foothills of Italy, the agonizing questions posed by his blindness, various threats to intellectual and religious liberty. In 1645 he published his collected English and Latin poems as a counterstatement to the royalist volumes of the 1640s. Yet his most ambitious poetry remained to be written. Milton probably wrote some part of Paradise Lost in the late 1650s and completed it after the Restoration, encompassing in it all he had thought, read, and experienced of tyranny, political controversy, evil, deception, love, and the need for companionship. This cosmic blank-verse epic assimilates and critiques the epic tradition and Milton's entire intellectual and literary heritage, classical and Christian. Yet it centers not on martial heroes but on a domestic couple who must discover how to live a good life day by day, in Eden and later in the fallen world, amid intense emotional pressures and the seductions of evil.

Seventeenth-century poetry, prose, and drama retains its hold on readers because so much of it is so very good, fusing intellectual power, emotional passion, and extraordinary linguistic artfulness. Poetry in this period ranges over an astonishing variety of topics and modes: highly erotic celebrations of sexual desire, passionate declarations of faith and doubt, lavishly embroidered paeans to friends and benefactors, tough-minded assessments of social and political institutions. English dramatists were at the height of their powers, situating characters of unprecedented complexity in plays sometimes remorselessly satiric, sometimes achingly moving. In these years English prose becomes a highly flexible instrument, suited to informal essays, scientific treatises, religious meditation, political polemic, biography and autobiography, and journalistic reportage. Literary forms evolve for the exquisitely modulated representation of the self: dramatic monologues, memoirs, spiritual autobiographies, sermons in which the preacher takes himself for an example. Finally, we have in Milton an epic poet who assumed the role of inspired prophet, envisioning a world created by God but shaped by human choice and imagination.

JOHN DONNE

1572-1631

Lovers' eyeballs threaded on a string. A god who assaults the human heart with a battering ram. A teardrop that encompasses and drowns the world. John Donne's poems abound with startling images, some of them exalting and others grotesque. With his strange and playful intelligence, expressed in puns, paradoxes, and the elaborately sustained metaphors known as "conceits," Donne has enthralled and sometimes enraged readers from his day to our own. The tired cliches of love poetry—cheeks like roses, hearts pierced by the arrows of love—emerge reinvigorated and radically transformed by his hand, demanding from the reader an unprecedented level of mental alertness and engagement. Donne prided himself on his wit and displayed it not only in his conceits but in his grasp of learned and obscure discourses ranging from theology to alchemy, from cosmology to law. Yet for all their ostentatious intellectuality, Donne's poems never give the impression of being academic exercises put into verse. Rather, they are intense dramatic monologues in which the speaker's ideas and feelings seem to shift and evolve from one line to the next. Donne's prosody is equally dramatic, mirroring in its variable and jagged rhythms the effect of speech (and eliciting from his classically minded contemporary Ben Jonson the gruff observation that "Donne, for not keeping of accent deserved hanging").

Donne began life as an outsider, and in some respects remained one until death. He was born in London in 1572 into a devout Roman Catholic household. The family was prosperous, but, as the poet later remarked, none had suffered more heavily for its loyalty to the Catholic Church: "I have been ever kept awake in a meditation of martyrdom." Donne was distantly related to the great Catholic humanist and martyr Sir Thomas More. Closer to home, a Jesuit uncle was executed by the brutal method of hanging, castrating, disemboweling, and quartering, and his own brother Henry, arrested for harboring a priest, died in prison of the plague. As a Catholic in Protestant England, growing up in decades when anti-Roman feeling reached new heights, Donne could not expect any kind of public career, nor even to receive a university degree (he left Oxford without one and studied law for a time at the Inns of Court). What he could reasonably expect instead was prejudice, official harassment, and crippling financial penalties. He chose not to live under such conditions. At some point in the 1590s, having returned to London after travels abroad, and having devoted some years to studying theological issues, Donne converted to the English church.

The poems that belong with certainty to this period of his life—the five satires and most of the elegies—reveal a man both fascinated by and keenly critical of English society. Four of the satires treat commonplace Elizabethan topics—foppish and obsequious courtiers, bad poets, corrupt lawyers and a corrupt court—but are unique both in their visceral revulsion and in their intellectual excitement. Donne uses striking images of pestilence, itchy lust, vomit, excrement, and pox to create a unique satiric world, busy, vibrant, and corrupt, in which his dramatic speakers have only to step outside the door to be inundated by all the fools and knaves in Christendom. By contrast, the third satire treats the quest for true religion—the question that preoccupied him above all others in these years—in terms that are serious, passionately witty, and deeply felt. Donne argues that honest doubting search is better than the facile acceptance of any religious tradition, epitomizing that point brilliantly in the image of Truth on a high and craggy hill, very difficult to climb. What is certain is that society's values are of no help whatsoever to the individual seeker—none will escape the final judgment by pleading that "A Harry, or a Martin taught [them] this." In the love elegies Donne seems intent on making up for his social powerlessness through witty representations of mastery in the bedroom and of adventurous travel. In "Elegy 16" he imagines his speaker embarking on a journey "O'er the white Alps" and with mingled tenderness and condescension argues down a naive mistress's proposal to accompany him. And in "Elegy 19," his fondling of a naked lover becomes in a famous conceit the equivalent of exploration in America. Donne's interest in satire and elegy—classical Roman genres, which he helped introduce to English verse—is itself significant. He wrote in English, but he reached out to other traditions.

If Donne's conversion to the Church of England promised him security, social acceptance, and the possibility of a public career, that promise was soon to be cruelly withdrawn. In 1596—97 he participated in the Earl of Essex's military expeditions against Catholic Spain in Cadiz and the Azores (the experience prompted two remarkable descriptive poems of life at sea, "The Storm" and "The Calm") and upon his return became secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. This should have been the beginning of a successful public career. But his secret marriage in 1601 to Egerton's seventeen-year-old niece Ann More enraged Donne's employer and the bride's wealthy father; Donne was briefly imprisoned and dismissed from service. The poet was reduced to a retired country life beset by financial insecurity and a rapidly increasing family; Ann bore twelve children (not counting miscarriages) by the time she died at age thirty-three. At one point, Donne wrote despairingly that while the death of a child would mean one less mouth to feed, he could not afford the burial expenses. In this bleak period, he wrote but dared not publish Biathanatos, a paradoxical defense of suicide.

As his family grew, Donne made every effort to reinstate himself in the favor of the great. To win the approval of James I, he penned Pseudo-Martyr (1610), defending the king's insistence that Catholics take the Oath of Allegiance. This set an irrevocable public stamp on his renunciation of Catholicism, and Donne followed up with a witty satire on the Jesuits, Ignatius His Conclave (1611). In the same period he was producing a steady stream of occasional poems for friends and patrons such as Somerset (the king's favorite), the Countess of Bedford, and Magdalen Herbert, and for small coteries of courtiers and ladies. Like most gentlemen of his era, Donne saw poetry as a polite accomplishment rather than as a trade or vocation, and in consequence he circulated his poems in manuscript but left most of them uncollected and unpublished. In 1611 and 1612, however, he published the first and second Anniversaries on the death of the daughter of his patron Sir Robert Drury.

For some years King James had urged an ecclesiastical career on Donne, denying him any other means of advancement. In 1615 Donne finally consented, overcoming his sense of unworthiness and the pull of other ambitions. He was ordained in the Church of England and entered upon a distinguished career as court preacher, reader in divinity at Lincoln's Inn, and dean of St. Paul's. Donne's metaphorical style, bold erudition, and dramatic wit established him as a great preacher in an age that appreciated learned sermons powerfully delivered. Some 160 of his sermons survive, preached to monarchs and courtiers, lawyers and London magistrates, city merchants and trading companies. As a distinguished clergyman in the Church of England, Donne had traveled an immense distance from the religion of his childhood and the adventurous life of his twenties. Yet in his sermons and late poems we find the same brilliant and idiosyncratic mind at work, refashioning his profane conceits to serve a new and higher purpose. In "Expostulation 19" he praises God as the greatest of literary stylists: "a figurative, a metaphorical God," imagining God as a conceit-maker like himself. In poems, meditations, and sermons, Donne came increasingly to be engaged in anxious contemplation of his own mortality. In "Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness," Donne imagines himself spread out on his deathbed like a map showing the route to the next world. Only a few days before his death he preached "Death's Duel," a terrifying analysis of all life as a decline toward death and dissolution, which contemporaries termed his own funeral sermon. On his deathbed, according to his contemporary biographer Izaak Walton, Donne had a portrait made of himself in his shroud and meditated on it daily. Meditations upon skulls as emblems of mortality were common in the period, but nothing is more characteristic of Donne than to find a way to meditate on his own skull.

Given the shape of Donne's career, it is no surprise that his poems and prose works display an astonishing variety of attitudes, viewpoints, and feelings on the great subjects of love and religion. Yet this variety cannot be fully explained in biographical terms. The poet's own attempt to distinguish between Jack Donne, the young rake, and Dr. Donne, the grave and religious dean of St. Paul's, is (perhaps intentionally) misleading. We do not know the time and circumstances for most of Donne's verses, but it is clear that many of his finest religious poems predate his ordination, and it is possible that he continued to add to the love poems known as his "songs and sonnets" after he entered the church. Theological language abounds in his love poetry, and daringly erotic images occur in his religious verse.

Donne's "songs and sonnets" have been the cornerstone of his reputation almost since their publication in 1633. The title Songs and Sonnets associates them with the popular miscellanies of love poems and sonnet sequences in the Petrarchan tradition, but they directly challenge the popular Petrarchan sonnet sequences of the 1590s. The collection contains only one formal sonnet, the "songs" are not notably lyrical, and Donne draws upon and transforms a whole range of literary traditions concerned with love. Like Petrarch, Donne can present himself as the despairing lover of an unattainable lady ("The Funeral"); like Ovid he can be lighthearted, witty, cynical, and frankly lustful ("The Flea," "The Indifferent"); like the Neoplatonists, he espouses a theory of transcendent love, but he breaks from them with his insistence in many poems on the union of physical and spiritual love. What binds these poems together and grants them enduring power is their compelling immediacy. The speaker is always in the throes of intense emotion, and that emotion is not static but constantly shifting and evolving with the turns of the poet's thought. Donne seems supremely present in these poems, standing behind their various speakers. Where Petrarchan poets exhaustively catalogue their beloved's physical features (though in highly conventional terms), Donne's speakers tell us little or nothing about the loved woman, or about the male friends imagined as the audience for many poems. Donne's repeated insistence that the private world of lovers is superior to the wider public world, or that it somehow contains all of that world, or obliterates it, is understandable in light of the many disappointments of his career. Yet this was also a poet who threw himself headlong into life, love, and sexuality, and later into the very visible public role of court and city preacher.

Donne was long grouped with Herbert, Vaughan, Crashaw, Marvell, Traherne, and Cowley under the heading of "Metaphysical poets." The expression was first employed by critics like Samuel Johnson and William Hazlitt, who found the intricate conceits and self-conscious learning of these poets incompatible with poetic beauty and sincerity. Early in the twentieth century, T. S. Eliot sought to restore their reputation, attributing to them a unity of thought and feeling that had since their time been lost. There was, however, no formal "school" of Metaphysical poetry, and the characteristics ascribed to it by later critics pertain chiefly to Donne. Like Ben Jonson, John Donne had a large influence on the succeeding generation, but he remains a singularity.

FROM SONGS AND SONNETS[1]

The Flea[2]

Mark but this flea, and mark in this,
How little that which thou deniest me is;
Me it sucked first, and now sucks thee,
And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;
Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, or shame, or loss of maidenhead,° virginity
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pampered° swells with one blood made of two,[3] overfed
And this, alas, is more than we would do.

Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, nay more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we are met,
And cloistered[4] in these living walls of jet.° black
Though use° make you apt to kill me,[5] habit
Let not to that, self-murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find'st not thy self nor me the weaker now;
'Tis true; then learn how false fears be:
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

1633

The Good-Morrow° morning greeting

I wonder, by my troth,° what thou and I good faith
Did, till we loved? Were we not weaned till then,
But sucked on country pleasures, childishly?

[1] Donne's love poems were written over nearly two decades, beginning around 1595; they were not published in Donne's lifetime but circulated widely in manuscript. The title Songs and Sonnets was supplied in the second edition (1635), which grouped the poems by kind, but neither this arrangement nor the more haphazard organization of the first edition (1633) is Donne's own. In Donne's time the term "sonnet" often meant simply "love lyric," and in fact there is only one formal sonnet in this collection. For the poems we present we follow the 1635 edition, beginning with the extremely popular poem "The Flea."

[2] This insect afforded a popular erotic theme for poets all over Europe, deriving from a pseudo-Ovidian medieval poem in which a lover envies the flea for the liberties it takes with his mistress's body.

[3] The swelling suggests pregnancy.

[4] As in a convent or monastery.

[5] By denying me sexual gratification.

Or snorted° we in the seven sleepers' den?[1] snored
'Twas so; but° this, all pleasures fancies be. except for
If ever any beauty I did see,
Which I desired, and got, 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good morrow to our waiting souls,
Which watch not one another out of fear;
For love all love of other sights controls,
And makes one little room an everywhere.
Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
Let maps to others, worlds on worlds have shown:
Let us possess one world;[2] each hath one, and is one.

My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
Where can we find two better hemispheres,
Without sharp North, without declining West?
Whatever dies was not mixed equally;[3]
If our two loves be one, or thou and I
Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.

1633

Song

Go and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root,[1]
Tell me where all past years are,
Or who cleft the Devil's foot,
Teach me to hear mermaids° singing, sirens
Or to keep off envy's stinging,
And find
What wind
Serves to advance an honest mind.

If thou beest born to strange sights,
Things invisible to see,
Ride ten thousand days and nights,
Till age snow white hairs on thee,
Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
All strange wonders that befell thee,
And swear
No where
Lives a woman true, and fair.

[1] Cave in Ephesus where, according to legend, seven Christian youths hid from pagan persecutors and slept for 187 years.

[2] "Our world" in many manuscripts.

[3] Scholastic philosophy taught that when the elements were imperfectly mixed ("not mixed equally"), matter was mutable and mortal; conversely, when the elements were perfectly mixed, matter was immutable and hence immortal.

[1] The mandrake root, or mandragora, is forked like the lower part of the human body. It was thought to shriek when pulled from the ground and to kill all humans who heard it; it was also (paradoxically) thought to help women conceive.

If thou find'st one, let me know,
Such a pilgrimage were sweet;
Yet do not, I would not go,
Though at next door we might meet;
Though she were true when you met her,
And last till you write your letter,
Yet she
Will be
False, ere I come, to two, or three.

1633

The Undertaking

I have done one braver° thing — more glorious
Than all the Worthies[1] did,
And yet a braver thence doth spring,
Which is, to keep that hid.

It were but madness now t' impart
The skill of specular stone,[2]
When he which can have learned the art
To cut it, can find none.

So, if I now should utter this,
Others (because no more Such stuff to work upon, there is)
Would love but as before.

But he who loveliness within
Hath found, all outward loathes,
For he who color loves, and skin,
Loves but their oldest clothes.

If, as I have, you also do
Virtue attired in woman see,
And dare love that, and say so too,
And forget the He and She;

And if this love, though placed so,
From profane men you hide,
Which will no faith on this bestow,
Or, if they do, deride;

---

[1] According to medieval legend, the Nine Worthies, or supreme heroes of history, included three Jews (Joshua, David, Judas Maccabaeus), three pagans (Hector, Alexander, Julius Caesar), and three Christians (Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Boulogne).

[2] A transparent or translucent material, reputed to have been used in antiquity for windows, but no longer known. Great skill was needed to cut it.

Then you have done a braver thing
Than all the Worthies did;
And a braver thence will spring,
Which is, to keep that hid.

The Sun Rising[1]

Busy old fool, unruly sun,
Why dost thou thus
Through windows and through curtains call on us?
Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
Late schoolboys and sour prentices,
Go tell court huntsmen that the king will ride,[2]
Call country ants to harvest offices;[3]
Love, all alike, no season knows nor clime,
Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

Thy beams, so reverend and strong
Why shouldst thou think?
I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
But that I would not lose her sight so long;
If her eyes have not blinded thine,
Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
Whether both th' Indias of spice and mine[4]
Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
Ask for those kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
And thou shalt hear, All here in one bed lay.

She is all states,[0] and all princes I, nations
Nothing else is.
Princes do but play us; compared to this,
All honor's mimic, all wealth alchemy.
Thou, sun, art half as happy as we,
In that the world's contracted thus;
Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;
This bed thy center is, these walls thy sphere.[5]

1633

---

[1] Some lines of this poem recall Ovid, Amores 1.13.

[2] King James was very fond of hunting.

[3] Autumn chores. "Country ants": farm drudges.

[4] The India of "spice" is the East Indies; that of "mine" (gold), the West Indies.

[5] According to the old Ptolemaic astronomy, the earth was the center of the sun's orbit, and the sun's motion was contained within its sphere.

The Indifferent[1]

I can love both fair and brown,[2]
Her whom abundance melts, and her whom want betrays,
Her who loves loneness best, and her who masks and plays,
Her whom the country formed, and whom the town,
Her who believes, and her who tries,[0] tests
Her who still[0] weeps with spongy eyes, always
And her who is dry cork, and never cries;
I can love her, and her, and you, and you,
I can love any, so she be not true.

Will no other vice content you?
Will it not serve your turn to do as did your mothers?
Or have you all old vices spent, and now would find out others?
Or doth a fear that men are true torment you?
O we are not, be not you so;
Let me, and do you, twenty know.
Rob me, but bind me not, and let me go.
Must I, who came to travail thorough[3] you,
Grow your fixed subject, because you are true?

Venus heard me sigh this song,
And by love's sweetest part, variety, she swore,
She heard not this till now; and that it should be so no more.
She went, examined, and returned ere long,
And said, Alas, some two or three
Poor heretics in love there be,
Which think to stablish dangerous constancy.
But I have told them, Since you will be true,
You shall be true to them who are false to you.

1633

The Canonization[1]

For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love,
  Or chide my palsy, or my gout,
My five gray hairs, or ruined fortune, flout,
  With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve,
    Take you a course, get you a place,[2]
    Observe His Honor, or His Grace,[3]
Or the king's real, or his stamped face[4]
  Contemplate; what you will, approve,[0] try, test
  So you will let me love.

---

[1] Some lines of this poem recall Ovid, Amores 2.4.

[2] Both blonde and brunette.

[3] Through. "Travail": grief.

[1] The poem plays off against the Roman Catholic process of determining that certain persons are saints, proper objects of veneration and prayer.

[2] An appointment, at court or elsewhere. "Take you a course": follow some career.

[3] Pay court to some lord or bishop.

[4] On coins; "real" (royal) refers also to a particular Spanish coin.

Alas, alas, who's injured by my love?
What merchant's ships have my sighs drowned?
Who says my tears have overflowed his ground?
When did my colds a forward[0] spring remove?[5] early
When did the heats which my veins fill
Add one man to the plaguy bill?[6]
Soldiers find wars, and lawyers find out still Litigious men, which quarrels move,
Though she and I do love.

Call us what you will, we are made such by love;
Call her one, me another fly,
We're tapers too, and at our own cost die,[7]
And we in us find the eagle and the dove.
The phoenix riddle hath more wit
By us: we two being one, are it.[8]
So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit.
We die and rise the same, and prove
Mysterious by this love.

We can die by it, if not live by love,
And if unfit for tombs and hearse
Our legend be, it will be fit for verse;
And if no piece of chronicle we prove,
We'll build in sonnets pretty rooms;[9]
As well a well-wrought urn becomes[0] befits
The greatest ashes, as half-acre tombs,
And by these hymns,[1] all shall approve[0] confirm
Us canonized for love:

And thus invoke us: You whom reverend love
Made one another's hermitage;
You, to whom love was peace, that now is rage;
Who did the whole world's soul contract,[2] and drove
Into the glasses of your eyes
(So made such mirrors, and such spies, spyglasses, telescopes
That they did all to you epitomize)
Countries, towns, courts:[3] Beg from above
A pattern of your love!

[5] Petrarchan lovers traditionally sigh, weep, and are frozen because of their mistresses' neglect.

[6] Deaths from the plague, which raged in summer, were recorded by parish in weekly lists.

[7] Flies were emblems of transience and lustfulness; tapers (candles) attract flies to their death and also consume themselves. "Die" in the punning terminology of the period means to experience orgasm, and there was a superstition that intercourse shortened life.

[8] The eagle signifies strength and vision; the dove, meekness and mercy. The phoenix was a mythic Arabian bird, only one of which existed at any one time. After living five hundred years, it was consumed by fire, then rose triumphantly from its ashes a new bird. Thus it was a symbol of immortality and sometimes associated with Christ. "Eagle" and "dove" are also alchemical terms for processes leading to the rise of "phoenix," a stage in the transmutation of metals to gold.

[9] "Rooms" (punning on the Italian meaning of "stanza") will contain their exploits, as prose chronicle histories contain great deeds done in the world.

[1] The lover's own poems.

[2] An alternative meaning is "extract."

[3] "Countries, towns, courts" are objects of the verb "drove." The notion is that eyes both see and reflect the outside world, and so can contain all of it.

Song

Sweetest love, I do not go,
For weariness of thee,
Nor in hope the world can show
A fitter love for me;
But since that I
Must die at last, 'tis best,
To use myself in jest
Thus by feigned deaths[0] to die. i.e., absences

Yesternight the sun went hence
And yet is here today,
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way:
Then fear not me,
But believe that I shall make Speedier journeys, since I take
More wings and spurs than he.

O how feeble is man's power,
That if good fortune fall,[0] happen
Cannot add another hour,
Nor a lost hour recall!
But come bad chance,
And we join to'it our strength,
And we teach it art and length,
Itself o'er us to'advance.

When thou sigh'st, thou sigh'st not wind,
But sigh'st my soul away,
When thou weep'st, unkindly[1] kind,
My life's blood doth decay.
It cannot be
That thou lov'st me, as thou say'st,
If in thine my life thou waste,
Thou art the best of me.

Let not thy divining[0] heart prophetic
Forethink me any ill,
Destiny may take thy part,
And may thy fears fulfill;
But think that we
Are but turned aside to sleep;
They who one another keep Alive, ne'er parted be.

[1] Also carries the meaning "unnaturally."

Air and Angels

Twice or thrice had I loved thee,
Before I knew thy face or name;
So in a voice, so in a shapeless flame,
Angels affect us oft, and worshipped be;
Still[0] when, to where thou wert, I came, always
Some lovely glorious nothing[1] I did see.
But since my soul, whose child love is,
Takes limbs of flesh, and else could nothing do,[2]
More subtle[0] than the parent is rarefied
Love must not be, but take a body too;
And therefore what thou wert, and who,
I bid love ask, and now
That it assume thy body I allow,
And fix itself in thy lip, eye, and brow.
Whilst thus to ballast love I thought,
And so more steadily to have gone,
With wares which would sink[0] admiration, overwhelm
I saw I had love's pinnace[0] overfraught;[0] small boat / overballasted
Every thy hair for love to work upon
Is much too much, some fitter must be sought;
For, nor in nothing, nor in things
Extreme and scatt'ring[0] bright, can love inhere, diffused, dazzling
Then as an angel, face and wings
Of air, not pure as it, yet pure doth wear,
So thy love may be my love's sphere;[3]
Just such disparity
As is 'twixt air and angels' purity,
'Twixt women's love and men's will ever be.[4]

1633

Break of Day[1]

'Tis true, 'tis day; what though it be?
O wilt thou therefore rise from me?
Why should we rise because 'tis light?
Did we lie down because 'twas night?
Love, which in spite of darkness brought us hither,
Should in despite of light keep us together.

Light hath no tongue, but is all eye;
If it could speak as well as spy,

---

[1] Spiritual beauty, the true object of love in Neoplatonic philosophy.

[2] My soul could not function unless it were in a body.

[3] Each sphere was thought to be governed by an angel (an intelligence).

[4] It was commonly believed that angels, when they appeared to humans, assumed a body of air which, though pure, was less so than the angel's spiritual essence.

[1] An aubade, or song of the lovers' parting at dawn, this poem is unusual for Donne in having a female speaker. The poem was given a musical setting and published in 1622, in William Corkine's Second Book of Ayers.

This were the worst that it could say,
That being well, I fain° would stay, gladly
And that I loved my heart and honor so
That I would not from him, that had them, go.

Must business thee from hence remove?
O, that's the worst disease of love.
The poor, the foul, the false, love can
Admit, but not the busied man.
He which hath business, and makes love, doth do
Such wrong, as when a married man doth woo.

1622, 1633

A Valediction:[1] Of Weeping

Let me pour forth
My tears before thy face whilst I stay here,
For thy face coins them, and thy stamp° they bear, image
And by this mintage they are something worth,
For thus they be
Pregnant of thee;
Fruits of much grief they are, emblems° of more— symbols
When a tear falls, that thou falls which it bore,
So thou and I are nothing then, when on a diverse° shore. different

On a round ball
A workman that hath copies by can lay
An Europe, Afric, and an Asia,
And quickly make that, which was nothing, all;[2]
So doth each tear
Which thee doth wear,[3]
A globe, yea world, by that impression grow,
Till thy tears mixed with mine do overflow
This world; by waters sent from thee, my heaven dissolved so.

O more than moon,
Draw not up seas to drown me in thy sphere;[4]
Weep me not dead in thine arms, but forbear
To teach the sea what it may do too soon.
Let not the wind
Example find
To do me more harm than it purposeth;
Since thou and I sigh one another's breath,
Whoe'er sighs most is cruelest, and hastes the other's death.

[1] A farewell poem, one of four so titled in the Songs and Sonnets. Another is "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning," p. 1275.

[2] I.e., on a blank globe one can place maps of the continents and so convert a cipher ("nothing") into the whole world ("all").

[3] Which bears your image.

[4] A star or planet with more power of attraction than the moon might not only affect tides but draw the very seas unto itself.

Love's Alchemy

Some that have deeper digged love's mine than I,
Say where his centric° happiness doth lie: central
I have loved, and got, and told,
But should I love, get, tell, till I were old,
I should not find that hidden mystery;
O, 'tis imposture all:
And as no chemic° yet the elixir[1] got, alchemist
But glorifies his pregnant pot[2]
If by the way to him befall
Some odoriferous thing, or medicinal;
So lovers dream a rich and long delight,
But get a winter-seeming summer's night.[3]

Our ease, our thrift, our honor, and our day,
Shall we for this vain bubble's shadow pay?
Ends love in this, that my man° servant
Can be as happy as I can, if he can
Endure the short scorn of a bridegroom's play?
That loving wretch that swears
'Tis not the bodies marry, but the minds,
Which he in her angelic finds,
Would swear as justly that he hears,
In that day's rude hoarse minstrelsy, the spheres.[4]
Hope not for mind in women; at their best
Sweetness and wit, they are but mummy, possessed.[5]

A Nocturnal upon Saint Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day[1]

'Tis the year's midnight and it is the day's,
Lucy's, who scarce seven hours herself unmasks;
The sun is spent, and now his flasks[2]
Send forth light squibs,° no constant rays. small fireworks
The world's whole sap is sunk;

---

[1] A magic medicine sought by alchemists and reputed to heal all ills.

[2] A fertile (and womb-shaped) retort, calling up the common analogy between producing the elixir of life and human generation.

[3] A night cold as in winter and short as in summer.

[4] The perfect harmony of the planets, moving in concentric crystalline "spheres," is contrasted with the boisterous serenade of pots, pans, and trumpets performed on the wedding night.

[5] The syntax of the last two lines is unclear, and they are punctuated differently in various copies. The 1633 edition reads: "at their best, / Sweetnesse, and wit they'are, but, mummy, possesst." Many modern editors punctuate as we do here. "Mummy" suggests a corpselike body, without mind or spirit.

[1] The nocturne, or night office of the Roman Catholic Church, is a service held in the primitive church at midnight. St. Lucy's Day fell on December 13 according to the old calendar still in use in England at the time, and its vigil (the previous day and night) is the winter solstice, the shortest day of the year. At this time of the year, the sun rises after 8 A.M. in the latitude of London and sets well before 4 P.M.

[2] The stars are "flasks," thought to store up light from the sun.

The general balm th' hydroptic[3] earth hath drunk,
Whither, as to the bed's feet, life is shrunk,
Dead and interred; yet all these seem to laugh,
Compared with me, who am their epitaph.

Study me, then, you who shall lovers be
At the next world, that is, at the next spring;
   For I am every dead thing
   In whom love wrought new alchemy.
      For his art did express° extract
A quintessence[4] even from nothingness,
From dull privations and lean emptiness.
He ruined me, and I am re-begot
Of absence, darkness, death: things which are not.

All others from all things draw all that's good,
Life, soul, form, spirit, whence they being have;
   I, by love's limbeck,[5] am the grave
   Of all that's nothing. Oft a flood
      Have we two wept, and so
Drowned the whole world, us two; oft did we grow
To be two chaoses when we did show
Care to aught° else; and often absences anything
Withdrew our souls, and made us carcasses.

But I am by her death (which word wrongs her)
Of the first nothing the elixir grown;[6]
   Were I a man, that I were one
   I needs must know; I should prefer,
      If I were any beast,
Some ends, some means; yea plants, yea stones detest
And love.[7] All, all some properties invest.
If I an ordinary nothing were,
As shadow, a light and body must be here.

But I am none; nor will my sun renew.
You lovers, for whose sake the lesser sun
   At this time to the Goat[8] is run
   To fetch new lust and give it you,
      Enjoy your summer all.
Since she enjoys her long night's festival,
Let me prepare towards her, and let me call
This hour her vigil and her eve, since this
Both the year's and the day's deep midnight is.

[3] Dropsical, thus insatiably thirsty. "General balm": the supposedly life-preserving essence of all things.

[4] The reputed fifth essence, a celestial element beyond the mundane four elements (earth, water, air, fire), thought to be latent in all things and to be a universal cure. Alchemists sought to extract it.

[5] Alembic; a vessel used in distilling.

[6] I.e., the quintessence of that absolute nothingness that existed before the creation.

[7] Beasts have intentions; plants and even stones (like lodestones) have attractions and antipathies.

[8] The sign of Capricorn, which the sun enters at the winter solstice; the goat is an emblem of sexual vigor.

The Bait[1]

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will some new pleasures prove,° try
Of golden sands and crystal brooks,
With silken lines and silver hooks.

There will the river whispering run,
Warmed by thine eyes more than the sun.
And there the enamored fish will stay,
Begging themselves they may betray.

When thou wilt swim in that live bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.

If thou, to be so seen, beest loath,
By sun or moon, thou darkenest both;
And if myself have leave to see,
I need not their light, having thee.

Let others freeze with angling reeds,
And cut their legs with shells and weeds,
Or treacherously poor fish beset
With strangling snare or windowy net.

Let coarse bold hands from slimy nest
The bedded fish in banks outwrest,
Or curious traitors, sleave-silk flies,[2]
Bewitch poor fishes' wandering eyes.

For thee, thou need'st no such deceit,
For thou thyself art thine own bait;
That fish that is not catched thereby,
Alas, is wiser far than I.

The Apparition

When by thy scorn, O murderess, I am dead,
And that thou thinkst thee free
From all solicitation from me,
Then shall my ghost come to thy bed,
And thee, feigned vestal,[1] in worse arms shall see;
Then thy sick taper will begin to wink,° flicker

---

[1] This poem is Donne's response to Marlowe's "Passionate Shepherd to His Love."Another of the many responses was Ralegh's "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd."

[2] Flies made of unraveled silk. "Curious": exquisitely made.

[1] Virgins consecrated to the Roman goddess Vesta.

And he whose thou art then, being tired before,
Will, if thou stir, or pinch to wake him, think
Thou call'st for more,
And in false sleep will from thee shrink,
And then, poor aspen wretch,[2] neglected thou
Bathed in a cold quicksilver sweat[3] wilt lie
A verier[0] ghost than I; truer
What I will say, I will not tell thee now,
Lest that preserve thee; and since my love is spent,
I had rather thou shouldst painfully repent,
Than by my threatenings rest still innocent.

1633

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning[1]

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say
The breath goes now, and some say, No;

So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;
'Twere profanation[0] of our joys desecration
To tell the laity our love.

Moving of th' earth brings harms and fears,
Men reckon what it did and meant;
But trepidation of the spheres,
Though greater far, is innocent.[2]

Dull sublunary[3] lovers' love
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
Absence, because it doth remove
Those things which elemented[0] it. composed

But we, by a love so much refined
That ourselves know not what it is,
Inter-assured of the mind,
Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet

---

[2] Aspen leaves flutter in the slightest breeze.

[3] Sweating in terror; quicksilver (mercury) was a stock prescription for venereal disease, and sweating was part of the cure.

[1] For "valediction" see p. 1271, n. 1. Izaak Walton speculated that this poem was addressed to Donne's wife on the occasion of his trip to the Continent in 1611, but there is no proof of that. Donne was, however, apprehensive about that trip; Walton also heard that, while abroad, Donne had a startling vision of his wife holding a dead baby at about the time she gave birth to a stillborn child.

[2] Earthquakes cause damage and were thought to be portentous. "Trepidation" (in the Ptolemaic cosmology) is an oscillation of the ninth or crystalline sphere imparted to all the inner spheres. Though a much more violent motion than an earthquake, it is neither destructive nor sinister.

[3] Beneath the moon, therefore earthly, sensual, and subject to change.

A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses[4] are two;
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if th' other do.

And though it in the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
Like th' other foot, obliquely run;
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
And makes me end where I begun.

1633

The Ecstasy[1]

Where, like a pillow on a bed,
A pregnant bank swelled up to rest
The violet's reclining head,
Sat we two, one another's best.

Our hands were firmly cemented
With a fast balm° which thence did spring, perspiration
Our eye-beams[2] twisted, and did thread
Our eyes upon one double string;

So to intergraft our hands, as yet
Was all our means to make us one,
And pictures in our eyes[3] to get° beget
Was all our propagation.

As 'twixt two equal armies Fate
Suspends uncertain victory,
Our souls (which to advance their state
Were gone out) hung 'twixt her and me;

And whilst our souls negotiate there,
We like sepulchral statues lay;
All day the same our postures were,
And we said nothing all the day.

---

[4] The two legs of a geometer's or draftsman's compass. This simile is the most famous example of the "metaphysical conceit" (see the "Literary Terminology" appendix to this volume).

[1] From ekstasis (Greek), a movement of the soul outside of the body.

[2] Invisible shafts of light, thought of as going out of the eyes and thereby enabling one to see things.

[3] Reflections of each in the other's eyes, often called "making babies."

If any, so by love refined
That he soul's language understood,
And by good love were grown all mind,[4]
Within convenient distance stood,

He (though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same)
Might thence a new concoction[5] take,
And part far purer than he came.

This ecstasy doth unperplex,
We said, and tell us what we love;
We see by this it was not sex;
We see we saw not what did move;[0] motivate us

But as all several[0] souls contain separate
Mixture of things, they know not what,
Love these mixed souls doth mix again,
And makes both one, each this and that.

A single violet transplant,
The strength, the color, and the size
(All which before was poor and scant)
Redoubles still,[0] and multiplies. continually

When love with one another so
Interinanimates two souls,
That abler soul, which thence doth flow,
Defects of loneliness controls.

We then, who are this new soul, know
Of what we are composed and made,
For th' atomies[0] of which we grow components
Are souls, whom no change can invade.

But O alas, so long, so far
Our bodies why do we forbear?
They are ours, though they are not we; we are
The intelligences, they the sphere.[6]

We owe them thanks because they thus
Did us to us at first convey,
Yielded their forces, sense, to us,
Nor are dross to us, but allay.[7]

On man heaven's influence works not so
But that it first imprints the air:[8]

---

[4] On this higher love, see Bembo's ladder of love from Castiglione's The Courtier.

[5] In the alchemical sense of sublimation or purification.

[6] In Ptolemaic astronomy, each planet, set in a transparent "sphere" that revolved and so carried it around the earth, was inhabited by a controlling angelic "intelligence."

[7] "Dross" is an impurity that weakens metal; "allay" (alloy) strengthens it.

[8] Astrological influences were thought to work on people through the medium of the surrounding air.

So soul into the soul may flow,
Though it to body first repair.° go

As our blood labors to beget
Spirits[9] as like souls as it can,
Because such fingers need° to knit are needed
That subtle knot which makes us man,

So must pure lovers' souls descend
T' affections, and to faculties
Which sense may reach and apprehend;
Else a great prince in prison lies.

To our bodies turn we then, that so
Weak men on love revealed may look;
Love's mysteries[1] in souls do grow,
But yet the body is his book.

And if some lover, such as we,
Have heard this dialogue of one,[2]
Let him still mark° us; he shall see observe
Small change when we are to bodies gone.

1633

The Funeral

Whoever comes to shroud me, do not harm
Nor question much
That subtle wreath of hair which crowns my arm;
The mystery, the sign you must not touch,
For 'tis my outward soul,
Viceroy to that, which then to heaven being gone,
Will leave this to control,
And keep these limbs, her[1] provinces, from dissolution.

For if the sinewy thread[2] my brain lets fall
Through every part
Can tie those parts and make me one of all,
These hairs which upward grew, and strength and art
Have from a better brain,
Can better do it; except° she meant that I unless
By this should know my pain,
As prisoners then are manacled, when they're condemned to die.

[9] Subtle substances thought to be produced by the blood to serve as intermediaries between body and soul.

[1] The implied comparison is with God's mysteries, which are revealed and may be read in the book of Nature and the book of Scripture.

[2] "Dialogue of one" because "both meant, both spake the same" (line 26).

[1] The soul's, but also the mistress's (cf. "she," line 14).

[2] The nervous system.

Whate'er she meant by it, bury it with me,
For since I am
Love's martyr, it might breed idolatry,
If into others' hands these relics[3] came:
As 'twas humility
To afford to it all that a soul can do,
So 'tis some bravery,
That since you would save[4] none of me, I bury some of you.

1633

The Blossom

Little think'st thou, poor flower,
Whom I have watched six or seven days,
And seen thy birth, and seen what every hour
Gave to thy growth, thee to this height to raise,
And now dost laugh and triumph on this bough,
Little think'st thou
That it will freeze anon, and that I shall
Tomorrow find thee fall'n, or not at all.

Little think'st thou, poor heart,
That labor'st yet to nestle thee,
And think'st by hovering here to get a part
In a forbidden or forbidding tree,[1]
And hop'st her stiffness by long siege to bow,
Little think'st thou
That thou tomorrow, ere that sun doth wake,
Must with this sun and me a journey take.

But thou, which lov'st to be
Subtle to plague thyself, wilt say,
Alas, if you must go, what's that to me?
Here lies my business, and here I will stay:
You go to friends whose love and means present
Various content° satisfactions
To your eyes, ears, and tongue, and every part.
If then your body go, what need you a heart?

Well, then, stay here; but know,
When thou hast stayed and done thy most,
A naked thinking heart that makes no show
Is to a woman but a kind of ghost.
How shall she know my heart; or, having none,
Know thee for one?

---

[3] Body parts or other objects belonging to a saint, venerated by Roman Catholics.

[4] All the early printed texts read "have" (which carries sexual connotations), while many manuscripts read "save."

[1] The fruit of this tree is "forbidden" (presumably because the woman is married) or "forbidding" (because she is unwilling).

Practice may make her know some other part,
But take my word, she doth not know a heart.

Meet me at London, then,
Twenty days hence, and thou shalt see
Me fresher and more fat° by being with men prosperous
Than if I had stayed still with her and thee.
For God's sake, if you can, be you so too:
I would give you
There to another friend, whom we shall find
As glad to have my body as my mind.

1633

The Relic

When my grave is broke up again
Some second guest to entertain
(For graves have learned that woman-head° female trait
To be to more than one a bed),[1]
And he that digs it spies
A bracelet of bright hair about the bone,
Will he not let us alone,
And think that there a loving couple lies,
Who thought that this device might be some way
To make their souls, at the last busy day,° Judgment Day
Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?

If this fall° in a time, or land, happen
Where mis-devotion[2] doth command,
Then he that digs us up will bring
Us to the bishop and the king,
To make us relics; then
Thou shalt be a Mary Magdalen, and I
A something else thereby;
All women shall adore us, and some men;
And since at such times, miracles are sought,
I would have that age by this paper taught
What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

First, we loved well and faithfully,
Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
Difference of sex no more we knew,
Than our guardian angels do;
Coming and going, we
Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals;[3]
Our hands ne'er touched the seals° sexual organs

---

[1] Graves were often used to inter successive corpses, the bones of previous occupants being deposited in charnel houses.

[2] False devotion, superstition, i.e., Roman Catholicism.

[3] The kisses of salutation and parting.

Which nature, injured by late law, sets free:[4]
These miracles we did: but now, alas,
All measure and all language I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.

1633

A Lecture upon the Shadow

Stand still, and I will read to thee
A lecture, Love, in love's philosophy.
These three hours that we have spent
Walking here, two shadows went
Along with us, which we ourselves produced;
But, now the sun is just above our head,
We do those shadows tread
And to brave° clearness all things are reduced. splendid
So, whilst our infant loves did grow,
Disguises did and shadows flow
From us and our care;° but now, 'tis not so. caution

That love hath not attained the high'st degree
Which is still diligent lest others see.

Except° our loves at this noon stay, unless
We shall new shadows make the other way.
As the first were made to blind
Others, these which come behind
Will work upon ourselves, and blind our eyes.
If our loves faint and westwardly decline,
To me thou falsely thine
And I to thee mine actions shall disguise.
The morning shadows wear away,
But these grow longer all the day,
But, oh, love's day is short if love decay.

Love is a growing or full constant light,
And his first minute after noon is night.

Elegy[1] 16. On His Mistress

By our first strange and fatal interview,
By all desires which thereof did ensue,

[4] Human law forbids the free love permitted by nature. "Late": recent (comparatively speaking).

[1] In Latin poetry, an elegy is a discursive or reflective poem written in "elegiacs" (unrhymed couplets of alternating dactylic hexameters and pentameters). This meter was used for funeral laments and especially for love poetry. The most famous collection of elegies was Ovid's Amores.

By our long starving hopes, by that remorse[0]   pity
Which my words' masculine persuasive force
Begot in thee, and by the memory
Of hurts which spies and rivals threatened me,
I calmly beg; but by thy father's wrath,
By all pains which want and divorcement hath,
I conjure thee; and all the oaths which I
And thou have sworn to seal joint constancy
Here I unswear and overswear them thus:
Thou shalt not love by ways so dangerous.
Temper, oh fair love, love's impetuous rage;
Be my true mistress still, not my feigned page.[2]
I'll go, and, by thy kind leave, leave behind
Thee, only worthy to nurse in my mind
Thirst to come back. Oh, if thou die before,
My soul from other lands to thee shall soar.
Thy (else almighty) beauty cannot move
Rage from the seas, nor thy love teach them love,
Nor tame wild Boreas' harshness.[3] Thou hast read
How roughly he in pieces shivered
Fair Orithea, whom he swore he loved.
Fall ill or good, 'tis madness to have proved[0]   sought out
Dangers unurged; feed on this flattery,
That absent lovers one in th' other be.
Dissemble nothing, not a boy, nor change
Thy body's habit,[0] nor mind's; be not strange   clothing
To thyself only; all will spy in thy face
A blushing womanly discovering grace.
Richly clothed apes are called apes, and as soon
Eclipsed as bright we call the moon the moon.
Men of France, changeable chameleons,
Spitals[0] of diseases, shops of fashions,   hospitals
Love's fuelers[4] and the rightest company
Of players which upon the world's stage be,
Will quickly know thee, and know thee; and alas![5]
Th' indifferent[0] Italian, as we pass   bisexual
His warm land, well content to think thee page,
Will hunt thee with such lust and hideous rage
As Lot's fair guests were vexed.[6] But none of these
Nor spongy, hydroptic[7] Dutch shall thee displease
If thou stay here. O stay here, for, for thee,
England is only a worthy gallery
To walk in expectation, till from thence
Our greatest king call thee to his presence.[8]

Several of Donne's elegies—almost all written in the 1590s—take Ovid as their principal model and resemble him in ingenious wit and in frank and unapologetic eroticism.

[2] The speaker's mistress wanted to accompany him abroad, disguised as a page boy. Such escapades occasionally took place in real life; in 1605, Elizabeth Southwell, disguised as a page, went abroad with Sir Robert Dudley.

[3] God of the north wind; in Metamorphoses 6 Ovid describes the wild force with which Boreas abducted Orithea.

[4] Providers of aphrodisiacs.

[5] May pun on "a lass." "Know": in the sexual sense.

[6] The inhabitants of Sodom tried to rape two angels who visited Lot in the guise of men to warn of the city's impending destruction. (Genesis 19.1-11).

[7] Dropsical, thus insatiably thirsty.

[8] Throne rooms commonly had antechambers (galleries) where visitors waited until the monarch was ready to see them.

When I am gone, dream me some happiness,
Nor let thy looks our long-hid love confess;
Nor praise nor dispraise me, bless nor curse
Openly love's force, nor in bed fright thy nurse
With midnight's startings, crying out "Oh, oh!
Nurse, oh my love is slain, I saw him go
O'er the white Alps alone; I saw him, I,
Assailed, fight, taken, stabbed, bleed, fall, and die."
Augur me better chance, except dread Jove
Think it enough for me t' have had thy love.

1635

Elegy 19. To His Mistress Going to Bed[1]

Come, Madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
Until I labor, I in labor lie.[2]
The foe ofttimes having the foe in sight,
Is tired with standing though he never fight.
Off with that girdle,° like heaven's zone° glistering, belt / zodiac
But a far fairer world encompassing.
Unpin that spangled breastplate[3] which you wear
That th' eyes of busy fools may be stopped there.
Unlace yourself, for that harmonious chime
Tells me from you that now it is bed-time.
Off with that happy busk,° which I envy, bodice
That still° can be and still can stand so nigh. always
Your gown going off, such beauteous state reveals
As when from flowery meads th' hill's shadow steals.
Off with that wiry coronet and show
The hairy diadem which on you doth grow;
Now off with those shoes, and then safely tread
In this love's hallowed temple, this soft bed.
In such white robes, heaven's angels used to be Received by men; thou, angel, bring'st with thee
A heaven like Mahomet's paradise;[4] and though
Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know
By this these angels from an evil sprite,
Those set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
License my roving hands, and let them go
Before, behind, between, above, below.
O my America! my new-found-land,
My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned,
My mine of precious stones, my empery,° empire
How blest am I in this discovering thee!
To enter in these bonds is to be free;

---

[1] This poem reworks the central situation of Ovid's Amores 1.5 in much more dramatic terms.

[2] "Labor" in the dual sense of "get to work (sexually)" and "distress."

[3] The stomacher, an ornamental, often jeweled, covering for the chest, worn under the lacing of the bodice.

[4] A place of sensual pleasure, thought to be populated by seductive houris for the delectation of the faithful.

There where my hand is set, my seal shall be.[5]
Full nakedness! All joys are due to thee.
As souls unbodied, bodies unclothed must be,
To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use
Are like Atalanta's balls,[6] cast in men's views,
That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem,
His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them.
Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings, made
For laymen, are all women thus arrayed;
Themselves are mystic books, which only we (Whom their imputed grace will dignify)
Must see revealed.[7] Then since that I may know,
As liberally as to a midwife show
Thyself: cast all, yea, this white linen hence,
Here is no penance, much less innocence.[8]
To teach thee, I am naked first; why then
What need'st thou have more covering than a man?

1669

Satire 3 In satire the author holds a subject up to ridicule. Like his elegies, Donne's five verse satires were written in his twenties and are in the forefront of an effort in the 1590s (by Donne, Ben Jonson, Joseph Hall, and John Marston) to naturalize those classical forms in England. While elements of satire figure in many different kinds of literature, the great models for formal verse satire were the Roman poets Horace and Juvenal, the former for an urbanely witty style, the latter for an indignant or angry manner. While Donne's other satires call on these models, his third satire more nearly resembles those of a third Roman satirist, Persius, known for an abstruse style and moralizing manner. This work is a strenuous discussion of an acute theological problem, for the age and for Donne himself: How may one discover the true Christian church among so many claimants to that role? At the time Donne wrote this, he was in the process of leaving the Roman Catholic Church of his heritage for the Church of England.

Satire 3

Kind pity chokes my spleen;[1] brave° scorn forbids defiant
Those tears to issue which swell my eyelids;
I must not laugh, nor weep° sins, and be wise: lament
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?

[5] The jokes mingle law with sex: where he has signed a document (placed his hand) he will now place his seal; and in the bonds of her arms he will find freedom.

[6] Atalanta, running a race against her suitor Hippomenes, was beaten when he dropped golden apples ("balls") for her to pick up. Donne reverses the story.

[7] By granting favors to their lovers, women impute to them grace that they don't deserve, as God (in Calvinist doctrine) imputes grace to undeserving sinners. Laymen can only look at the covers of mystic books (clothed women), but "we" elect can read them (see women naked).

[8] Some manuscripts read: "There is no penance due to innocence." White garments would be appropriate either for the innocent virgin or for the sinner doing formal penance.

[1] The seat of bile, hence scorn and ridicule.

Is not our mistress, fair Religion,
As worthy of all our souls' devotion
As virtue was to the first blinded age?[2]
Are not heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts, as earth's honor was to them?[0] Alas, pagans
As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be imputed faith,[3] and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near
To follow, damned? O, if thou dar'st, fear this;
This fear great courage and high valor is.
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch,[4] and dar'st thou lay
Thee in ships, wooden sepulchers, a prey
To leaders' rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?[0] famine
Dar'st thou dive seas and dungeons[0] of the earth? mines, caves
Hast thou courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen north discoveries?[5] And thrice
Colder than salamanders, like divine
Children in the oven,[6] fires of Spain and the line,
Whose countries limbecks to our bodies be,
Canst thou for gain bear?[7] And must every he
Which cries not "Goddess!" to thy mistress, draw,[0] fight a duel
Or eat thy poisonous words? Courage of straw!
O desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and
To thy foes and His[0] (who made thee to stand God's Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for forbidden wars leave th' appointed field?[8]
Know thy foes: The foul Devil (whom thou Strivest to please) for hate, not love, would allow Thee fain[0] his whole realm to be quit;[0] and as gladly / to satisfy you
The world's all parts wither away and pass,[9]
So the world's self, thy other loved foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou, loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loathe.
Seek true religion. O, where? Mirreus,[1]

[2] The age of paganism, blind to Christianity but capable of natural morality ("virtue").

[3] Donne's formulation wittily turns on its head the key concept of Protestant theology—that salvation is to be achieved only by imputing Christ's merits to Christians through faith—by suggesting that virtuous pagans might be saved by imputing faith to them on the basis of their moral life.

[4] English volunteers took frequent part with the Dutch in their wars against Spain. Donne himself had sailed in two raiding expeditions against the Spanish.

[5] Many explorers tried to find a northwest passage to the Pacific.

[6] In the biblical story (Daniel 3), Shadrach, Meshack, and Abednego were rescued from a fiery furnace. The salamander (a lizardlike creature) was thought to be so cold-blooded that it could live in fire.

[7] The object of "bear" is "fires of Spain and the line"—inquisitorial and equatorial heats, which roast people as chemists heat materials in "limbecks" (alembics, or vessels for distilling).

[8] Of moral struggle.

[9] The common belief that the world was growing old and becoming decrepit.

[1] The satiric types in this passage represent different creeds: "Mirreus" is a Roman Catholic; "Crantz," an austere Calvinist Presbyterian of Geneva; "Graius" a Church of England Erastian who believes in any religion sponsored by the state; "Phrygius," a skeptic; and "Graccus," a complete relativist.

Thinking her unhoused here, and fled from us,
Seeks her at Rome; there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago.
He loves her rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth[2] where the prince sat yesterday.
Crantz to such brave loves will not be enthralled,
But loves her only, who at Geneva is called Religion—plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome; as among
Lecherous humors,[0] there is one that judges temperaments
No wenches wholesome but coarse country drudges.
Graius stays still at home here, and because
Some preachers, vile ambitious bawds, and laws
Still new, like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us is only perfect, he Embraceth her whom his godfathers will Tender to him, being tender, as wards still Take such wives as their guardians offer, or Pay values.[3] Careless Phrygius doth abhor
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
Graccus loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in divers countries go
In divers habits,[0] yet are still one kind, styles of clothing
So doth, so is religion; and this blindness too much light breeds;[4] but unmoved thou
Of force[0] must one, and forced but one allow; necessity
And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.[5]
To adore, or scorn an image, or protest,
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is. On a huge hill,
Cragged and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about must, and about must go,
And what the hill's suddenness resists, win so;
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night.[6]
To will[0] implies delay, therefore now do. intend a future act
Hard deeds, the body's pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavors reach,[0] and mysteries achiei>e
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to all eyes.
Keep the truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
In so ill case here, that God hath with his hand

[2] The royal canopy, a symbol of kingly power.

[3] If minors in care of a guardian (in wardship) rejected the wives offered ("tendered") to them they had to pay fines ("values").

[4] I.e., Graccus considers the differences between religions merely incidental, like womens' clothes, but his apparently tolerant, "enlightened" attitude is itself a form of blindness.

[5] The person who seeks the best church is neither an unbeliever nor the worst sort of believer.

[6] Echoes John 9.4, "the night cometh, when no man can work."

Signed kings' blank charters to kill whom they hate,
Nor are they vicars, but hangmen to fate.[7]
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
At the last day? O, will it then boot° thee profit
To say a Philip, or a Gregory,
A Harry, or a Martin taught thee this?[8]
Is not this excuse for mere° contraries complete
Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?
That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;
Those passed, her nature and name is changed; to be
Then humble to her is idolatry.
As streams are, power is; those blest flowers that dwell
At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and prove well,
But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas, are driven
Through mills, and rocks, and woods, and at last, almost Consumed in going, in the sea are lost:
So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
Power from God claimed, than God himself to trust.

Sappho to Philaenis[1]

Where is that holy fire, which verse is said
To have? Is that enchanting force decayed?
Verse, that draws° Nature's works, from° Nature's law, copies / according to Thee, her best work, to her work[2] cannot draw.
Have my tears quenched my old poetic fire;
Why quenched they not as well, that of desire?
Thoughts, my mind's creatures, often are with thee,
But I, their maker, want their liberty.
Only thine image in my heart doth sit,
But that is wax, and fires environ it.
My fires have driven, thine have drawn it hence;
And I am robbed of picture, heart, and sense.
Dwells with me still mine irksome memory,
Which both to keep and lose, grieves equally.
That tells me how fair thou art: thou art so fair,
As gods, when gods to thee I do compare,
Are graced thereby:[3] and to make blind men see,
What things gods are, I say they are like to thee.
For, if we justly call each silly° man ordinary

[7] Kings are not God's vicars on earth, with license ("blank charters") to persecute or kill whomever they wish on grounds of religion.

[8] "Philip" is Philip II of Spain, "Gregory" is Pope Gregory XIII or XIV, "Harry" is England's Henry VIII, and "Martin" is Martin Luther.

[1] A heroic epistle, modeled on Ovid's Heroides, erotic poems set forth as letters between famous lovers and often with female speakers. Sappho was a famous woman poet of Lesbos (b. 612 B.C.E.). Her poems to her several female lovers made "lesbian" a term for same-sex love between women.

[2] I.e., you are not drawn to sexual intimacy ("Nature's work") by poetry, which imitates nature's works.

[3] I.e., when I compare you to gods it is they who are exalted by the comparison.

A little world,[4] what shall we call thee then?
Thou art not soft, and clear, and straight, and fair,
As down, as stars, cedars, and lilies are,
But thy right hand, and cheek, and eye, only
Are like thy other hand, and cheek, and eye.
Such was my Phao[5] awhile, but shall be never,
As thou wast, art, and, oh, mayst thou be ever.
Here lovers swear in their idolatry,
That I am such; but grief discolors me.
And yet I grieve the less, lest grief remove
My beauty, and make me unworthy of thy love.
Plays some soft boy with thee, oh there wants yet
A mutual feeling which should sweeten it.
His chin, a thorny hairy unevenness
Doth threaten, and some daily change possess.
Thy body is a natural paradise,
In whose self, unmanured,[0] all pleasure lies, untilled, unfertilized
Nor needs perfection,[6] why shouldst thou then
Admit the tillage of a harsh rough man?
Men leave behind them that which their sin shows,
And are as thieves traced, which rob when it snows.
But of our dalliance no more signs there are,
Than fishes leave in streams, or birds in air.
And between us all sweetness may be had;
All, all that Nature yields, or Art can add.
My two lips, eyes, thighs, differ from thy two,
But so, as thine from one another do;
And, oh, no more; the likeness being such,
Why should they not alike in all parts touch?
Hand to strange hand, lip to lip none denies;
Why should they breast to breast, or thighs to thighs?
Likeness begets such strange self-flattery,
That touching myself, all seems done to thee.
Myself I embrace, and mine own hands I kiss,
And amorously thank myself for this.
Me, in my glass,[0] I call thee; but alas, mirror
When I would kiss, tears dim mine eyes, and glass.
O cure this loving madness, and restore
Me to me; thee, my half,[7] my all, my more.
So may thy cheeks' red outwear scarlet dye,[8]
And their white, whiteness of the galaxy,[0] the milky way
So may thy mighty, amazing beauty move
Envy in all women, and in all men, love,
And so be change, and sickness, far from thee,
As thou by coming near, keep'st them from me.

An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary

Donne composed and published this poem in 1611 to mark the first anniversary of the death of Elizabeth Drury, fifteen-year-old daughter of his patron and friend Sir Robert Drury. On the actual occasion of her death he composed a "Funeral Elegy," and on the second anniversary he wrote a companion poem to this one, titled The Progress of the Soul: The Second Anniversary, publishing all three poems together in 1612. This is not a poem about personal grief: responding to criticism of his wildly hyperbolic praises of Elizabeth, Donne commented that he had never met the young woman but intended rather to describe "the Idea of a woman, and not as she was." Nor is this merely a poem to please a patron, though Donne obviously hoped to do that. Rather, as the full title indicates, Donne took the occasion of Elizabeth's untimely death to analyze (the term "anatomy" evokes both a rigorous logical analysis and a medical dissection in an anatomy theater) the corruption, decay, and disintegration of the world in all its aspects, due ultimately to the Fall of humankind. Here, the death of the young virgin Elizabeth is made to figure that loss and all its dire effects; in The Second Anniversary her death figures the soul's progress to heavenly glory. For the Anatomy, we give the long introduction (lines 1—90) and the first two of the four meditations (lines 91—246), each of which contains a lament for the various aspects of humankind's and the world's deterioration, a eulogy of the dead girl as symbol of lost innocence, and a two-line refrain. The marginal glosses on the left-hand side are by Donne, added in 1612.

From An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary

ry mto the When that rich soul which to her heaven is gone,
Whom all they celebrate who know they have one
(For who is sure he hath a soul, unless
It see, and judge, and follow worthiness,
And by deeds praise it? He who doth not this,
May lodge an inmate soul, but 'tis not his);
When that queen ended here her progress time,[1]
And, as to her standing house,[2] to heaven did climb,
Where, loath to make the saints attend[0] her long, await
She's now a part both of the choir and song,
This world in that great earthquake languished;
For in a common bath of tears it bled,
Which drew the strongest vital spirits[3] out:
But succored[0] then with a perplexed doubt, comforted.
Whether the world did lose or gain in this (Because since now no other way there is
But goodness to see her, whom all would see,
All must endeavor to be good as she),
This great consumption[0] to a fever turned, wasting disease
And so the world had fits; it joyed, it mourned.
And as men think that agues physic are,[4]
And the ague being spent, give over care,

---

[1] "That queen" is the soul of Elizabeth Drury, implicitly compared to Queen Elizabeth, who liked to go on "progresses," formal visits from one country house to another.

[2] I.e., her royal palace or permanent residence.

[3] "Vital spirits" of the blood were mysterious agents supposed to link soul with body.

[4] "Ague" is chills and fever. "Physic": medicine. Some people think the fever stage of the disease is itself a cure.

So thou, sick world, mistak'st thyself to be Well, when, alas, thou art in a lethargy.° in a near-death coma
Her death did wound and tame thee then, and then
Thou might'st have better spared the sun, or man;
That wound was deep, but 'tis more misery
That thou hast lost thy sense and memory.
'Twas heavy° then to hear thy voice of moan, sad, depressing
But this is worse, that thou art speechless grown.
Thou hast forgot thy name thou hadst; thou wast
Nothing but she, and her thou hast o'erpast.° outlined
For as a child kept from the font,° until baptismal font
A prince, expected long, come to fulfill
The ceremonies, thou unnamed had'st laid,
Had not her coming, thee her palace made:[5]
Her name defined thee, gave thee form and frame,
And thou forget'st to celebrate thy name.
   Some months she hath been dead (but being dead, Measures of times are all determined),° ceased
But long she hath been away, long, long, yet none
Offers to tell us who it is that's gone.
But as in states doubtful of future heirs,
When sickness without remedy impairs
The present prince, they're loath it should be said
The prince doth languish, or the prince is dead:
So mankind, feeling now a general thaw,° melting, disintegration
A strong example gone, equal to law,
The cement which did faithfully compact
And glue all virtues, now resolved,° and slacked, dissolved
Thought it some blasphemy to say she was dead,
Or that our weakness was discovered° disclosed
In that confession; therefore spoke no more
Than tongues, the soul being gone, the loss deplore.
But though it be too late to succor thee,
Sick world, yea, dead, yea, putrefied, since she,
Thy intrinsic balm[6] and thy preservative,
Can never be renewed, thou never live,
I (since no man can make thee live) will try
What we may gain by thy anatomy.[7]
Her death hath taught us dearly that thou art
Corrupt and mortal in thy purest part.
   Let no man say, the world itself being dead,
Tis labor lost to have discovered
The world's infirmities, since there is none
Alive to study this dissection;

What life the world hath still.

For there's a kind of world remaining still,
Though she which did inanimate and fill
The world be gone, yet in this last long night,
Her ghost doth walk; that is, a glimmering light,
A faint weak love of virtue and of good

---

[5] The sick world is still being addressed; until it was made her palace, the world was a nameless nothing.

[6] A medicine that preserved one in perfect health forever.

[7] I.e., by dissecting and analyzing the world's corpse.

Reflects from her on them which understood
Her worth; and though she have shut in all day,
The twilight of her memory doth stay;
Which, from the carcass of the old world free,
Creates a new world; and new creatures be Produced:[8] the matter and the stuff of this,
Her virtue, and the form our practice is;
And though to be thus elemented,° arm constituted
These creatures, from home-born intrinsic harm
(For all assumed° unto this dignity raised
So many weedless Paradises be,
Which of themselves produce no venomous sin,
Except some foreign serpent bring it in),
Yet, because outward storms the strongest break,
And strength itself by confidence grows weak,
This new world may be safer, being told
The sickness of the world. The dangers and diseases of the old:
For with due temper men do then forgo
Or covet things, when they their true worth know.
Impossibility of health. There is no health; physicians say that we
At best enjoy but a neutrality.
And can there be worse sickness than to know
That we are never well, nor can be so?
We are born ruinous;° poor mothers cry falling into ruin
That children come not right, nor orderly,
Except they headlong come and fall upon
An ominous precipitation.[9]
How witty's° ruin! How importunate ingenious is Upon mankind! It labored to frustrate
Even God's purpose; and made woman, sent
For man's relief, cause of his languishment.
They were to good ends, and they are so still,
But accessory, and principal in ill.[1]
For that first marriage was our funeral:
One woman at one blow then killed us all,
And singly, one by one, they kill us now.
We do delightfully ourselves allow
To that consumption; and profusely blind,
We kill ourselves to propagate our kind.[2]
And yet we do not that; we are not men:
There is not now that mankind which was then
When as the sun and man did seem to strive
Shortness of life. (Joint tenants[3] of the world) who should survive;
When stag and raven and the long-lived tree,
Compared with man, died in minority;[4]

[8] The sun was thought to have power to breed new life out of carcasses and mud.

[9] "We do not make account that a child comes right, except it come with the head forward, and thereby prefigure that headlong falling into calamities which it must suffer after" (Donne, Sermons, ed. Potter and Simpson, 4.333).

[1] Women are only helpers in good but leaders in evil. "That first marriage" (line 105): Adam and Eve's.

[2] Popular superstition had it that every act of sex shortened one's life by a day.

[3] Joint owners. The survivor would enjoy sole ownership.

[4] Stags, ravens, and oak trees were thought to live particularly long, but compared with early humans, they died in youth.

When, if a slow-paced star had stolen away
From the observer's marking, he might stay
Two or three hundred years to see it again,
And then make up his observation plain;
When, as the age was long, the size was great;
Man's growth confessed and recompensed the meat;[5]
So spacious and large, that every soul
Did a fair kingdom and large realm control;
And when the very stature, thus erect,
Did that soul a good way towards heaven direct.
Where is this mankind now? Who lives to age
Fit to be made Methusalem his page?
Alas, we scarce live long enough to try
Whether a new-made clock run right, or lie.
Old grandsires talk of yesterday with sorrow,
And for our children we reserve tomorrow.
So short is life that every peasant strives,
In a torn house, or field, to have three lives.[6]
  And as in lasting, so in length is man
Smallness of stature. Contracted to an inch, who was a span;[7]
For had a man at first in forests strayed,
Or shipwrecked in the sea, one would have laid
A wager that an elephant or whale
That met him would not hastily assail
A thing so equal to him: now, alas,
The fairies and the pygmies well may pass
As credible; mankind decays so soon,
We're scarce our fathers' shadows cast at noon.
Only death adds to our length:[8] nor are we grown
In stature to be men, till we are none.
But this were light,[0] did our less volume hold a trifle
All the old text, or had we changed to gold
Their silver; or disposed into less glass
Spirits of virtue,[9] which then scattered was.
But 'tis not so: we're not retired, but damped;[1]
And as our bodies, so our minds are cramped:
'Tis shrinking, not close weaving, that hath thus
In mind and body both bedwarfed us.
We seem ambitious, God's whole work to undo;
Of nothing He made us, and we strive, too,
To bring ourselves to nothing back; and we Do what we can to do it so soon as He.
With new diseases[2] on ourselves we war,
And with new physic,[3] a worse engine[0] far. contrivance

[5] Early humans were thought to have eaten better than modern humans, lived longer, and grown to greater stature. Methuselah ("Methusalem," below) is said to have lived 969 years (Genesis 5.27).

[6] Leases of farmland were often made for "three lives," i.e., through the longest-lived of three designated persons.

[7] I.e., the distance from the tip of the thumb to the tip of the little finger, about nine inches.

[8] The corpse of a person was said to measure a little more than his or her height when alive.

[9] I.e., distilled virtue, which would fit into a smaller bottle. "Virtue" includes the sense of "power" as well as that of "goodness."

[1] I.e., not compressed but shrunk.

[2] I.e., influenza, and especially syphilis.

[3] New medications—said to be far worse than the diseases they ostensibly combated.

Thus man, this world's vice-emperor, in whom
All faculties, all graces are at home—
And if in other creatures they appear,
They're but man's ministers and legates there,
To work on their rebellions, and reduce
Them to civility, and to man's use—
This man, whom God did woo, and loath to attend° wait
Till man came up, did down to man descend,
This man, so great, that all that is, is his,
Oh what a trifle, and poor thing he is!
If man were anything, he's nothing now:
Help, or at least some time to waste, allow° one might give
To his other wants, yet when he did depart° part
With her whom we lament, he lost his heart.
She, of whom th' ancients seemed to prophesy
When they called virtues by the name of she;[4]
She in whom virtue was so much refined
That for allay° unto so pure a mind alloy
She took the weaker sex, she that could drive
The poisonous tincture, and the stain of Eve,
Out of her thoughts and deeds, and purify
All, by a true religious alchemy;
She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou knowest this,
Thou knowest how poor a trifling thing man is.
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
The heart being perished, no part can be free.
And that except thou feed (not banquet)[5] on
The supernatural food, religion,
Thy better growth grows withered and scant;
Be more than man, or thou'rt less than an ant.
Then, as mankind, so is the world's whole frame
Quite out of joint, almost created lame:
For, before God had made up all the rest,
Corruption entered and depraved the best.
It seized the angels,[6] and then first of all
The world did in her cradle take a fall,
And turned her brains, and took a general maim,
Wronging each joint of th' universal frame.
The noblest part, man, felt it first; and then
Decay of nature in other parts. Both beasts and plants, cursed in the curse of man.[7]
So did the world from the first hour decay,
That evening was beginning of the day,[8]
And now the springs and summers which we see
Like sons of women after fifty be.[9]
And new philosophy calls all in doubt:
The element of fire is quite put out;[1]

[4] The virtues are all represented in Latin by feminine nouns and portrayed as female figures.

[5] Taste, nibble. A banquet usually contained desserts and delicacies.

[6] The angels who fell from heaven with Satan and became demons. As purely intellectual beings, angels are the world's "brains" (line 197).

[7] For a similar account of the way humankind's fall corrupted the physical universe, see Paradise Lost 10.706ff.

[8] The world's day began with the darkness of sin.

[9] Women giving birth after the age of fifty were thought to produce feeble or defective children.

[1] The Polish astronomer Copernicus in the 16th century and the Italian Galileo in the 17th argued a "new philosophy," that the sun, not the earth,

The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit° intellect
Can well direct him where to look for it.
And freely men confess that this world's spent, exhausted
When in the planets and the firmament° sky
They seek so many new;[2] they see that this Is crumbled out again to his atomies.° atoms
'Tis all in pieces, all coherence gone;
All just supply, and all relation:
Prince, subject; father, son,[3] are things forgot,
For every man alone thinks he hath got
To be° a phoenix, and that there can be has become
None of that kind of which he is, but he.[4]
  This is the world's condition now, and now
She that should all parts to reunion bow,
She that had all magnetic force alone,
To draw and fasten sundered parts in one;
She whom wise nature had invented then
When she observed that every sort of men
Did in their voyage in this world's sea stray,
And needed a new compass for their way;
She that was best, and first original
Of all fair copies, and the general
Steward to Fate;[5] she whose rich eyes and breast
Gilt the West Indies, and perfumed the East;[6]
Whose having breathed in this world did bestow
Spice on those isles, and bade them still smell so,
And that rich Indie which doth gold inter
Is but as single money,° coined from her; small change
She to whom this world must itself refer
As suburbs, or the microcosm of her,
She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how lame a cripple this world is.
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
That this world's general sickness doth not lie
In any humor,[7] or one certain part;
But, as thou sawest it rotten at the heart,
Thou seest a hectic° fever hath got hold consumptive
Of the whole substance, not to be controlled,
And that thou hast but one way not to admit
The world's infection, to be none of it.

From Holy Sonnets[1]

Thou hast made me, and shall thy work decay?
Repair me now, for now mine end doth haste;
I run to death, and death meets me as fast,
And all my pleasures are like yesterday.
I dare not move my dim eyes any way,
Despair behind, and death before doth cast
Such terror, and my feeble flesh doth waste
By sin in it, which it towards hell doth weigh. incline, weigh down
Only thou art above, and when towards thee
By thy leave I can look, I rise again;
But our old subtle foe so tempteth me
That not one hour myself I can sustain.
Thy grace may wing° me to prevent° his art, give wings to/forestall
And thou like adamant° draw mine iron heart. magnetic lodestone

I am a little world[2] made cunningly
Of elements, and an angelic sprite;° spirit, soul
But black sin hath betrayed to endless night
My world's both parts, and O, both parts must die.
You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands can write,[3]
Pour new seas in mine eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly,
Or wash it if it must be drowned no more.[4]
But O, it must be burnt! Alas, the fire
Of lust and envy have burnt it heretofore,
And made it fouler; let their flames retire,
And burn me, O Lord, with a fiery zeal
Of thee and thy house, which doth in eating heal.[5]

At the round earth's imagined corners,[6] blow
Your trumpets, angels; and arise, arise

[1] Donne wrote a variety of religious poems (called "Divine Poems"), including a group of nineteen "Holy sonnets" that reflect his interest in Jesuit and especially Protestant meditative procedures. He probably began writing them about 1609, a decade or so after leaving the Catholic Church. Our selections follow the traditional numbering established in Sir Herbert Grierson's influential edition, since for most of these sonnets we cannot tell when they were written or in what order they were intended to appear.

[2] The traditional idea of the human being as microcosm (a "little world"), containing in miniature all the features of the macrocosm, or great world.

[3] Astronomers, especially Galileo, and explorers.

[4] God promised Noah (Genesis 9.11) never to flood the earth again.

[5] See Psalm 69.9: "For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." These lines refer to three lands of flame—those of the Last Judgment, those of lust and envy, and those of zeal, which alone save.

[6] Cf. Revelation 7.1: "I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth."

From death, you numberless infinities
Of souls, and to your scattered bodies go:
All whom the flood did, and fire[7] shall, o'erthrow,
All whom war, dearth,° age, agues,° tyrannies, famine I fevers
Despair, law, chance hath slain, and you whose eyes
Shall behold God, and never taste death's woe.[8]
But let them sleep, Lord, and me mourn a space;
For, if above all these, my sins abound,
'Tis late to ask abundance of thy grace
When we are there. Here on this lowly ground,
Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if thou hadst sealed my pardon with thy blood.

If poisonous minerals, and if that tree[9]
Whose fruit threw death on else-immortal us,
If lecherous goats, if serpents envious[1]
Cannot be damned, alas! why should I be?
Why should intent or reason, born in me,
Make sins, else equal, in me more heinous?
And, mercy being easy and glorious
To God, in his stern wrath why threatens he?
But who am I that dare dispute with thee
O God? Oh, of thine only worthy blood
And my tears, make a heavenly Lethean[2] flood,
And drown in it my sin's black memory.
That thou remember them some claim as debt;
I think it mercy if thou wilt forget.[3]

Death, be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
Die not, poor Death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
Much pleasure; then from thee much more must flow,
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.[4]
Thou art slave to fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy° or charms can make us sleep as well opium

[7] Noah's flood, and the universal conflagration at the end of the world (Revelation 6.11).

[8] Those who will be alive at the Second Coming (cf. Luke 9.27).

[9] The Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, whose fruit was forbidden to Adam and Eve in Eden.

[1] Traits commonly associated with these creatures.

[2] In classical mythology, the waters of the river Lethe in the underworld caused total forgetfulness.

[3] Cf. Jeremiah 31.34: "I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more."

[4] I.e., to find rest for their bones and freedom ("delivery") for their souls.

And better than thy stroke; why swell'st[0] thou then? puff with pride
One short sleep past, we wake eternally
And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.[5]

Spit in my face ye Jews, and pierce my side,
Buffet, and scoff,[0] scourge, and crucify me, scoff at
For I have sinned, and sinned, and only he,
Who could do no iniquity, hath died:
But by my death cannot be satisfied[0] atoned for
My sins, which pass the Jews' impiety:
They killed once an inglorious[0] man, but I obscure
Crucify him daily,[6] being now glorified.
Oh let me then, his strange love still admire:[0] wonder at
Kings pardon, but he bore our punishment.[7]
And Jacob came clothed in vile harsh attire
But to supplant, and with gainful intent:[8]
God clothed himself in vile man's flesh, that so
He might be weak enough to suffer woe.

13

What if this present were the world's last night?
Mark in my heart, O soul, where thou dost dwell,
The picture of Christ crucified, and tell
Whether that countenance can thee affright.
Tears in his eyes quench the amazing light,
Blood fills his frowns, which from his pierced head fell;
And can that tongue adjudge thee unto hell
Which prayed forgiveness for his foes' fierce spite?
No, no; but as in my idolatry
I said to all my profane[0] mistresses, secular
Beauty of pity, foulness only is
A sign of rigor:[9] so I say to thee,
To wicked spirits are horrid shapes assigned,
This beauteous form assures a piteous mind.

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for you
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend;

---

[5] Cf. 1 Corinthians 15.26: "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

[6] Cf. Hebrews 6.6: "they [sinners] crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh."

[7] Kings may pardon crimes, but the King of Kings, Christ, bore the punishment due to our sins.

[8] Jacob disguised himself in goatskins to gain from his blind father the blessing belonging to the firstborn son, his brother Esau (Genesis 27.1—36).

[9] In Neoplatonic theory, beautiful features are the sign of a compassionate mind, while ugliness signifies the contrary.

That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend
Your force to break, blow, burn, and make me new.
I, like an usurped town, to another due,
Labor to admit you, but O, to no end;
Reason, your viceroy[1] in me, me should defend,
But is captived, and proves weak or untrue.
Yet dearly I love you, and would be loved fain,° gladly
But am betrothed[2] unto your enemy.
Divorce me, untie or break that knot again;
Take me to you, imprison me, for I,
Except° you enthrall me, never shall be free, unless
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish[3] me.

Since she whom I loved hath paid her last debt[4]
To Nature, and to hers, and my good is dead,
And her soul early into heaven ravished,
Wholly on heavenly things my mind is set.
Here the admiring her my mind did whet
To seek thee, God; so streams do show the head;° source
But though I have found thee, and thou my thirst hast fed,
A holy thirsty dropsy° melts me yet. immoderate thirst
But why should I beg more love, whenas thou
Dost woo my soul, for hers offering all thine:
And dost not only fear lest I allow
My love to saints and angels, things divine,
But in thy tender jealousy dost doubt° fear
Lest the world, flesh, yea, devil put thee out.

Show me, dear Christ, thy spouse[5] so bright and clear.
What! is it she which on the other shore
Goes richly painted? or which, robbed and tore,
Laments and mourns in Germany and here?[6]
Sleeps she a thousand, then peeps up one year?
Is she self-truth, and errs? now new, now outwore?
Doth she, and did she, and shall she evermore
On one, on seven, or on no hill appear?[7]

[1] The governor in your stead.

[2] Humanity's relationship with God has been described in terms of marriage and adultery from the time of the Hebrew prophets.

[3] Rape, also overwhelm with wonder. "Enthrall": enslave, also enchant.

[4] Donne's wife died in 1617 at the age of thirty-three, having just given birth to her twelfth child. This very personal sonnet and the following two survive in a single manuscript discovered only in 1892.

[5] The church is commonly called the bride of Christ. Cf. Revelation 19.7—8: "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. / And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white."

[6] I.e., the painted woman (the Church of Rome) or the ravished virgin (the Lutheran and Calvinist churches in Germany and England).

[7] The church on one hill is probably Solomon's temple on Mount Moriah; that on seven hills is the Church of Rome; that on no hill is the Presbyterian church of Geneva.

Dwells she with us, or like adventuring knights
First travel we to seek, and then make love?
Betray, kind husband, thy spouse to our sights,
And let mine amorous soul court thy mild dove,
Who is most true and pleasing to thee then
When she is embraced and open to most men.[8]

Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one:
Inconstancy unnaturally hath begot
A constant habit; that when I would not
I change in vows, and in devotion.
As humorous° is my contrition subject to whim
As my profane love, and as soon forgot:
As riddlingly distempered, cold and hot,[9]
As praying, as mute, as infinite, as none.
I durst not view heaven yesterday; and today
In prayers, and flattering speeches I court God:
Tomorrow I quake with true fear of his rod.
So my devout fits come and go away
Like a fantastic ague:[1] save° that here except
Those are my best days, when I shake with fear.

Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward

Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this,
The intelligence that moves, devotion is,[1]
And as the other spheres, by being grown
Subject to foreign motions, lose their own,
And being by others hurried every day,
Scarce in a year their natural form[2] obey;
Pleasure or business, so, our souls admit
For° their first mover, and are whirled by it. instead of
Hence is't, that I am carried towards the West
This day, when my soul's form bends toward the East.
There I should see a Sun[3] by rising, set,
And by that setting endless day beget:

[8] The final lines wittily rework, with startling sexual associations, Song of Solomon 5.2: "Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled." That biblical book was often interpreted as the song of love between Christ and the church.

[9] Arising from the unbalanced humors, inexplicably changeable.

[1] A fever, attended with paroxysms of hot and cold and trembling fits. "Fantastic": capricious, extravagant.

[1] As angelic intelligences guide the celestial spheres, so devotion is or should be the guiding principle of the soul.

[2] Their true moving principle or intelligence. The orbit of the celestial spheres was thought to be governed by an unmoving outermost sphere, the primum mobile, or first mover (line 8), but sometimes outside influences ("foreign motions," line 4) deflected the spheres from their correct orbits.

[3] The "sun" / "Son" pun was an ancient one. Christ the Son of God "set" when he rose on the Cross, and that setting (death) gave rise to the Christian era and the promise of immortality.

But that Christ on this cross did rise and fall,
Sin had eternally benighted all.
Yet dare I almost be glad I do not see
That spectacle, of too much weight for me.
Who sees God's face, that is self-life, must die;[4]
What a death were it then to see God die?
It made his own lieutenant,° Nature, shrink; deputy
It made his footstool crack, and the sun wink.[5]
Could I behold those hands which span the poles,
And tune[6] all spheres at once, pierced with those holes?
Could I behold that endless height which is
Zenith to us, and t'our antipodes,[7]
Humbled below us? Or that blood which is
The seat° of all our souls, if not of his, dwelling place
Make dirt of dust, or that flesh which was worn
By God for his apparel, ragg'd and torn?
If on these things I durst not look, durst I
Upon his miserable mother cast mine eye,
Who was God's partner here, and furnished thus
Half of that sacrifice which ransomed us?
Though these things, as I ride, be from° mine eye, away from.
They are present yet unto my memory,
For that looks towards them; and thou look'st towards me,
O Savior, as thou hang'st upon the tree.
I turn my back to thee but to receive
Corrections,[8] till thy mercies bid thee leave.° cease
O think me worth thine anger; punish me;
Burn off my rusts and my deformity;
Restore thine image so much, by thy grace,
That thou may'st know me, and I'll turn my face.

1633

A Hymn to Christ, at the Author's Last Going into Germany[1]

In what torn ship soever I embark,
That ship shall be my emblem of thy ark;° Noah's ark
What sea soever swallow me, that flood
Shall be to me an emblem of thy blood;
Though thou with clouds of anger do disguise
Thy face, yet through that mask I know those eyes,
Which, though they turn away sometimes, they never will despise.

I sacrifice this island° unto thee, England
And all whom I loved there, and who loved me;

[4] God told Moses, "Thou canst not see my face, for there shall no man see me, and live" (Exodus 33.20).

[5] An earthquake and eclipse supposedly accompanied the Crucifixion (Matthew 27.45, 51). Cf. Isaiah 66.1: "Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool."

[6] Some manuscripts read "turn."

[7] God is at once the highest point for us and for our "antipodes," those who live on the opposite side of the earth.

[8] Suggests a flogging.

[1] Donne went to Germany in 1619 as chaplain to the Earl of Doncaster. The mission was a diplomatic one, to the king and queen of Bohemia, King James's son-in-law and daughter, who at that time were mainstays of the Protestant cause on the Continent.

When I have put our seas twixt them and me,
Put thou thy sea[2] betwixt my sins and thee.
As the tree's sap doth seek the root below
In winter, in my winter now I go
Where none but thee, th' eternal root of true love, I may know.

Nor thou nor thy religion dost control[0] censure, restrain
The amorousness of an harmonious soul,
But thou wouldst have that love thyself; as thou
Art jealous, Lord, so I am jealous now.
Thou lov'st not, till from loving more[3] thou free
My soul; whoever gives, takes liberty;
Oh, if thou car'st not whom I love, alas, thou lov'st not me.

Seal then this bill of my divorce to all
On whom those fainter beams of love did fall;
Marry those loves which in youth scattered be
On fame, wit, hopes (false mistresses) to thee.
Churches are best for prayer that have least light:
To see God only, I go out of sight,
And to 'scape stormy days, I choose an everlasting night.

Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness[1]

Since I am coming to that holy room
Where, with thy choir of saints for evermore,
I shall be made thy music; as I come
I tune the instrument here at the door,
And what I must do then, think now before.[2]

Whilst my physicians by their love are grown
Cosmographers, and I their map, who lie
Flat on this bed, that by them may be shown
That this is my southwest discovery[3]
Per f return febris,[4] by these straits to die,

I joy, that in these straits, I see my West;
For, though their currents yield return to none,
What shall my West hurt me? As West and East
In all flat maps (and I am one) are one,[5]
So death doth touch the resurrection.

Is the Pacific Sea my home? Or are
The Eastern riches?[0] Is Jerusalem? Cathay, China

---

[2] Sea of Christ's blood.

[3] From loving any other thing.

[1] Though Izaak Walton, Donne's friend and biographer, assigns this poem to the last days of his life, it was probably written during another illness, in December 1623.

[2] This and the previous poem are less hymns (songs of praise) than meditations preparing (tuning the instrument) for such hymns.

[3] South is the region of heat, west the region of sunset and death.

[4] Through the straits of fever, with a pun on straits as sufferings, rigors, and a geographical reference to the Strait of Magellan.

[5] If a flat map is pasted on a round globe, west and east meet.

Anyan,[6] and Magellan, and Gibraltar,
All straits, and none but straits, are ways to them,
Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Shem.[7]

We think that Paradise and Calvary,
Christ's cross and Adam's tree, stood in one place;
Look, Lord and find both Adams[8] met in me;
As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face,
May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace.

So, in his purple wrapped,[9] receive me, Lord;
By these his thorns[0] give me his other crown; crown of thorns
And, as to others' souls I preached thy word,
Be this my text, my sermon to mine own:
Therefore that he may raise the Lord throws down.

1635

A Hymn to God the Father[1]

Wilt thou forgive that sin where I begun,
Which is my sin, though it were done before?[2]
Wilt thou forgive that sin through which I run,
And do run still, though still I do deplore?
When thou hast done,[3] thou hast not done,
For I have more.

Wilt thou forgive that sin by which I have won
Others to sin? and made my sin their door?
Wilt thou forgive that sin which I did shun
A year or two, but wallowed in a score?
When thou hast done, thou hast not done,
For I have more.

I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
Swear by thy self, that at my death thy Son
Shall shine as he shines now and heretofore;
And, having done that, thou hast done,
I fear[4] no more.

[6] Anian, a strait on the west coast of America, shown on early maps as separating America from Asia.

[7] The three sons of Noah by whom the world was repopulated after the Flood (Genesis 10). The descendants of Japhet were thought to inhabit Europe; those of Cham (Ham), Africa; and those of Shem, Asia.

[8] Adam and Christ. Legend had it that Christ's cross was erected on the spot, or at least in the region, where the tree forbidden to Adam in Eden had stood.

[9] In his blood, also in his kingly robes.

[1] This hymn was used as a congregational hymn. Walton tells us that Donne wrote it during his illness of 1623, had it set to music, and was delighted to hear it performed (as it frequently was) by the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral.

[2] I.e., he inherits the original sin of Adam and Eve.

[3] In the refrains, Donne puns on his own name and may pun on his wife's maiden name, Ann More.

[4] Some manuscripts read "have."

From Biathanatos[1]

Beza,[2] a man as eminent and illustrious in the full glory and noon of learning as others were in the dawning and morning, when any the least sparkle was notorious, confessed of himself that only for the anguish of a scurf,[3] which overran his head, he had once drowned himself from the Miller's Bridge in Paris,, if his uncle by chance had not then come that way. I have often such a sickly inclination. And whether it be because I had my first breeding and conversation with men of a suppressed and afflicted religion,[4] and hungry of an imagined martyrdom; or that the common enemy find that door worse locked against him in me;[5] or that there be a perplexity and flexibility in the doctrine itself; or because my conscience ever assures me that no rebellious grudging at God's gifts, nor other sinful concurrence accompanies these thoughts in me; or that a brave scorn, or that a faint cowardliness beget it, whensoever any affliction assails me, methinks I have the keys of my prison in mine own hand, and no remedy presents itself so soon to my heart as mine own sword. Often meditation of this has won me to a charitable interpretation of their action who die so, and provoked me a little to watch and exagitate[6] their reasons, which pronounce so peremptory judgments upon them.

From Devotions upon Emergent Occasions[1]

Meditation 4

Medicusque vocatur.
The physician is sent for.[2]

It is too little to call man a little world; except God, man is a diminutive to nothing.[3] Man consists of more pieces, more parts, than the world; than the world doth, nay, than the world is. And if those pieces were extended and stretched out in man as they are in the world, man would be the giant and the world the dwarf; the world but the map, and the man the world. If all the veins in our bodies were extended to rivers, and all the sinews to veins of mines, and all the muscles that lie upon one another to hills, and all the bones to quarries of stones, and all the other pieces to the proportion of those which correspond to them in the world, the air would be too little for this orb of man to move in, the firmament would be but enough for this star. For as the whole world hath nothing to which something in man doth not answer,[4] so hath man many pieces of which the whole world hath no representation. Enlarge this meditation upon this great world, man, so far as to consider the immensity of the creatures this world produces. Our creatures are our thoughts, creatures that are born giants, that reach from east to west, from earth to heaven, that do not only bestride all the sea and land, but span the sun and firmament at once: my thoughts reach all, comprehend all.

---

[1] Greek for "violent death." Donne wrote this treatise, the first English defense of suicide, for private circulation, probably in 1607—8; it was first published by his son in 1646.

[2] Theodore Beza (1519—1605) was a much admired French Calvinist theologian.

[3] An incrustation especially affecting the head, in which scales continually drop off the skin.

[4] Roman Catholicism. Donne's family suffered under the repressions leveled against that religion: he was in part educated by a Jesuit uncle who was later executed.

[5] I.e., the devil finds easiest access to me through this temptation.

[6] Attack.

[1] Donne's Devotions were composed in the aftermath of his serious illness in the winter of 1623, though Donne characteristically writes as if the events of the illness were happening as he describes them. The Devotions recount in twenty-three sections the stages ("emergent occasions") of the illness and recovery: the term associates the exercise with a popular kind of Protestant meditation on the occasions that daily life presents to us. Each section contains a "meditation upon our human condition," an "expostulation and debatement with God," and a prayer to God. The book was published almost immediately, offering its meditation on an intensely personal experience as exemplary for others.

[3] This meditation is based on the notion that each human being is a microcosm, a little world, analogous in every respect to the macrocosm, or great world. But in playing with this notion, Donne paradoxically reverses it.

Inexplicable mystery! I their creator am in a close prison, in a sick bed, anywhere, and any one of my creatures, my thoughts, is with the sun, and beyond the sun, overtakes the sun, and overgoes the sun in one pace, one step, everywhere. And then as the other world produces serpents and vipers, malignant and venomous creatures, and worms and caterpillars, that endeavor to devour that world which produces them, and monsters compiled and complicated[5] of divers parents and kinds, so this world, our selves, produces all these in us, in producing diseases and sicknesses of all those sorts; venomous and infectious diseases, feeding and consuming diseases, and manifold and entangled diseases made up of many several ones. And can the other world name so many venomous, so many consuming, so many monstrous creatures, as we can diseases of all these kinds? O miserable abundance, O beggarly riches! How much do we lack of having remedies for every disease, when as yet we have not names for them?

But we have a Hercules against these giants, these monsters: that is the physician. He musters up all the forces of the other world to succor this, all nature to relieve man. We have the physician but we are not the physician. Here we shrink in our proportion, sink in our dignity in respect of very mean creatures who are physicians to themselves. The hart that is pursued and wounded, they say, knows an herb which, being eaten, throws off the arrow: a strange kind of vomit.[6] The dog that pursues it, though he be subject to sickness, even proverbially knows his grass that recovers him. And it may be true that the drugger is as near to man as to other creatures; it may be that obvious and present simples,[7] easy to be had, would cure him; but the apothecary is not so near him, nor the physician so near him, as they two are to other creatures.[8] Man hath not that innate instinct to apply these natural medicines to his present danger, as those inferior creatures have. He is not his own apothecary, his own physician, as they are. Call back therefore thy meditation again, and bring it down.[9] What's become of man's great extent and proportion, when himself shrinks himself and consumes himself to a handful of dust? What's become of his soaring thoughts, his compassing thoughts, when himself brings himself to the ignorance, to the thoughtlessness, of the grave? His diseases are his own, but the physician is not; he hath them at home, but he must send for the physician.

[4] Correspond.

[5] Mixed.

[6] Deer supposedly expelled arrows wounding them by eating the herb dittany.

[7] Medicinal plants.

[8] One who administers drugs might do this for man as well as for other creatures, but one who sells drugs ("the apothecary") and the physician do not know how to prescribe for man as well as for other creatures.

[9] I.e., apply it to the present situation.

Meditation 17

Nunc lento sonitu dicunt, morieris.
Now this bell tolling softly for another, says to me, Thou must die.

Perchance he for whom this bell[1] tolls may be so ill as that he knows not it tolls for him; and perchance I may think myself so much better than I am, as that they who are about me and see my state may have caused it to toll for me, and I know not that. The church is catholic, universal, so are all her actions; all that she does belongs to all. When she baptizes a child, that action concerns me; for that child is thereby connected to that head which is my head too, and ingrafted into that body[2] whereof I am a member. And when she buries a man, that action concerns me: all mankind is of one author and is one volume; when one man dies, one chapter is not torn out of the book, but translated[3] into a better language; and every chapter must be so translated. God employs several translators; some pieces are translated by age, some by sickness, some by war, some by justice; but God's hand is in every translation, and his hand shall bind up all our scattered leaves again for that library where every book shall lie open to one another. As therefore the bell that rings to a sermon calls not upon the preacher only, but upon the congregation to come, so this bell calls us all; but how much more me, who am brought so near the door by this sickness. There was a contention as far as a suit[4] (in which piety and dignity, religion and estimation,[5] were mingled) which of the religious orders should ring to prayers first in the morning; and it was determined that they should ring first that rose earliest. If we understand aright the dignity of this bell that tolls for our evening prayer, we would be glad to make it ours by rising early, in that application, that it might be ours as well as his whose indeed it is. The bell doth toll for him that thinks it doth; and though it intermit again, yet from that minute that that occasion wrought upon him, he is united to God. Who casts not up his eye to the sun when it rises? But who takes off his eye from a comet when that breaks out? Who bends not his ear to any bell which upon any occasion rings? But who can remove it from that bell which is passing a piece of himself out of this world? No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main.[6] If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friend's or of thine own were. Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee.[7] Neither can we call this a begging of misery or a borrowing of misery, as though we were not miserable enough of ourselves but must fetch in more from the next house, in taking upon us the misery of our neighbors. Truly it were an excusable covetousness if we did; for affliction is a treasure, and scarce any man hath enough of it. No man hath affliction enough that is not matured and ripened by it, and made fit for God by that affliction. If a man carry treasure in bullion, or in a wedge of gold, and have none coined into current moneys, his treasure will not defray[8] him as he travels. Tribulation is treasure in the nature of it, but it is not current money in the use of it, except we get nearer and nearer our home, heaven, by it. Another man may be sick too, and sick to death, and this affliction may lie in his bowels as gold in a mine and be of no use to him; but this bell that tells me of his affliction digs out and applies that gold to me, if by this consideration of another's danger I take mine own into contemplation and so secure myself by making my recourse to my God, who is our only security.

[THE LANGUAGE OF GOD]

My God, my God, thou art a direct God, may I not say a literal God, a God that wouldst be understood literally and according to the plain sense of all that thou sayest. But thou art also (Lord, I intend it to thy glory, and let no profane misinterpreter abuse it to thy diminution), thou art a figurative, a metaphorical God too: a God in whose words there is such a height of figures, such voyages, such peregrinations to fetch remote and precious metaphors, such extensions, such spreadings, such curtains of allegories, such third heavens of hyperboles, so harmonious elocutions, so retired and so reserved expressions, so commanding persuasions, so persuading commandments, such sinews even in thy milk and such things in thy words, as all profane[9] authors seem of the seed of the serpent that creeps; thou art the dove that flies. Oh, what words but thine can express the inexpressible texture and composition of thy word; in which, to one man, that argument that binds his faith to believe that to be the word of God is the reverent simplicity of the word, and to another, the majesty of the word; and in which two men, equally pious, may meet, and one wonder that all should not understand it, and the other as much that any man should. So, Lord, thou givest us the same earth to labor on and to lie in; a house and a grave of the same earth; so, Lord, thou givest us the same word for our satisfaction and for our inquisition,[1] for our instruction and for our admiration too. For there are places that thy servants Jerome and Augustine would scarce believe (when they grew warm by mutual letters) of one another that they understood them, and yet both Jerome and Augustine call upon persons whom they knew to be far weaker than they thought one another (old women and young maids) to read thy Scriptures, without confining them to these or those places.[2]

Neither art thou thus a figurative, a metaphorical God, in thy word only, but in thy works too. The style of thy works, the phrase of thine actions, is metaphorical. The institution of thy whole worship in the old law was a continual allegory; types and figures[3] overspread all, and figures flowed into figures, and poured themselves out into further figures. Circumcision carried a figure of baptism,[4] and baptism carries a figure of that purity which we shall have in perfection in the New Jerusalem. Neither didst thou speak and work in this language only in the time of the prophets; but since thou spokest in thy son it is so too. How often, how much more often, doth thy son call himself a way and a light and a gate and a vine and bread than the son of God or of man? How much oftener doth he exhibit a metaphorical Christ than a real, a literal? This hath occasioned thine ancient servants, whose delight it was to write after thy copy,[5] to proceed the same way in their expositions of the Scriptures, and in their composing both of public liturgies and of private prayers to thee, to make their accesses to thee in such a kind of language as thou wast pleased to speak to them, in a figurative, in a metaphorical language; in which manner I am bold to call the comfort which I receive now in this sickness, in the indication of the concoction[6] and maturity thereof, in certain clouds[7] and residences[8] which the physicians observe, a discovering of land from sea after a long and tempestuous voyage. * * *

From Death s Duel[1]

[Donne's last sermon, on Psalm 68.20: "And unto God the Lord belong the issues[2] of Death"—i.e., from death.]

* * * First, then, we consider this exitus mortis, to be liberatio a morte, that with God, the Lord are the issues of death, and therefore in all our deaths, and the deadly calamities of this life, we may justly hope of a good issue from him; and all our periods and transitions in this life, are so many passages from death to death. Our very birth and entrance into this life is exitus a morte, an issue from death, for in our mother's womb we are dead so, as that we do not know we live, not so much as we do in our sleep, neither is there any grave so close, or so putrid a prison, as the womb would be unto us, if we stayed in it beyond our time, or died there before our time. In the grave the worms do not kill us, we breed and feed, and then kill the worms which we ourselves produced. In the womb the dead child kills the mother that conceived it, and is a murderer, nay a parricide, even after it is dead. And if we be not dead so in the womb, so as that being dead, we kill her that gave us our first life, our life of vegetation,[3] yet we are dead so, as David's Idols are dead. In the womb we have eyes and see not, ears and hear not.[4] There in the womb we are fitted for works of darkness, all the while deprived of light: And there in the womb we are taught cruelty, by being fed with blood, and may be damned, though we be never born. * * *

[1] The printed version of this sermon (1632) has the subtitle "A Consolation to the Soul, against the dying life, and living death of the body." Donne's friend and executor Henry King (later bishop of Chichester) supplied the further information that the sermon was delivered at Whitehall, before King Charles, that it was delivered only a few days before Donne's death, and that it was fitly styled "the author's own funeral sermon." Donne was a powerful and popular preacher, and this sermon was especially moving according to the testimony of many auditors, including Izaak Walton (see his account of Donne on his deathbed, p. 1309). Besides the personal drama of the preacher himself visibly ill and perhaps dying, the audience must have responded to the almost unbearably graphic analysis of the forms of death and decay—a theme that often preoccupied Donne. As in his poems, the language is personal, rich in learning and curious lore, dazzling in verbal ingenuity and metaphor. As in the Devotions, the sentences are long, sinuous, and elaborate. Typically, he uses a number of Latin phrases, but almost always translates or paraphrases them immediately.
[2] Passages out.
[3] I.e., of growth.
[4] Paraphrases Psalm 115.5-6.

But then this exitus a morte is but introitus in mortem, this issue, this deliverance from that death, the death of the womb, is an entrance, a delivering over to another death, the manifold deaths of this world. We have a winding-sheet[5] in our mother's womb, which grows with us from our conception, and we come into the world wound up in that winding-sheet, for we come to seek a grave. * * *

Now this which is so singularly peculiar to him [Christ], that his flesh should not see corruption, at his second coming, his coming to Judgment, shall extend to all then alive, their flesh shall not see corruption. . . . But for us that die now and sleep in the state of the dead, we must all pass this posthume death, this death after death, nay this death after burial, this dissolution after dissolution, this death of corruption and putrefaction, of vermiculation and incineration, of dissolution and dispersion in and from the grave. When those bodies that have been the children of royal parents, and the parents of royal children, must say with Job, to corruption, thou art my father, and to the worm thou art my mother and my sister.[6] Miserable riddle, when the same worm must be my mother, and my sister, and myself. Miserable incest, when I must be married to my mother and my sister, beget, and bear that worm which is all that miserable penury; when my mouth shall be filled with dust, and the worm shall feed, and feed sweetly upon me,[7] when the ambitious man shall have no satisfaction, if the poorest alive tread upon him, nor the poorest receive any contentment in being made equal to princes, for they shall be equal but in dust. One dies at his full strength, being wholly at ease and in quiet, and another dies in the bitterness of his soul, and never eats with pleasure, but they lie down alike in the dust, and the worm covers them.[8] The worm covers them in Job, and in Isaiah, it covers them and is spread under them, the worm is spread under thee, and the worm covers thee.[9] There's the mats and the carpets that lie under, and there's the state and the canopy,[1] that hangs over the greatest of the sons of men. Even those bodies that were the temple of the Holy Ghost, come to this dilapidation, to ruin, to rubbish, to dust: even the Israel of the Lord, and Jacob himself hath no other specification, no other denomination, but that vermis Jacob, thou worm of Jacob.[2] Truly the consideration of this posthume death, this death after burial, that after God (with whom are the issues of death) hath delivered me from the death of the womb, by bringing me into the world, and from the manifold deaths of the world, by laying me in the grave, I must die again in an incineration of this flesh, and in a dispersion of that dust. * * *

There we leave you in that blessed dependency, to hang upon him that hangs upon the Cross, there bathe in his tears, there suck at his wounds, and lie down in peace in his grave, till he vouchsafe you a resurrection, and an ascension into that Kingdom, which he hath purchased for you, with the inestimable price of his incorruptible blood. Amen.

IZAAK WALTON
1593-1683

Walton's Life of Donne, first published in 1640 as a biographical introduction to Donne's collected sermons, was the most artistic and accurate English biography to date. Walton drew on his personal knowledge of and friendship with Donne in his later years, talked with others who knew him, and looked over his poems, letters, and papers; but he enlivens his narrative with anecdotes that are often questionably accurate, and he quotes conversations that he could not have heard. While Walton made an effort to research his facts, his is not a scholarly biography, written in accord with the canons of evidence that have evolved since Walton's time. Rather, it is shaped by the great models of life-writing to which everyone in that age looked: Plutarch's Lives, portraying subjects as examples of virtue and vice; and hagiography or saints' lives exemplified by Augustine's autobiographical Confessions (ca. 400) and by Foxe's Book of Martyrs. The influence of hagiography on Walton is evident as he explicitly reads Donne's life against that of St. Augustine: rakish in youth and saintly in age. It is especially evident in the passage below, on Donne's remarkable preparations for death. It is no accident that this biography, published just as religious tensions were growing acute and civil war loomed on the horizon, represented Donne as a "saint" of Anglicanism. The other lives Walton wrote—of George Herbert, Richard Hooker, Henry Wotton, and Bishop Robert Sanderson—presented them as exemplary Anglican worthies to the triumphant Anglican church after the Restoration.

A prosperous merchant in the clothing trade, Walton lived for several years in the parish of St. Dunstans in the west, where Donne was vicar. He was a staunch royalist, credited with smuggling one of Prince Charles's jewels out of the country, but his life was otherwise unremarkable, save for his wildly popular book on fishing, The Complete Angler (1653). Written during the Cromwellian ascendancy, this series of dialogues between a fisherman and a hunter (and briefly a falconer) creates for Walton a fascinating surrogate self, Piscator, the angler. Setting the representative values of fishermen—moderation, peacefulness, generosity, thankfulness, contemplation—over against the contrasting values assigned to hunters and falconers, Walton makes "angling" stand in for the ceremonious, peaceful, ordered life of royalist Anglicans, now so violently disrupted. As a stylist Walton writes prose that is easy and colloquial but graceful and polished.

From The Life of Dr. John Donne[1]

[donne on his deathbed]

It is observed that a desire of glory or commendation is rooted in the very nature of man; and that those of the severest and most mortified[2] lives, though they may become so humble as to banish self-flattery, and such weeds as naturally grow there; yet they have not been able to kill this desire of glory, but that like our radical heat,[3] it will both live and die with us; and many think it should do so; and we want not sacred examples to justify the desire of having our memory to outlive our lives; which I mention, because Dr. Donne, by the persuasion of Dr. Fox,[4] easily yielded at this very time to have a monument made for him; but Dr. Fox undertook not to persuade him how, or what monument it should be; that was left to Dr. Donne himself.

A monument being resolved upon, Dr. Donne sent for a carver to make for him in wood the figure of an urn, giving him directions for the compass and height of it; and to bring with it a board, of the just[5] height of his body. These being got, then without delay a choice painter was got to be in readiness to draw his picture, which was taken as followeth. Several charcoal fires being first made in his large study, he brought with him into that place his winding-sheet in his hand, and having put off all his clothes, had this sheet put on him, and so tied with knots at his head and feet, and his hands so placed, as dead bodies are usually fitted to be shrouded and put into their coffin or grave. Upon this urn he thus stood with his eyes shut and with so much of the sheet turned aside as might show his lean, pale, and deathlike face, which was purposely turned toward the east, from whence he expected the second coming of his and our savior Jesus. In this posture he was drawn at his just height; and when the picture was fully finished, he caused it to be set by his bedside, where it continued and became his hourly object till his death, and was then given to his dearest friend and executor Dr. Henry King,[6] then chief residentiary of St. Paul's, who caused him to be thus carved in one entire piece of white marble, as it now stands in that church;[7] and by Dr. Donne's own appointment, these words were to be affixed to it as his epitaph:

And now, having brought him through the many labyrinths and perplexities of a various life, even to the gates of death and the grave, my desire is he may rest till I have told my reader that I have seen many pictures of him in several habits and at several ages and in several postures; and I now mention this because I have seen one picture of him, drawn by a curious[9] hand, at his age of eighteen, with his sword and what other adornments might then suit with the present fashions of youth and the giddy gaieties of that age;[1] and his motto then was—

> How much shall I be changed,
> Before I am changed!

And if that young and his now dying picture were at this time set together, every beholder might say, "Lord! how much is Dr. Donne already changed, before he is changed!" And the view of them might give my reader occasion to ask himself with some amazement, "Lord! how much may I also, that am now in health, be changed before I am changed; before this vile, this changeable body shall put off mortality!" and therefore to prepare for it. But this is not writ so much for my reader's memento[2] as to tell him that Dr. Donne would often in his private discourses, and often publicly in his sermons, mention the many changes both of his body and mind; especially of his mind from a vertiginous giddiness; and would as often say, "his great and most blessed change was from a temporal to a spiritual employment"; in which he was so happy, that he accounted the former part of his life to be lost; and the beginning of it to be from his first entering into sacred orders and serving his most merciful God at his altar.

Upon Monday after the drawing this picture, he took his last leave of his beloved study; and being sensible of his hourly decay, retired himself to his bedchamber; and that week sent at several[3] times for many of his most considerable friends, with whom he took a solemn and deliberate farewell, commending to their considerations some sentences useful for the regulation of their lives; and then dismissed them, as good Jacob did his sons, with a spiritual benediction. The Sunday following, he appointed his servants, that if there were any business yet undone that concerned him or themselves, it should be prepared against Saturday next; for after that day he would not mix his thoughts with anything that concerned this world; nor ever did; but, as Job, so he "waited for the appointed day of his dissolution."[4]

And now he was so happy as to have nothing to do but to die, to do which he stood in need of no longer time; for he had studied it long and to so happy a perfection that in a former sickness he called God to witness, "he was that minute ready to deliver his soul into his hands, if that minute God would determine his dissolution."[5] In that sickness he begged of God the constancy to be preserved in that estate forever; and his patient expectation to have his immortal soul disrobed from her garment of mortality makes me confident he now had a modest assurance that his prayers were then heard and his petition granted. He lay fifteen days earnestly expecting his hourly change; and in the last hour of his last day, as his body melted away and vapored into spirit, his soul having, I verily believe, some revelation of the beatifical vision, he said, "I were miserable if I might not die"; and after those words, closed many periods of his faint breath by saying often, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done." His speech, which had long been his ready and faithful servant, left him not till the last minute of his life, and then forsook him, not to serve another master (for who speaks like him), but died before him; for that it was then become useless to him that now conversed with God on earth as angels are said to do in heaven, only by thoughts and looks. Being speechless, and seeing heaven by that illumination by which he saw it, he did, as St. Stephen, "look steadfastly into it, till he saw the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God his Father";[6] and being satisfied with this blessed sight, as his soul ascended and his last breath departed from him, he closed his own eyes; and then disposed his hands and body into such a posture as required not the least alteration by those that came to shroud him.

[5] Walton paraphrases from Donne's Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, Prayer 23.

Thus variable, thus virtuous was the life; thus excellent, thus exemplary was the death of this memorable man.

He was buried in that place of St. Paul's Church which he had appointed for that use some years before his death; and by which he passed daily to pay his public devotions to almighty God (who was then served twice a day by a public form of prayer and praises in that place): but he was not buried privately, though he desired it; for, beside an unnumbered number of others, many persons of nobility, and of eminency for learning, who did love and honor him in his life, did show it at his death by a voluntary and sad attendance of his body to the grave, where nothing was so remarkable as a public sorrow.

To which place of his burial some mournful friends repaired, and, as Alexander the Great did to the grave of the famous Achilles,[7] so they strewed his with an abundance of curious and costly flowers; which course they (who were never yet known) continued morning and evening for many days, not ceasing till the stones that were taken up in that church to give his body admission into the cold earth (now his bed of rest) were again by the mason's art so leveled and firmed as they had been formerly, and his place of burial undistinguishable to common view.

The next day after his burial, some unknown friend, some one of the many lovers and admirers of his virtue and learning, wrote this epitaph with a coal on the wall over his grave:

Reader! I am to let thee know,
Donne's body only lies below;
For, could the grave his soul comprise,
Earth would be richer than the skies!

Nor was this all the honor done to his reverend ashes; for, as there be some persons that will not receive a reward for that for which God accounts himself a debtor, persons that dare trust God with their charity and without a witness; so there was by some grateful unknown friend that thought Dr. Donne's memory ought to be perpetuated, an hundred marks sent to his two faithful friends and executors,[8] towards the making of his monument. It was not for many years known by whom; but after the death of Dr. Fox, it was known that it was he that sent it; and he lived to see as lively a representation of his dead friend as marble can express: a statue indeed so like Dr. Donne, that (as his friend Sir Henry Wotton hath expressed himself) "it seems to breathe faintly, and posterity shall look upon it as a kind of artificial miracle."

He was of stature moderately tall; of a straight and equally proportioned body, to which all his words and actions gave an unexpressible addition of comeliness.

The melancholy and pleasant humor were in him so contempered that each gave advantage to the other, and made his company one of the delights of mankind.

His fancy was unimitably high, equaled only by his great wit;[9] both being made useful by a commanding judgment.

His aspect was cheerful, and such as gave a silent testimony of a clear knowing soul, and of a conscience at peace with itself.

His melting eye showed that he had a soft heart, full of noble compassion; of too brave a soul to offer injuries and too much a Christian not to pardon them in others.

He did much contemplate (especially after he entered into his sacred calling) the mercies of almighty God, the immortality of the soul, and the joys of heaven; and would often say, in a kind of sacred ecstasy, "Blessed be God that he is God, only and divinely like himself."

He was by nature highly passionate, but more apt to reluct at[1] the excesses of it. A great lover of the offices of humanity, and of so merciful a spirit that he never beheld the miseries of mankind without pity and relief.

He was earnest and unwearied in the search of knowledge, with which his vigorous soul is now satisfied, and employed in a continual praise of that God that first breathed it into his active body: that body, which once was a temple of the Holy Ghost and is now become a small quantity of Christian dust:

But I shall see it reanimated.

AEMILIA LANYER

1569-1645

Aemilia Lanyer was the first Englishwoman to publish a substantial volume of original poems and the first to make an overt bid for patronage. She was the daughter to an Italian family of court musicians who came to England in the reign of Henry VIII; they may have been Christianized Jews or, alternatively, Protestants forced to flee Catholic persecution in their native land. Some information about Lanyer's life has come down to us from the notebooks of the astrologer and fortune-teller Simon Forman, whom Lanyer consulted in 1597. Educated in the aristocratic household of the Countess of Kent, in her late teens and early twenties Lanyer was the mistress of Queen Elizabeth's lord chamberlain, Henry Carey, Lord Hunsdon. The wealthy Hunsdon, forty-five years her senior, was a notable patron of the arts—Shakespeare's company performed under his auspices in the 1590s—and he maintained his mistress in luxury. Yet when she became pregnant by Hunsdon at age twenty-three, she was married off to Alfonso Lanyer, one of another family of gentleman musicians attached to the courts of Elizabeth I and James I. Lanyer's fortunes declined after her marriage. Lanyer's poetry suggests that she resided for some time in the bookish and cultivated household of Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland, and Margaret's young daughter Anne. Lanyer reports receiving there encouragement in learning, piety, and poetry, as well as, perhaps, some support in the unusual venture of offering her poems for publication. Yet her efforts to find some niche at the Jacobean court came to nothing.

Lanyer's single volume of poems, Salve Dens Rex Judaeorum (1611) has a decided feminist thrust. A series of dedicatory poems to former and would-be patronesses praises them as a community of contemporary good women. The title poem, a meditation on Christ's Passion that at times invites comparison with Donne and Crashaw, contrasts the good women in the Passion story with the weak, evil men portrayed there. It also incorporates a defense of Eve and all women. That defense and Lanyer's prose epistle, "To the Virtuous Reader," are spirited contributions to the so-called querelle des femmes, or "debate about women," a massive body of writings in several genres and languages: some examples include Chaucer's Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale, Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, Joseph Swetnam's attack on "lewd, idle, froward, and unconstant women" and Rachel Speght's reply. The final poem in Lanyer's volume, "The Description of Cookham," celebrates in elegiac mode the Crown estate occasionally occupied by the Countess of Cumberland, portraying it as an Edenic paradise of women, now lost. The poem may or may not have been written before Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst"—commonly thought to have inaugurated the "country-house" genre in English literature—but Lanyer's poem can claim priority in publication. The poems' different conceptions of the role of women in the ideal social order make an instructive comparison.

To the Doubtful Reader[2]

Gentle Reader, if thou desire to be resolved, why I give this title, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, know for certain, that it was delivered unto me in sleep many years before I had any intent to write in this manner, and was quite out of my memory, until I had written the Passion of Christ, when immediately it came into my remembrance, what I had dreamed long before. And thinking it a significant token[3] that I was appointed to perform this work, I gave the very same words I received in sleep as the fittest title I could devise for this book.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty[4]

Renowned empress, and Great Britain's queen,
Most gracious mother of succeeding kings;
Vouchsafe° to view that which is seldom seen, be willing
A woman's writing of divinest things:

[1] "Hail God, King of the Jews," a variant of the inscription affixed to Christ's cross.

[2] Lanyer placed this explanation at the end of her volume, not the beginning, as a further authorizing gesture. Invoking the familiar genre of the dream vision, she lays claim to poetic, even divine, inspiration. "Doubtful": doubting.

[4] The first of eight poems addressed to court ladies whom Lanyer sought to attract as patrons; such poems commonly preface literary works by male courtier-poets, though usually not in such numbers. These poems are followed by a prose address to her actual patron, the Countess of Cumberland, and then by the prose epistle included here, "To the Virtuous Reader." This first poem addresses Anne of Denmark, James I s queen, patron of writers such as Ben Jonson and Samuel Daniel, and mother of Prince Henry, Princess Elizabeth, and the future Charles I.

Read it fair queen, though it defective be,
Your excellence can grace both it and me.

Behold, great queen, fair Eve's apology,° defense
Which I have writ in honor of your sex,
And do refer unto your majesty
To judge if it agree not with the text:[5]
And if it do, why are poor women blamed,
Or by more faulty men so much defamed.

My weak distempered brain and feeble spirits,
Which all unlearned have adventured, this
To write of Christ, and of his sacred merits, Desiring that this book her° hands may kiss: the queen's
And though I be unworthy of that grace,
Yet let her blessed thoughts this book embrace.

And pardon me, fair queen, though I presume
To do that which so many better can;
Not that I learning to myself assume,
Or that I would compare with any man:
But as they are scholars, and by art do write,
So Nature yields my soul a sad° delight. solemn, serious

And since all arts at first from Nature came,
That goodly creature, mother of perfection
Whom Jove's[6] almighty hand at first did frame,
Taking both her and hers[7] in his protection:
Why should not she now grace my barren muse,
And in a woman all defects excuse.

So peerless princess humbly I desire,
That your great wisdom would vouchsafe t'omit° overlook
All faults; and pardon if my spirits retire,
Leaving° to aim at what they cannot hit: declining
To write your worth, which no pen can express,
Were but t eclipse your fame, and make it less.[8]

To the Virtuous Reader

Often have I heard, that it is the property of some women, not only to emulate the virtues and perfections of the rest, but also by all their powers of ill speaking, to eclipse the brightness of their deserved fame: now contrary to their custom, which men I hope unjustly lay to their charge, I have written this small volume, or little book, for the general use of all virtuous ladies and gentlewomen of this kingdom; and in commendation of some particular persons of our own sex, such as for the most part, are so well known to myself, and others, that I dare undertake Fame dares not to call any better. And this have I done, to make known to the world, that all women deserve not to be blamed though some forgetting they are women themselves, and in danger to be condemned by the words of their own mouths, fall into so great an error, as to speak unadvisedly against the rest of their sex; which if it be true, I am persuaded they can show their own imperfection in nothing more: and therefore could wish (for their own ease, modesties, and credit) they would refer such points of folly, to be practiced by evil-disposed men, who forgetting they were born of women, nourished of women, and that if it were not by the means of women, they would be quite extinguished out of the world, and a final end of them all, do like vipers deface the wombs wherein they were bred, only to give way and utterance to their want of discretion and goodness. Such as these, were they that dishonored Christ's his apostles and prophets, putting them to shameful deaths. Therefore we are not to regard any imputations, that they undeservedly lay upon us, no otherwise than to make use of them to our own benefits, as spur to virtue, making us fly all occasions that may color their unjust speeches to pass current. Especially considering that they have tempted even the patience of God himself, who gave power to wise and virtuous women, to bring down their pride and arrogancy. As was cruel Cesarus by the discreet counsel of noble Deborah, judge and prophetess of Israel: and resolution of Jael wife of Heber the Kenite:[9] wicked Haman, by the divine prayers and prudent proceedings of beautiful Hester:[1] blasphemous Holofernes, by the invincible courage, rare wisdom, and confident carriage of Judith: and the unjust Judges, by the innocency of chaste Susanna:[2] with infinite others, which for brevity sake I will omit. As also in respect it pleased our lord and savior Jesus Christ, without the assistance of man, being free from original and all other sins, from the time of his conception, till the hour of his death, to be begotten of a woman, born of a woman, nourished of a woman, obedient to a woman; and that he healed women, pardoned women, comforted women: yea, even when he was in his greatest agony and bloody sweat, going to be crucified, and also in the last hour of his death, took care to dispose of a woman:[3] after his resurrection, appeared first to a woman, sent a woman[4] to declare his most glorious resurrection to the rest of his disciples. Many other examples I could allege of divers faithful and virtuous women, who have in all ages not only been confessors but also endured most cruel martyrdom for their faith in Jesus Christ. All which is sufficient to enforce all good Christians and honorable-minded men to speak reverently of our sex, and especially of all virtuous and good women. To the modest censures of both which, I refer these my imperfect endeavors, knowing that according to their own excellent dispositions they will rather cherish, nourish, and increase the least spark of virtue where they find it, by their favorable and best interpretations, than quench it by wrong constructions. To whom I wish all increase of virtue, and desire their best opinions.

[5] The biblical text (Genesis 1-3).

[6] God as creator of Nature.

[7] Nature and those (especially women) under Nature's protection.

[8] As her poetry of praise cannot possibly do justice to the queen, she abandons an attempt that would obscure rather than promote the queen's fame.

[9] Sisera (Canaariite leader, hence "Cesarus," i.e., "Caesar") was a Canaanite military commander (12th century B.c.E.) routed in battle by the Israelites under the leadership of the prophetess Deborah. Sisera was subsequently killed by the Kenite woman Jael, who enticed him to her tent and then drove a tent spike through his temples while he slept (Judges 4).

[1] Esther, the Jewish wife (5th century B.C.E.) of the Persian King Ahasuerus (Xerxes I), who by her wit and courage subverted the plot of the king's minister, Haman, to annihilate the Jews (Esther 1—7).

[2] Jewish wife and example of chastity (6th century B.C.E.). She was falsely accused of adultery by two Jewish elders, in revenge for refusing their sexual advances, and condemned to death. The wise judge Daniel saved her by uncovering the elders' perjury (Apocrypha, Book of Susanna). Judith in the 5th century B.C.E. delivered her Judean countrymen from the Assyrians by captivating their leader, Holofernes, with her charms and then decapitating him while he was drunk (Apocrypha, Book of Judith).

Eve's Apology in Defense of Women[5]

Now Pontius Pilate is to judge the cause° case
Of faultless Jesus, who before him stands,
Who neither hath offended prince, nor laws,
Although he now be brought in woeful bands.
O noble governor, make thou yet a pause,
Do not in innocent blood inbrue° thy hands; stain
But hear the words of thy most worthy wife,
Who sends to thee, to beg her Savior's life.[6]

Let barb'rous cruelty far depart from thee,
And in true justice take affliction's part;
Open thine eyes, that thou the truth may'st see.
Do not the thing that goes against thy heart,
Condemn not him that must thy Savior be;
But view his holy life, his good desert.
Let not us women glory in men's fall,[7]
Who had power given to overrule us all.

Till now your indiscretion sets us free.
And makes our former fault much less appear;
Our mother Eve, who tasted of the tree,
Giving to Adam what she held most dear,
Was simply good, and had no power to see;[8]
The after-coming harm did not appear:
The subtle serpent that our sex betrayed
Before our fall so sure a plot had laid.

That undiscerning ignorance perceived
No guile or craft that was by him intended;
For had she known of what we were bereaved,[9]
To his request she had not condescended.° consented
But she, poor soul, by cunning was deceived;

[5] Lanyer supplies the title for this subsection of the Sahe Deus on her title page. Eve is not, however, the speaker; rather, the narrator presents Eve's "Apology" (defense of her actions), which is also a defense of all women. She does so by means of an apostrophe (impassioned address) to Pilate, the Roman official who authorized the crucifixion of Jesus. Lanyer makes Pilate and Adam representatives of the male gender, whereas Eve and Pilate's wife represent womankind.

[6] Pilate's wife wrote her husband a letter urging Pilate to spare Jesus, about whom she had a warning dream (Matthew 27.19).

[7] The fall of Adam, and the prospective fall of Pilate.

[8] In Eden, Eve ate the forbidden fruit first, at the serpent's bidding. Genesis commentary usually emphasized Eve's full knowledge that God had forbidden them on pain of death and banishment from Eden to eat the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. Her action was usually ascribed to intemperance, pride, and ambition.

[9] Deprived, specifically of eternal life. In Genesis 3, Eve was enticed by the serpent to eat the forbidden fruit; she in turn enticed her husband. God expelled them from Eden, condemning Adam to hard labor, Eve to pain in childbirth and subjection to her husband, and both to suffering and death.

No hurt therein her harmless heart intended:
For she alleged° God's word, which he° denies, asserted / serpent
That they should die, but even as gods be wise.

But surely Adam cannot be excused;
Her fault though great, yet he was most to blame;
What weakness offered, strength might have refused,
Being lord of all, the greater was his shame.
Although the serpent's craft had her abused,
God's holy word ought all his actions frame,° determine
For he was lord and king of all the earth,
Before poor Eve had either life or breath,

Who being framed° by God's eternal hand fashioned
The perfectest man that ever breathed on earth;
And from God's mouth received that strait° command, strict
The breach whereof he knew was present death;
Yea, having power to rule both sea and land,
Yet with one apple won to lose that breath[1]
Which God had breathed in his beauteous face,
Bringing us all in danger and disgrace.

And then to lay the fault on Patience' back,
That we (poor women) must endure it all.
We know right well he did discretion lack,
Being not persuaded thereunto at all.
If Eve did err, it was for knowledge sake;
The fruit being fair persuaded him to fall:
No subtle serpent's falsehood did betray him;
If he would eat it, who had power to stay° him? prevent

Not Eve, whose fault was only too much love,
Which made her give this present to her dear,
That what she tasted he likewise might prove,° experience
Whereby his knowledge might become more clear;
He never sought her weakness to reprove
With those sharp words which he of God did hear;
Yet men will boast of knowledge, which he took
From Eve's fair hand, as from a learned book.

If any evil did in her remain,
Being made of him,[2] he was the ground of all.
If one of many worlds[3] could lay a stain
Upon our sex, and work so great a fall
To wretched man by Satan's subtle train,[4]
What will so foul a fault amongst you all?
Her weakness did the serpent's words obey,
But you in malice God's dear Son betray,

---

[1] The breath of life, which would have been eternal.

[2] Genesis 2.21—22 reports God's creation of Eve from Adam's rib.

[3] May allude to the commonplace that man is a little world, applying it here to woman.

[4] Tradition identifies Satan with the serpent, although that identification is not made in Genesis.

Whom, if unjustly you condemn to die,
Her sin was small to what you do commit;
All mortal sins[5] that do for vengeance cry
Are not to be compared unto it.
If many worlds would altogether try
By all their sins the wrath of God to get,
This sin of yours surmounts them all as far
As doth the sun another little star.[6]

Then let us have our liberty again,
And challenge° to yourselves no sovereignty. claim
You came not in the world without our pain,
Make that a bar against your cruelty;
Your fault being greater, why should you disdain
Our being your equals, free from tyranny?
If one weak woman simply did offend,
This sin of yours hath no excuse nor end,

To which, poor souls, we never gave consent.
Witness, thy wife, O Pilate, speaks for all,
Who did but dream, and yet a message sent
That thou shouldest have nothing to do at all
With that just man" which, if thy heart relent, Christ
Why wilt thou be a reprobate° with Saul[7] damned
To seek the death of him that is so good,
For thy soul's health to shed his dearest blood?

The Description of Cookham[1]

Farewell, sweet Cookham, where I first obtained
Grace[2] from that grace where perfect grace remained;
And where the muses gave their full consent,
I should have power the virtuous to content;
Where princely palace willed me to indite,° write
The sacred story of the soul's delight.[3]
Farewell, sweet place, where virtue then did rest,
And all delights did harbor in her breast;
Never shall my sad eyes again behold

[5] Sins punishable by damnation.

[6] In the Ptolemaic system, the sun was larger than the other planets and the fixed stars.

[7] King of Israel who sought the death of God's annointed prophet-king, David. The parallel is with Pilate, who sought Christ's death.

[1] The poem was written in honor of Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland, and celebrates a royal estate leased to her brother, at which the countess occasionally resided. The poem should be compared with Jonson's "To Penshurst" (p. 1434). Lanyer's poem is based on a familiarclassical topic, the "farewell to a place," which had its most famous development in Virgil's Eclogue 1. Lanyer makes extensive use of the common pastoral motif of nature's active sympathy with and response to human emotion—which later came to be called the "pathetic fallacy."

[2] Here, both God's grace and the favor of Her Grace, the Countess of Cumberland. Lanyer attributes both her religious conversion and her vocation as poet to a period of residence at Cookham in the countess's household. We do not know how long or under what circumstances Lanyer resided there.

[3] Apparently a reference to the countess as her patron, commissioning her Passion poem.

Those pleasures which my thoughts did then unfold.
Yet you, great lady, mistress of that place,
From whose desires did spring this work of grace;
Vouchsafe° to think upon those pleasures past, be willing
As fleeting worldly joys that could not last,
Or, as dim shadows of celestial pleasures,
Which are desired above all earthly treasures.
Oh how, methought, against° you thither came, in -preparation for
Each part did seem some new delight to frame!
The house received all ornaments to grace it,
And would endure no foulness to deface it.
And walks put on their summer liveries,[4]
And all things else did hold like similes:[5]
The trees with leaves, with fruits, with flowers clad,
Embraced each other, seeming to be glad,
Turning themselves to beauteous canopies,
To shade the bright sun from your brighter eyes;
The crystal streams with silver spangles graced,
While by the glorious sun they were embraced;
The little birds in chirping notes did sing,
To entertain both you and that sweet spring.
And Philomela[6] with her sundry lays,
Both you and that delightful place did praise.
Oh how me thought each plant, each flower, each tree
Set forth their beauties then to welcome thee!
The very hills right humbly did descend,
When you to tread on them did intend.
And as you set your feet, they still did rise,
Glad that they could receive so rich a prize.
The gentle winds did take delight to be Among those woods that were so graced by thee,
And in sad murmur uttered pleasing sound,
That pleasure in that place might more abound.
The swelling banks delivered all their pride
When such a phoenix[7] once they had espied.
Each arbor, bank, each seat, each stately tree,
Thought themselves honored in supporting thee.
The pretty birds would oft come to attend thee,
Yet fly away for fear they should offend thee;
The little creatures in the burrow by
Would come abroad to sport them in your eye,
Yet fearful of the bow in your fair hand,
Would run away when you did make a stand.
Now let me come unto that stately tree,
Wherein such goodly prospects you did see;
That oak that did in height his fellows pass,

[4] Distinctive garments worn by persons in the service of great families, to indicate whose servants they were.

[5] Behaved in similar fashion.

[6] In myth, Philomela was raped by her brother-in-law Tereus, who also tore out her tongue; the gods transformed her into a nightingale. Here the bird's song is joyous but later mournful (line 189), associating her own woes with those of Cookham at the women's departure.

[7] Mythical bird that lived alone of its kind for five hundred years, then was consumed in flame and reborn from its own ashes; metaphorically, a person of rare excellence. "All their pride": fish (cf. To Penshurst, lines 31—36).

As much as lofty trees, low growing grass,
Much like a comely cedar straight and tall,
Whose beauteous stature far exceeded all.
How often did you visit this fair tree,
Which seeming joyful in receiving thee,
Would like a palm tree spread his arms abroad,
Desirous that you there should make abode;
Whose fair green leaves much like a comely veil,
Defended Phoebus[0] when he would assail; resisted the sun
Whose pleasing boughs did yield a cool fresh air,
Joying[0] his happiness when you were there. enjoying
Where being seated, you might plainly see
Hills, vales, and woods, as if on bended knee
They had appeared, your honor to salute,
Or to prefer some strange unlooked-for suit;[8]
All interlaced with brooks and crystal springs,
A prospect fit to please the eyes of kings.
And thirteen shires appeared all in your sight,
Europe could not afford much more delight.
What was there then but gave you all content,
While you the time in meditation spent
Of their Creator's power, which there you saw,
In all his creatures held a perfect law;
And in their beauties did you plain descry[0] perceive
His beauty, wisdom, grace, love, majesty.
In these sweet woods how often did you walk,
With Christ and his apostles there to talk;
Placing his holy writ in some fair tree
To meditate what you therein did see.
With Moses you did mount his holy hill
To know his pleasure, and perform his will.[9]
With lowly David you did often sing
His holy hymns to heaven's eternal King.[1]
And in sweet music did your soul delight
To sound his praises, morning, noon, and night.
With blessed Joseph you did often feed
Your pined brethren, when they stood in need.[2]
And that sweet lady sprung from Clifford's race,
Of noble Bedford's blood, fair stem of grace,[3]
To honorable Dorset now espoused,[4]
In whose fair breast true virtue then was housed,
Oh what delight did my weak spirits find
In those pure parts[0] of her well framed mind. qualities
And yet it grieves me that I cannot be Near unto her, whose virtues did agree

---

[8] To urge some unexpected petition, as to a monarch.

[9] You sought out and followed God's law, like Moses, who received the Ten Commandments on Mount Sinai.

[1] You often sang David's psalms.

[2] Like Joseph, who fed the starving Israelites in Egypt, you fed the hungry.

[3] Main line of the family tree. Anne Clifford, only surviving child of the seaman-adventurer George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland, and the countess, a Russell (of "Bedford's blood"). She was tutored by Samuel Daniel and her Diary offers interesting insights into this period.

[4] Anne Clifford was married to Richard Sackville, third Earl of Dorset, on February 25, 1609; the reference helps date Lanyer's poem.

With those fair ornaments of outward beauty,
Which did enforce from all both love and duty.
Unconstant Fortune, thou art most to blame,
Who casts us down into so low a frame
Where our great friends we cannot daily see,
So great a difference is there in degree.[5]
Many are placed in those orbs of state,
Parters[6] in honor, so ordained by Fate,
Nearer in show, yet farther off in love,
In which, the lowest always are above.[7]
But whither am I carried in conceit,° thought, fancy
My wit too weak to conster° of the great. construe
Why not? Although we are but born of earth,
We may behold the heavens, despising death;
And loving heaven that is so far above,
May in the end vouchsafe us entire love.[8]
Therefore sweet memory do thou retain
Those pleasures past, which will not turn again:
Remember beauteous Dorset's[9] former sports,
So far from being touched by ill reports,
Wherein myself did always bear a part,
While reverend love presented my true heart.
Those recreations let me bear in mind,
Which her sweet youth and noble thoughts did find,
Whereof deprived, I evermore must grieve,
Hating blind Fortune, careless to relieve.
And you sweet Cookham, whom these ladies leave,
I now must tell the grief you did conceive
At their departure, when they went away,
How everything retained a sad dismay.
Nay long before, when once an inkling came,
Methought each thing did unto sorrow frame:
The trees that were so glorious in our view,
Forsook both flowers and fruit, when once they knew
Of your depart, their very leaves did wither,
Changing their colors as they grew together.
But when they saw this had no power to stay you,
They often wept, though, speechless, could not pray you,
Letting their tears in your fair bosoms fall,
As if they said, Why will ye leave us all?
This being vain, they cast their leaves away
Hoping that pity would have made you stay:
Their frozen tops, like age's hoary hairs,
Shows their disasters, languishing in fears.
A swarthy riveled rind° all over spread, hark
Their dying bodies half alive, half dead.

---

[5] These lines and lines 117—25 probably exaggerate Lanyer's former familiarity with Anne Clifford.
[6] Separators, i.e., the various honorific ranks ("orbs of state") act to separate person from person.
[7] An egalitarian sentiment playing on the Christian notion that in spiritual things—love and charity—the poor and lowly surpass the great ones.
[8] I.e., we (lowly) may also love God and enjoy God's love, and hence are equal to anyone.
[9] As was common, Anne Clifford is here referred to by her husband's title.

But your occasions called you so away[1]
That nothing there had power to make you stay.
Yet did I see a noble grateful mind
Requiting each according to their kind,
Forgetting not to turn and take your leave
Of these sad creatures, powerless to receive
Your favor, when with grief you did depart,
Placing their former pleasures in your heart,
Giving great charge to noble memory
There to preserve their love continually.
But specially the love of that fair tree,
That first and last you did vouchsafe to see,
In which it pleased you oft to take the air
With noble Dorset, then a virgin fair,
Where many a learned book was read and scanned,
To this fair tree, taking me by the hand,
You did repeat the pleasures which had passed,
Seeming to grieve they could no longer last.
And with a chaste, yet loving kiss took leave,
Of which sweet kiss I did it soon bereave,° soon take from it
Scorning a senseless creature should possess
So rare a favor, so great happiness.
No other kiss it could receive from me,
For fear to give back what it took of thee,
So I ungrateful creature did deceive it
Of that which you in love vouchsafed to leave it.
And though it oft had given me much content,
Yet this great wrong I never could repent;
But of the happiest made it most forlorn,
To show that nothing's free from Fortune's scorn,
While all the rest with this most beauteous tree
Made their sad comfort sorrow's harmony.
The flowers that on the banks and walks did grow,
Crept in the ground, the grass did weep for woe.
The winds and waters seemed to chide together
Because you went away they knew not whither;
And those sweet brooks that ran so fair and clear,
With grief and trouble wrinkled did appear.
Those pretty birds that wonted° were to sing, accustomed
Now neither sing, nor chirp, nor use their wing,
But with their tender feet on some bare spray,
Warble forth sorrow, and their own dismay.
Fair Philomela leaves her mournful ditty,
Drowned in deep sleep, yet can procure no pity.
Each arbor, bank, each seat, each stately tree
Looks bare and desolate now for want of thee,
Turning green tresses into frosty gray,
While in cold grief they wither all away.
The sun grew weak, his beams no comfort gave,
While all green things did make the earth their grave.

[1] After her husband's death (1605) Margaret Clifford chiefly resided in her dower properties in the north; Anne Clifford was married in 1609.

Each briar, each bramble, when you went away
Caught fast your clothes, thinking to make you stay;
Delightful Echo wonted to reply
To our last words, did now for sorrow die;
The house cast off each garment that might grace it,
Putting on dust and cobwebs to deface it.
All desolation then there did appear,
When you were going whom they held so dear.
This last farewell to Cookham here I give,
When I am dead thy name in this may live,
Wherein I have performed her noble hest° commission
Whose virtues lodge in my unworthy breast,
And ever shall, so long as life remains,
Tying my life to her by those rich chains.° her virtues

BEN JONSON
1572-1637

In 1616 Ben Jonson published his Works, to the derision of those astounded to see mere plays and poems collected under the same title the king gave to his political treatises. Many of Jonson's contemporaries shied away from publication, either because, like Donne, they wrote for small coterie audiences or because, like Shakespeare, they wrote for theater companies that preferred not to let go of the scripts. Jonson knew and admired both Donne and Shakespeare and more than any Jacobean belonged to both of their very different worlds, but in publishing his Works he laid claim to an altogether higher literary status. He had risen from very humble beginnings to become England's unofficial poet laureate, with a pension from the king and honorary degrees from both Oxford and Cambridge. If he was not the first professional author in England, he was the first to invest that role with dignity and respectability. His published Works, over which he labored with painstaking care, testify to an extraordinary feat of self-transformation.

Jonson's early life was tough and turbulent. The posthumous son of a London clergyman, he was educated at Westminster School under the great antiquarian scholar William Camden. There he developed his love of classical learning, but lacking the resources to continue his education, Jonson was forced to turn to his stepfather's trade of bricklaying, a life he "could not endure." He escaped by joining the English forces in Flanders, where, as he later boasted, he killed a man in single combat before the eyes of two armies. Back in London, his attempt to make a living as an actor and playwright almost ended in early disaster. He was imprisoned in 1597 for collaborating with Thomas Nashe on the scandalous play The Isle of Dogs (now lost), and shortly after his release he killed one of his fellow actors in a duel. Jonson escaped the gallows by pleading benefit of clergy (a medieval privilege exempting felons who could read Latin from the death penalty). His learning had saved his life, but he emerged from captivity branded on the thumb, and with another mark against him as well. Under the influence of a priest imprisoned with him, he had converted to Catholicism (around the time that John Donne was abandoning that faith). Jonson was now more than ever a marginal figure, distrusted by the society that he satirized brilliantly in his early plays.

Jonson's fortunes improved with the accession of James I, though not at once. In 1603 he was called before the Privy Council to answer charges of "popery and treason" found in his play Sejanus. Little more than a year later he was in jail again for his part in the play Eastward Ho, which openly mocked the king's Scots accent and propensity for selling knighthoods. Yet Jonson was now on the way to establishing himself at the new court. In 1605 he received the commission to organize the Twelfth Night entertainment; The Masque of Blackness was the first of twenty-four masques he would produce for the court, most of them in collaboration with the architect and scene designer Inigo Jones. In the same years that he was writing the masques he produced his greatest works for the public theater. His first successful play, Every Man in His Humor (1598), had inaugurated the so-called comedy of humors, which ridicules the eccentricities or passions of the characters (thought to be caused by physiological imbalance). He capitalized on this success with the comedies Volpone (1606), Epicene (1609), The Alchemist (1610), and Bartholomew Fair (1614). Jonson preserved the detached, satiric perspective of an outsider, but he was rising in society and making accommodations where necessary. In 1605, when suspicion fell upon him as a Catholic following the exposure of the Gunpowder Plot, he showed his loyalty by agreeing to serve as a spy for the Privy Council. Five years later he would return to the Church of England.

Although he rose to a position of eminent respectability, Jonson seems to have been possessed all his life by a quarrelsome spirit. Much of his best work emerged out of fierce tensions with collaborators and contemporaries. At the turn of the century he became embroiled in the so-called War of the Theaters, in which he satirized and was satirized by his fellow playwrights John Marston and Thomas Dekker. Later, his long partnership with Inigo Jones was marked by ever more bitter rivalry over the relative importance of words and scenery in the masques. Jonson also poured invective on the theater audiences when they failed, in his view, to appreciate his plays. The failure of his play The New Inn elicited his "Ode to Himself" (1629), a disgusted farewell to the "loathed stage." Yet even after a stroke in 1629 left him partially paralyzed and confined to his home, Jonson continued to write for the stage, and was at work on a new play when he died in 1637.

In spite of his antagonistic nature, Jonson had a great capacity for friendship. His friends included Shakespeare, Donne, Francis Bacon, and John Selden. In later years he gathered about himself a group of admiring younger men known as the "Sons of Ben," whose numbers included Robert Herrick, Thomas Carew, and Sir John Suckling. He was a fascinating and inexhaustible conversationalist, as recorded by his friend William Drummond of Hawthornden, who carefully noted down Jonson's remarks on a wide variety of subjects, ranging from his fellow poets to his sexual predilections. Jonson also moved easily among the great of the land. His patrons included Lady Mary Wroth and other members of the Sidney and Herbert families. In "To Penshurst," a celebration of Robert Sidney's country estate, Jonson offers an ideal image of a social order in which a virtuous patriarchal governor offers ready hospitality to guests of all stations, from poets to kings.

"To Penshurst," together with Aemilia Lanyer's "Description of Cookham," inaugurated the small genre of the "country-house poem" in England. Jonson tried his hand, usually with success, at a wide range of poetic genres, including epitaph and epigram, love and funeral elegy, verse satire and verse letter, song and ode. More often than not he looked back to classical precedents. From the Roman poets Horace and Martial he derived not only generic models but an ideal vision of the artist and society against which he measured himself and the court he served. In many poems he adopted the persona of a witty, keenly perceptive, and scrupulously honest judge of men and women. The classical values Jonson most admired are enumerated in "Inviting a Friend to Supper," which describes a dinner party characterized by moderation, civility, graciousness, and pleasure that delights without enslaving—all contrasting sharply with the excess and licentiousness that marked the banquets and entertainments of imperial Rome and Stuart England. Yet the poet who produced this image of moderation was a man of immense appetites, which found expression in his art as well as in his life. His best works seethe with an almost uncontrollable imaginative energy and lust for abundance. Even his profound classical learning manifests this impulse. The notes and references to learned authorities that spill across the margins of his Works can be seen as the literary equivalent of food and drink piled high on the poet's table. Years of hardship had taught Jonson to seek his feasts in his imagination, and he could make the most mundane object the basis for flights of high fancy. As he told Drummond, he once "consumed a whole night in lying looking to his great toe, about which he had seen Tartars and Turks, Romans and Carthaginians fight in his imagination." In Drummond's view, Jonson was "oppressed with fantasy." Perhaps it was so—but Jonson's capacity for fantasy also produced a wide variety of plays, masques, and poems, in styles ranging from witty comedy to delicate lyricism.

The Masque of Blackness

After James I and Queen Anne ascended the English throne in 1603, they presided over the development of the court masque as political entertainment, idealizing the Stuart court as the embodiment of all perfections. Blackness established Jonson and Inigo Jones as the chief makers of court masques for more than two decades. Jonson provided the words and Jones the spectacle; over the years their rivalry grew ever more intense. For the first decade the queen took an active role in planning and performing court masques, which were usually performed only once—most often on Twelfth Night, as in this case, or sometimes for a wedding or other special occasion. Blackness also began the tradition of prodigiously expensive masques: the queen's bills for it came to around £5,000 (more than five hundred times what the young Jonson would have made in a year as an apprentice bricklayer). These entertainments were customarily followed by an elaborate feast and all-night dancing (the revels). On this occasion, as on many that followed, the evening was chaotic. The banquet table was overturned by the crush of diners before the meal began; guests were beaten by the palace guards; light-fingered revelers stole jewels, chains, and purses; and sexual liaisons went on in dark corners.

Court masques differed from performances in the public theater in most respects. Essentially an elaborate dance form, the masque was a multimedia event combining songs, speech, richly ornamented costumes and masks, shifting scene panels depicting elaborate architecture and landscapes, and intricate machines in which gods and goddesses descended from the heavens. They were presented to King James, who occupied the Chair of State, which was placed in the ideal viewing position. While the speaking parts were taken by professionals, the dancers were members of the court, including—to the horror of English Puritans—women. In the reign of Charles I, William Prynne lost his ears for attacking masques and comparing the women who danced in them (including the queen) to whores.

On the surface, Blackness asserts the cultural superiority of the English over non-European peoples and celebrates the patriarchal power of James, the "Sun King" of Britain, who can turn black skin to white. But in this and other queen's masques a subversive current is evident. Jonson tells us it was "her Majesty's will" that the ladies appear as black African beauties. Their costumes designed by Inigo Jones conjoin exotic beauty and wildness, associating them with the feared and desired "others" discovered (or imagined) by contemporary explorers. The power of the supposed Sun King is undercut by Niger's lengthy praise of black beauty and by the fact that the promised transformation of the ladies' skin is not staged (though they have become white in the sequel, The Masque of Beauty, performed three years later). Some viewers found the work unsettling, one deeming the ladies' apparel "too light and courtesan-like" and their black faces and hands "a very loathsome sight."

In many later Jacobean masques the glorification of the monarch seems less conflicted. Jonson developed a kind of prologue known as the antimasque, in which wicked, disruptive, or rustic characters played by professional actors invade the court, only to be banished by the aristocratic masquers whose dancing transforms the court into a golden world. They then enact the mixture of the ideal and the real as they unmask, revealing themselves as court personages, and proceed to dance the revels with the other members of the court. Caroline court masques, in which Charles I and Queen Henrietta Maria regularly danced, tended to be longer, more elaborate, more dialogic, more spectacular, and even more hyperbolic. But early to late, many masques contain features that subtly resist the politics of Stuart absolutism.

The Masque of Blackness

The Queen's Masques: the first
Of Blackness
Personated at the Court at Whitehall, on the Twelfth Night, 1605.

Pliny, Solinus, Ptolemy, and of late Leo the African,[1] remember unto us a river in Ethiopia famous by the name of Niger,[2] of which the people were called Nigritae, now Negroes, and are the blackest nation of the world. This river taketh spring out of a certain lake,[3] eastward, and after a long race, falleth into the western ocean. Hence (because it was her Majesty's will to have them blackamoors at first) the invention was derived by me, and presented thus.

First, for the scene, was drawn a Landscape[4] consisting of small woods, and here and there a void place filled with huntings; which falling, an artificial sea was seen to shoot forth, as if it flowed to the land, raised with waves which seemed to move, and in some places the billow to break,[5] as imitating that orderly disorder, which is common in nature. In front of this sea were placed six tritons,[6] in moving and sprightly actions; their upper parts human, save that their hairs were blue, as partaking of the sea color; their desinent[7] parts fish, mounted above their heads, and all varied in disposition. From their backs were borne out certain light pieces of taffeta, as if carried by the wind, and their music made out of wreathed shells. Behind these, a pair of sea maids, for song, were as conspicuously seated; between which two great sea horses, as big as the life, put forth themselves; the one mounting aloft, and writhing his head from the other, which seemed to sink forwards; so intended for variation, and that the figure behind might come off better. Upon their backs Oceanus[8] and Niger were advanced.

Oceanus, presented in a human form, the color of his flesh blue, and shadowed with a robe of sea green; his head gray and horned, as he is described by the ancients; his beard of the like mixed color. He was garlanded with algae or seagrass, and in his hand a trident.

Niger, in form and color of an Ethiop, his hair and rare beard curled, shadowed with a blue and bright mantle; his front, neck, and wrists adorned with pearl; and crowned with an artificial wreath of cane and paper-rush.

These induced the masquers, which were twelve nymphs, negroes, and the daughters of Niger, attended by so many of the Oceaniae,[9] which were their lightbearers.

[1] This long introductory note is Jonson's. Leo wrote the Description of Africa (1526); the other three are classical authorities on geography.

[2] Some, though not Pliny, identified it as the Nile. "Niger" means "black."

[3] Lake Chad.

[4] Painted on the front curtain.

[5] Effects created by a series of painted cloths raised and lowered by a machine.

[6] Sea gods.

[7] Back.

[8] The Atlantic Ocean, father of the river Niger. Both ride on the backs of hippocamps ("sea horses"), mythological creatures with horses' heads and sea serpents' tails.

[9] Sea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus and Tethys.

The masquers were placed in a great concave shell, like mother of pearl, curiously made to move on those waters, and rise with the billow; the top thereof was stuck with a chevron of lights which, indented to the proportion of the shell, struck a glorious beam upon them as they were seated one above another; so that they were all seen, but in an extravagant order.[1]

On sides of the shell did swim six huge sea monsters, varied in their shapes and dispositions, bearing on their backs the twelve torchbearers, who were planted there in several greces,[2] so as the backs of some were seen, some in purfle[3] (or side), others in face, and all having their lights burning out of whelks or murex shells.

The attire of the masquers was alike in all, without difference; the colors azure and silver, their hair thick, and curled upright in tresses, like pyramids, but returned on the top with a scroll and antique dressing of feathers, and jewels interlaced with ropes of pearl. And for the front, ear, neck and wrists, the ornament was of the most choice and orient pearl, best setting off from the black.

For the light-bearers, sea green, waved about the skirts with gold and silver; their hair loose and flowing, garlanded with sea grass, and that stuck with branches of coral.

These thus presented, the scene behind seemed a vast sea (and united with this that flowed forth)[4] from the termination or horizon of which (being the level of the state,[5] which was placed in the upper end of the hall) was drawn, by the lines of perspective, the whole work, shooting downwards from the eye; which decorum made it more conspicuous, and caught the eye afar off with a wandering beauty. To which was added an obscure and cloudy night piece,[6] that made the whole set off. So much for the bodily part, which was of Master Inigo Jones his design and act.

By this, one of the tritons, with the two sea maids, began to sing to the others' loud music, their voices being a tenor and two trebles.

SONG

Sound, sound aloud
The welcome of the orient flood
Into the west;
Fair Niger, son to great Oceanus,
Now honored thus
With all his beauteous race,
Who though but black in face,
Yet are they bright,
And full of life and light,
To prove that beauty best
Which not the color, but the feature
Assures unto the creature.

OCEANUS Be silent, now the ceremony's done,
And Niger, say, how comes it, lovely son,
That thou, the Ethiop's river, so far east,
Art seen to fall into th'extremest west
Of me, the king of floods, Oceanus,

6. The upper part of the scenery, through which the moon later descends.

And in mine empire's heart salute me thus?
My ceaseless current now amazed stands
To see thy labor through so many lands
Mix thy fresh billow with my brackish stream,
And in thy sweetness, stretch thy diademe° realm, rule
To these far distant and unequaled skies,
This squared circle of celestial bodies.[7]
NIGER Divine Oceanus, 'tis not strange at all
That, since the immortal souls of creatures mortal
Mix with their bodies, yet reserve forever
A power of separation, I should sever
My fresh streams from thy brackish, like things fixed,
Though with thy powerful saltness thus far mixed.
"Virtue though chained to earth, will still live free;
And hell itself must yield to industry."[8]
OCEANUS But what's the end of thy Herculean labors,
Extended to these calm and blessed shores?
NIGER To do a kind and careful father's part,
In satisfying every pensive° heart anxious
Of these my daughters, my most loved birth;
Who, though they were the first formed dames of earth,[9]
And in whose sparkling and refulgent° eyes radiant
The glorious sun did still° delight to rise, always
Though he (the best judge, and most formal cause[1]
Of all dames' beauties) in their firm hues draws
Signs of his fervent'st love, and thereby shows
That in their black the perfect'st beauty grows,
Since the fixed color of their curled hair
(Which is the highest grace of dames most fair)
No cares, no age can change, or there display
The fearful tincture of abhorred gray,
Since Death herself (herself being pale and blue)
Can never alter their most faithful hue;
All which are arguments to prove how far
Their beauties conquer in great beauty's war;
And more, how near divinity they be,
That stand from passion or decay so free.
Yet, since the fabulous voices of some few
Poor brainsick men, styled poets[2] here with you,
Have, with such envy of their graces, sung
The painted beauties other empires sprung,
Letting their loose and winged fictions fly
To infect all climates, yea, our purity;
As of one Phaeton, that fired the world,[3]
And that before his heedless flames were hurled

About the globe, the Ethiops were as fair
As other dames, now black with black despair,
And in respect of their complexions changed,
Are eachwhere, since, for luckless creatures ranged.
Which when my daughters heard (as women are Most jealous of their beauties) fear and care
Possessed them whole; yea, and believing them,[4]
They wept such ceaseless tears into my stream
That it hath thus far overflowed his shore
To seek them patience; who have since e'ermore
As the sun riseth, charged his burning throne
With volleys of revilings, 'cause he shone
On their scorched cheeks with such intemperate fires,
And other dames made queens of all desires.
To frustrate which strange error oft I sought,
Though most in vain against a settled thought
As women's are, till they confirmed at length
By miracle what I wish so much strength
Of argument resisted; else they feigned:
For in the lake where their first spring they gained,
As they sat cooling their soft limbs one night,
Appeared a face all circumfused with light;
(And sure they saw't, for Ethiops never dream)[5]
Wherein they might decipher through the stream
These words:
  That they a land must forthwith seek,
  Whose termination (of the Greek)
  Sounds -tania; where bright Sol, that heat
  Their bloods, doth never rise or set,
  But in his journey passeth by,
  And leaves that climate of the sky
  To comfort of a greater light,[6]
  Who forms all beauty with his sight.
In search of this have we three princedoms passed
That speak out -tania in their accents last:
Black Mauritania[7] first, and secondly
Swarth Lusitania,[0] next we did descry[0] Portugal / perceive
Rich Aquitania,[0] and yet cannot find southwest France
The place unto these longing nymphs designed.[0] appointed
Instruct and aid me, great Oceanus:
What land is this that now appears to us?
OCEANUS This land, that lifts into the temperate air
His snowy cliff, is Albion the fair,
So called of Neptune's son,[8] who ruleth here;
For whose dear guard, myself four thousand year,
Since old Deucalion's[9] days, have walked the round

[7] Land of the Moors in North Africa.
[8] King James, regularly so styled because of Britain's close relationship to the sea. Albion (previous line): ancient name for England meaning "white land".
[9] A Greek analogue to Noah, as the survivor of a great flood.

About his empire, proud to see him crowned
Above my waves.

At this, the moon was discovered in the upper part of the house, triumphant in a silver throne, made in figure of a pyramis.[1] Her garments white and silver, the dressing of her head antique, and crowned with a luminary or sphere of light, which striking on the clouds, and heightened with silver, reflected as natural clouds do by the splendor of the moon. The heaven about her was vaulted with blue silk, and set with stars of silver which had in them their several lights burning. The sudden sight of which made Niger to interrupt Oceanus with this present passion.[2]

NIGER —O see, our silver star!
Whose pure auspicious light greets us thus far!
Great /Ethiopia, goddess of our shore,[3]
Since with particular worship we adore
Thy general brightness, let particular grace
Shine on my zealous daughters. Show the place
Which long their longings urged their eyes to see.
Beautify them, which long have deified thee.
AETHIOPIA Niger, be glad; resume thy native cheer.
Thy daughters' labors have their period here,
And so thy errors. I was that bright face
Reflected by the lake, in which thy race
Read mystic lines (which skill Pythagoras[4]
First taught to men by a reverberate[0] glass). reflecting
This blessed isle doth with that-tania end
Which there they saw inscribed, and shall extend Wished satisfaction to their best desires.
Britannia, which the triple world admires,[5]
This isle hath now recovered for her name;
Where reign those beauties that with so much fame
The sacred Muses' sons have honored,
And from bright Hesperus to Eos spread.[6]
With that great name, Britannia, this blest isle
Hath won her ancient dignity and style,[0] title, name
A world divided from the world,[7] and tried
The abstract of it in his general pride.
For were the world, with all his wealth, a ring,
Britannia (whose new name makes all tongues sing)
Might be a diamond worthy to enchase it,
Ruled by a sun, that to this height doth grace it.
Whose beams shine day and night, and are of force
To blanch an Ethiop and revive a corpse.[8]
His light sciental[0] is and (past mere nature) endowed with knowledge
Can salve the rude defects of every creature.

[8] Corpse. Both are proverbial impossibilities.

Call forth thy honored daughters, then,
And let them 'fore the Britain men
Indent the land with those pure traces[9]
They flow with in their native graces.
Invite them boldly to the shore,
Their beauties shall be scorched no more;
This sun is temperate, and refines
All things on which his radiance shines.

Here the tritons sounded, and they danced on shore, every couple as they advanced severally presenting their fans, in one of which were inscribed their mixed names, in the other a mute hieroglyphic, expressing their mixed qualities.[1] Which manner of symbol I rather chose than imprese,[2] as well for strangeness, as relishing of antiquity, and more applying to that original doctrine of sculpture which the Egyptians are said first to have brought from the Ethiopians.

Their own single dance ended, as they were about to make choice of their men, one from the sea was heard to call 'em with this charm, sung by a tenor voice.

[9] Imprint the land with their dancing feet. This is the call for the main masque dances.

[1] The women advanced in pairs holding fans to the audience: on one appeared both names; on the other, an allegorical symbol of their conjoined qualities.

[2] Emblems with mottoes.

[3] The meaning of the pairs' names and symbols, in order: abundance and splendor, fertility symbol; transparent and flexibility, a twenty-sided water symbol; swiftness and spotless, symbol of purity; moisture and coldness, symbol, the salamander who lives in fire unharmed; sweetness and delicacy, symbol of education; weight and revolving, symbol, the earth's globe. The women are members of Queen Anne's court, two of them notable in literary circles: Donne and Jonson wrote poems about Lucy, countess of Bedford (see Jonson, p. 1430); Lady Mary Wroth wrote poems and a romance (p. 1453), and see Jonson's poem on Wroth, p. 1438.

[4] A solid with twenty plane faces.

We shall have more cause to fear
Sirens of the land, than they[5]

Here they danced with their men several measures and corantos.[6] All which ended, they were again accited[7] to sea, with a song of two trebles, whose cadences were iterated by a double echo from several parts of the land.

SONG

Daughters of the subtle flood,
Do not let earth longer entertain you;
1st ECHO Let earth longer entertain you
2nd ECHO Longer entertain you

Tis to them enough of good
That you give this little hope to gain you.
1st ECHO Give this little hope to gain you.
2nd ECHO Little hope to gain you.

If they love
You shall quickly see;
For when to flight you move,
They'll follow you, the more you flee.
1st ECHO Follow you, the more you flee.
2nd ECHO The more you flee.

If not, impute it each to other's matter;
They are but earth—
1st ECHO But earth,
2nd ECHO Earth—
And what you vowed was water.
1st ECHO And what you vowed was water
2nd ECHO You vowed was water.

AETHIOPIA Enough, bright nymphs, the night grows old,
And we are grieved we cannot hold
You longer light; but comfort take.
Your father only to the lake
Shall make return; yourselves, with feasts,
Must here remain the Ocean's guests.
Nor shall this veil the sun hath cast
Above your blood, more summers last.
For which, you shall observe these rites:
Thirteen times thrice, on thirteen nights
(So often as I fill my sphere
With glorious light, throughout the year)
You shall, when all things else do sleep
Save your chaste thoughts, with reverence steep

[5] In Greek mythology the sirens lured seafarers to destruction.

[6] Slow and fast dances,

[7] Summoned.

Your bodies in that purer brine
And wholesome dew, called rosmarine;
Then with that soft and gentler foam,
Of which the ocean yet yields some,
Whereof bright Venus, beauty's queen,
Is said to have begotten been,
You shall your gentler limbs o'er-lave,
And for your pains, perfection have.
So that, this night, the year gone round,
You do again salute this ground;[8]
And in the beams of yond' bright sun
Your faces dry, and all is done.

At which, in a dance they returned to the sea, where they took their shell, and with this full song, went out.

Now Dian,° with her burning face, the moon
Declines apace:
By which our waters know
To ebb, that late° did flow. recently
Back seas, back nymphs, but with a forward grace
Keep still your reverence to the place,
And shout with joy of favor you have won,
In sight of Albion, Neptune's son.

Volpone This dark satire on human rapacity is set in Venice, but its true target is the city of London, or the city that, Jonson feared, London was about to become. It is a place devoted to commerce and mired in corruption, populated by greedy fools and conniving rascals. Like Shakespeare, Donne, and Thomas More before him, Jonson was deeply disturbed by the rise of a protocapitalist economic order that seemed to emphasize competition and the acquisition of material goods over reciprocal goodwill and mutual obligation. On the other hand, Jonson was also fascinated by the entrepreneurial potential liberated by the new economic order. His protagonists, Volpone and Mosca, may be morally bankrupt, but they are also the most intelligent, adaptable characters in the play. Moreover, although Jonson was a strong advocate for the educational and morally improving potential of the theater—his theater in particular—the talents of his main characters are essentially those of theatrical performance and improvisation. In fact, as Jonson was well aware, he was himself deeply implicated in what he satirized. The lowborn, unscrupulous, brilliantly inventive Mosca, a flattering aristocratic hanger-on who aspires to high status himself, at times seems to be the author's evil twin. Perhaps his very resemblances to Jonson required Jonson so energetically to repudiate his motives and punish his presumption at the end of the play.

Volpone combines elements from several sources. The classical satirist Lucian provided the theme of the rich old man playing with moneygrubbing scoundrels who hope to inherit his wealth. Roman comedy provided prototypes for some characters: the wily parasite, the unscrupulous lawyer, the avaricious dotard, the voluble woman. Some scenes, such as that in which Volpone disguised as a mountebank woos Celia at her window, are drawn from the Italian commedia dell'arte. Jonson draws as well upon ancient and medieval beast fables: stories about the crafty antihero Reynard the fox, as well as a fable about a fox that plays dead in order to catch greedy birds. But Volpone is much more than the sum of its borrowings. It is a work of enormous comic energy, full of black humor, which holds its loathsome characters up for appalled but gleeful inspection.

[8] Jonson had probably already planned the Masque of Beauty, in which the women's black skins are turned white, but intervening masques prevented its production until 1608.

Volpone was first performed by the King's Men (Shakespeare's company) in the spring of 1606, at the Globe Theater. (See the illustration, in the appendices to this volume, of a contemporary popular theater constructed on similar lines.) The Globe seated some two thousand persons—aristocrats and prosperous citizens in the tiered galleries, lower-class "groundlings" in the pit in the front of the stage. The play was also performed to great applause before learned audiences at Oxford and Cambridge, to whom Jonson dedicated the printed edition of Volpone. It was first published in quarto form in 1607 and republished with a few changes in the 1616 Works, the basis for the present text.

The Persons of the Play
[1] Many of the characters have allegorically apt names. "Volpone" is defined in John Florio's 1598 Italian-English dictionary as "an old fox . . . a sneaking, lurking, wily deceiver." "Mosca" means "fly." "Nano" means "dwarf." "Voltore" means "vulture." "Corbaccio" means "raven." "Bonario" is derived from bono, meaning "good." "Corvino" means "crow." "Celia" means "heaven." "Politic" means "worldly-wise" or "temporizing." "Peregrine" means "traveler" or "small hawk." In many performances the symbolism of the animal names is reinforced by costuming.

And so presents quick° comedy, refined lively
As best critics have designed.

The Argument

[1] Plot summary. Jonson imitates the acrostic "arguments" of the Latin playwright Plautus.

Prologue

[1] Rule, as laid down by Horace, that the poet ought both to please his audience and teach it something useful.

[2] Thomas Dekker ridiculed the slow pace at which Jonson produced new work in Satiromastix, or The Untrussing of the Humorous Poet (1602), and John Marston did the same in The Dutch Courtesan (1605).

[3] The satirist John Marston, in a line Jonson had previously ridiculed, boasted: "let custards [cowards] quake, my rage must freely run." Huge custards were a staple feature of city feasts.

[4] As might win approval from lunatics (who inhabited Bethlehem hospital in London).

[5] He observes the unities of time and place and the consistency of character.

From no needful rule he swerveth.
All gall and copperas[6] from his ink he draineth;
Only a little salt[7] remaineth
Wherewith he'll rub your cheeks, till, red with laughter,
They shall look fresh a week after.

[Enter] VOLPONE [and] MOSCA.[1]

Show'st like a flame by night, or like the day
Struck out of chaos, when all darkness fled
Unto the center.° O thou son of Sol[4]— center of the earth
But brighter than thy father—let me kiss
With adoration thee and every relic
Of sacred treasure in this blessed room.
Well did wise poets by thy glorious name
Title that age which they would have the best,[5]
Thou being the best of things, and far transcending
All style of joy in children, parents, friends,
Or any other waking dream on earth.
Thy looks when they to Venus did ascribe,
They should have giv'n her twenty thousand Cupids,[6]
Such are thy beauties and our loves.° Dear saint, our love of thee
Riches, the dumb god, that giv'st all men tongues,
That canst do naught and yet mak'st men do all things,
The price of souls; even hell, with thee to boot,° in the bargain
Is made worth heaven! Thou art virtue, fame,
Honor, and all things else. Who° can get thee, Whoever
He shall be noble, valiant, honest, wise—
MOSCA And what he will, sir. Riches are in fortune
A greater good than wisdom is in nature.
VOLPONE True, my beloved Mosca. Yet I glory
More in the cunning purchase° of my wealth acquisition
Than in the glad possession, since I gain

6. Ferrous sulfate, like gall a corrosive substance used in ink.
7. A traditional metaphor for satiric wit.

1.1
1. Alternatively, the play may begin with Volpone rising from his onstage bed.
2. The treasure is probably hidden behind a curtain in the alcove at the back of the stage.
3. Aries, the constellation ascendant in early spring.
4. Alchemists believed gold to have issued from the sun ("Sol"). Volpone blasphemously applies this metaphor to God's creation of the world in Genesis.
5. The mythical Golden Age (when, ironically, gold was not yet in use) was influentially described by Ovid in The Metamorphoses.
6. In Latin poetry, Venus was commonly described as aurea, meaning "golden." The throng of Cupids Volpone imagines around her suggests gold's irresistible, and for him highly sexual, appeal.

No common way. I use no trade, no venture;[0] risky commerce
I wound no earth with plowshares; fat no beasts
To feed the shambles;[0] have no mills for iron, slaughterhouse
Oil, corn, or men, to grind 'em into powder;
I blow no subtle[7] glass; expose no ships
To threat'nings of the furrow-faced sea;
I turn[0] no moneys in the public bank, exchange
Nor usure[0] private— lend money at interest
MOSCA No, sir, nor devour
Soft prodigals. You shall ha' some will swallow
A melting[0] heir as glibly as your Dutch financially dwindling
Will pills[0] of butter, and ne'er purge for't;[8] morsels
Tear forth the fathers of poor families
Out of their beds and coffin them alive
In some kind, clasping[0] prison, where their bones manacling
May be forthcoming[0] when the flesh is rotten. protruding; carted away
But your sweet nature doth abhor these courses;
You loathe the widow's or the orphan's tears
Should wash your pavements, or their piteous cries
Ring in your roofs and beat the air for vengeance.
VOLPONE Right, Mosca, I do loathe it.
MOSCA And besides, sir,
You are not like the thresher that doth stand
With a huge flail, watching a heap of corn,
And, hungry, dares not taste the smallest grain,
But feeds on mallows[0] and such bitter herbs; unpalatable weeds
Nor like the merchant who hath filled his vaults
With Romagnia and rich Candian wines,
Yet drinks the lees of Lombard's vinegar.[9]
You will not lie in straw whilst moths and worms
Feed on your sumptuous hangings[0] and soft beds. bed curtains
You know the use of riches, and dare give now
From that bright heap to me, your poor observer,[0] follower
Or to your dwarf, or your hermaphrodite,
Your eunuch, or what other household[0] trifle menial
Your pleasure allows maint'nance[0]—
VOLPONE [giving money] Hold thee, Mosca,
Take of my hand; thou strik'st on truth in all, You're pleased to support
And they are envious term[0] thee parasite.
Call forth my dwarf, my eunuch, and my fool,
And let 'em make me sport. [Exit MOSCA.] who term
What should I do
But cocker up my genius,[0] and live free indulge my appetite
To all delights my fortune calls me to?
I have no wife, no parent, child, ally
To give my substance to, but whom I make[0] he whom I designate
Must be my heir, and this makes men observe[0] me. flatter

---

[7] (1) Delicate; (2) artful. (Venice was and is renowned for its art glass.)

[8] Never use a remedy for gastric distress. (The Dutch were notoriously fond of butter.)

[9] Romagnia and rich Candian wines are expensive wines from Greece and Crete. The lees of Lombard's vinegar are the dregs of cheap Italian wine.

This draws new clients° daily to my house, petitioners
Women and men of every sex and age,
That bring me presents, send me plate,° coin, jewels, gold or silver plate
With hope that when I die—which they expect
Each greedy minute—it shall then return
Tenfold upon them; whilst some, covetous
Above the rest, seek to engross° me whole, swallow; monopolize
And counterwork,° the one unto the other, compete; undermine
Contend in gifts as they would seem in love;
All which I suffer, playing with their hopes,
And am content to coin 'em into profit,
And look upon their kindness and take more,
And look on that, still bearing them in hand,° leading them on
Letting the cherry knock against their lips,
And draw it by their mouths and back again.[1]—
How now!

SCENE 2. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA, NANO, ANDROGYNO, [and] CASTRONE.

NANO Now, room for fresh gamesters,° who do will you to know entertainers
They do bring you neither play nor university show,[1]
And therefore do entreat you that whatsoever they rehearse
May not fare a whit the worse for the false pace of the verse.[2]
If you wonder at this, you will wonder more ere we pass,
For know here [indicating ANDROGYNO] is enclosed the soul of Pythagoras,[3]
That juggler° divine, as hereafter shall follow; trickster
Which soul (fast and loose, sir) came first from Apollo,
And was breathed into Aethalides,[4] Mercurius his° son, Mercury's
Where it had the gift to remember all that ever was done.
From thence it fled forth and made quick transmigration
To goldilocked Euphorbus,[5] who was killed in good fashion
At the siege of old Troy, by the cuckold of Sparta.[6]
Hermotimus[7] was next—I find it in my charta°— record
To whom it did pass, where no sooner it was missing
But with one Pyrrhus of Delos° it learned to go a-fishing; another philosopher
And thence did it enter the Sophist of Greece.° Pythagoras
From Pythagore she went into a beautiful piece° slut
Hight° Aspasia the meretrix;[8] and the next toss of her named

1.2

1. University students performed classical plays or their imitations to hone their abilities in Latin oratory.
2. The four-stress meter of the skit Nano, Androgyno, and Castrone here perform was common in medieval drama but old-fashioned by Jonson's time.
3. Ancient Greek philosopher, mathematician, and music theorist who believed in the transmigration of souls and in the mystical properties of geometrical relationships (especially triangles [triangles = trigon]). His followers observed strict dietary restrictions and took five-year vows of silence. His thigh was rumored to be made of gold. Jonson adapts much of the career of Pythagoras's soul from The Dialogue of the Cobbler and the Cock, by the Greek satirist Lucian.
4. The herald of the Greek Argonauts and son of the god Mercury, who inherited his father's divine gift of memory. Thus, unlike other souls, which forget their previous lives, Aethalides' soul can recall its transmigrations.
5. Trojan youth who injured Achilles' beloved friend, Patroclus, in the Iliad.
6. Menelaus, the Spartan king whose wife, Helen, was stolen by the Trojan prince Paris.
7. Greek philosopher of about 500 B.C.E.
8. Whore. Aspasia was the mistress of the Athenian statesman Pericles.

Was again of a whore; she became a philosopher,
Crates the Cynic,[9] as itself doth relate it.
Since,° kings, knights, and beggars, knaves, lords, and fools since then gat° it, received
Besides ox and ass, camel, mule, goat, and brock,° badger
In all which it hath spoke as in the cobbler's cock.[1]
But I come not here to discourse of that matter,
Or his one, two, or three, or his great oath, "By quater,"[2]
His musics, his trigon, his golden thigh,° see n. 3, p. J339
Or his telling how elements° shift; but I earth, air, fire, water
Would ask how of late thou hast suffered translation,° metamorphosis
And shifted thy coat in these days of reformation?° religious change
ANDROGYNO Like one of the reformed, a fool,[3] as you see,
Counting all old doctrine heresy.
NANO But not on thine own forbid meats hast thou ventured?
ANDROGYNO On fish, when first a Carthusian I entered.[4]
NANO Why, then thy dogmatical silence° hath left thee? vow of silence
ANDROGYNO Of that an obstreperous lawyer bereft me.
NANO Oh, wonderful change! When Sir Lawyer forsook thee,
For Pythagore's sake, what body then took thee?
ANDROGYNO A good dull mule.
NANO And how, by that means,
Thou wert brought to allow of the eating of beans?
ANDROGYNO Yes.
NANO But from the mule into whom didst thou pass?
ANDROGYNO Into a very strange beast, by some writers called an
By others a precise, pure, illuminate brother[5]
Of those devour flesh and sometimes one another,° prey on each other
And will drop you forth a libel° or a sanctified lie polemic
Betwixt every spoonful of a Nativity pie.[6]
NANO Now quit thee, for heaven, of that profane nation,°
And gently report thy next transmigration.
ANDROGYNO TO the same that I am." what I am now
NANO A creature of delight?
And—what is more than a fool—an hermaphrodite?
Now pray thee, sweet soul, in all thy variation° of all your shapes
Which body wouldst thou choose to take up thy station?
ANDROGYNO Troth, this I am in, even here would I tarry.
NANO 'Cause here the delight of each sex thou canst vary?
ANDROGYNO Alas, those pleasures be stale and forsaken.
No, 'tis your fool wherewith I am so taken,
The only one creature that I can call blessed,
For all other forms I have proved° most distressed. found to be

[9] Student of Diogenes, founder of the Cynic philosophy.

[1] The speaker in Lucian's dialogue (see note 3 above).

[2] A quater is an equilateral triangle the sides of which are evenly divisible by four.

[3] The "reformed" are Protestants in general, but more specifically the Puritan wing of the Church of England. Jonson was a Catholic when he wrote Volpone.

[4] Pythagoreans abstained from fish, but Carthusians, an order of Catholic monks, ate fish on fast days.

[5] Puritan who claimed immediate, visionary knowledge of religious truth. Puritans did not observe the traditional fasting days (hence "devour flesh" in the following line).

[6] Puritans substituted the term "Nativity" for "Christmas," to avoid reference to the Mass.

NANO Spoke true, as thou wert in Pythagoras still.
This learned opinion we celebrate will,
Fellow eunuch, as behooves us, with all our wit and art,
To dignify that° whereof ourselves are so great and special a part. folly
VOLPONE [applauding] Now, very, very pretty! Mosca, this Was thy invention?
MOSCA If it please my patron,
Not else.
VOLPONE It doth, good Mosca.
MOSCA Then it was, sir.

SONG

NANO and CASTRONE [sing]
Fools, they are the only nation° group
Worth men's envy or admiration,
Free from care or sorrow-taking,
Selves° and others merry making; Themselves
All they speak or do is sterling.
Your fool, he is your great man's dearling,
And your lady's sport and pleasure;
Tongue and bauble° are his treasure. fool's staff; penis
E'en his face begetteth laughter,
And he speaks truth free from slaughter.° with impunity
He's the grace of every feast,
And sometimes the chiefest guest,
Hath his trencher° and his stool, platter
When wit waits upon the fool.
Oh, who would not be
He, he, he? One knocks without.
VOLPONE Who's that? Away!
[Exeunt NANO and CASTRONE.]
Look, Mosca.
MOSCA Fool, begone!
[Exit ANDROGYNO.]
'Tis Signor Voltore, the advocate;
I know him by his knock.
VOLPONE Fetch me my gown,
My furs, and nightcaps; say my couch is changing,[7]
And let him entertain himself awhile
Without i'th'gallery. [Exit MOSCA.]
Now, now, my clients
Begin their visitation! Vulture, kite,
Raven, and gorcrow,° all my birds of prey carrion crow
That think me turning carcass, now they come.
I am not for 'em° yet. ready to die
[Enter MOSCA.]
How now? The news?
MOSCA A piece of plate,° sir. gold platter
VOLPONE Of what bigness?

---

[7] My bedsheets are being changed.

MOSCA Huge,
Massy, and antique, with your name inscribed
And arms° engraven. coat of arms
VOLPONE Good! And not a fox
Stretched on the earth, with fine delusive sleights° deceptive tricks
Mocking a gaping crow?[8] Ha, Mosca?
MOSCA [laughing] Sharp, sir.
VOLPONE Give me my furs. Why dost thou laugh so, man?
MOSCA I cannot choose, sir, when I apprehend
What thoughts he has, without,° now, as he walks: outside
That this might be the last gift he should° give; would have to
That this would fetch you;° if you died today bring you around
And gave him all, what he should be tomorrow;
What large return would come of all his ventures;
How he should worshipped be and reverenced;
Ride with his furs and footcloths,[9] waited on
By herds of fools and clients; have clear way
Made for his mule, as lettered° as himself; educated
Be called the great and learned advocate;
And then concludes there's naught impossible.
VOLPONE Yes, to be learned, Mosca.
MOSCA Oh, no, rich
Implies it.° Hood an ass with reverend purple,[1] wealth implies learning
So you can hide his two ambitious° ears, aspiring; upraised
And he shall pass for a cathedral doctor.° Doctor of Divinity
VOLPONE My caps, my caps, good Mosca. Fetch him in.
MOSCA Stay, sir, your ointment for your eyes.
[MOSCA helps VOLPONE with his disguise.]
VOLPONE That's true.
Dispatch, dispatch! I long to have possession
Of my new present.
MOSCA That, and thousands more
I hope to see you lord of.
VOLPONE Thanks, land Mosca.
MOSCA And that, when I am lost in blended dust,
And hundred such as I am in succession—
VOLPONE Nay, that were too much, Mosca.
MOSCA —you shall live
Still, to delude these Harpies.[2]
VOLPONE Loving Mosca!
'Tis well. My pillow now, and let him enter.
[Exit MOSCA. VOLPONE lies down.]
Now, my feigned cough, my phthisic,° and my gout, consumption; asthma
My apoplexy, palsy, and catarrhs,° mucus discharges
Help with your forced functions this my posture,° imposture

[2] Mythological ravenous monsters with women's heads and the bodies and claws of birds.

Wherein this three year I have milked their hopes.
He comes, I hear him. [Coughing] Uh, uh, uh, uh! Oh—

SCENE 3. The scene continues.

[Enter] VOLTORE [with a platter, ushered by] MOSCA.

MOSCA [to VOLTORE] YOU still are what you were, sir. Only you,
Of all the rest, are he commands° his love; the one who possesses
And you do wisely to preserve it thus
With early visitation and kind notes° tokens
Of your good meaning to° him, which, I know, intentions toward Cannot but come most grateful. [Loudly, to VOLPONE] Patron, sir!
Here's Signor Voltore is come—
VOLPONE [weakly] What say you?
MOSCA Sir, Signor Voltore is come this morning
To visit you.
VOLPONE I thank him.
MOSCA And hath brought
A piece of antique plate bought of Saint Mark,[1]
With which he here presents you.
VOLPONE He is welcome.
Pray him to come more often.
MOSCA Yes.
VOLPONE [straining to hear] What says he?
MOSCA He thanks you, and desires you see him often.
VOLPONE Mosca.
MOSCA My patron?
VOLPONE [groping] Bring him near. Where is he?
I long to feel his hand.
MOSCA [guiding VOLPONE's hands toward the platter] The plate is here, sir.
VOLTORE HOW fare you, sir?
VOLPONE I thank you, Signor Voltore.
Where is the plate? Mine eyes are bad.
VOLTORE [relinquishing the platter] I'm sorry
To see you still thus weak.
MOSCA [aside] That he is not weaker.
VOLPONE YOU are too munificent.
VOLTORE NO, sir, would to heaven
I could as well give health to you as that plate.
VOLPONE You give, sir, what you can. I thank you. Your love Hath taste in° this, and shall not be unanswered. is suggested by
I pray you see me often.
VOLTORE Yes, I shall, sir.
VOLPONE Be not far from me.
MOSCA [aside to VOLTORE] DO you observe that, sir?
VOLPONE Hearken unto me still. It will concern you.
MOSCA [aside to VOLTORE] YOU are a happy man, sir. Know your good.
VOLPONE I cannot now last long—

1.3
[1] Goldsmiths kept shop in the square of Saint Mark's Basilica.

MOSCA (aside to VOLTORE) You are his heir, sir.
VOLTORE (aside to MOSCA) Am I?
VOLPONE I feel me going, uh, uh, uh, uh!
I am sailing to my port, uh, uh, uh, uh!
And I am glad I am so near my haven.
[He pretends to lapse into unconsciousness.]
MOSCA Alas, kind gentleman! Well, we must all go—
VOLTORE But Mosca—
MOSCA Age will conquer.
VOLTORE Pray thee, hear me.
Am I inscribed his heir for certain?
MOSCA Are you?
I do beseech you, sir, you will vouchsafe
To write me i'your family.[2] All my hopes
Depend upon Your Worship. I am lost
Except° the rising sun do shine on me. unless
VOLTORE It shall both shine and warm thee, Mosca.
MOSCA Sir,
I am a man that have not done your love
All the worst offices:° here I wear your keys, services
See all your coffers and your caskets locked,
Keep the poor inventory of your jewels,
Your plate, and moneys, am your steward, sir,
Husband your goods here.
VOLTORE But am I sole heir?
MOSCA Without a partner, sir, confirmed this morning;
The wax° is warm yet, and the ink scarce dry of the seal
Upon the parchment.
VOLTORE Happy, happy me!
By what good chance, sweet Mosca?
MOSCA Your desert, sir;
I know no second cause.
VOLTORE Thy modesty
Is loath to know it.° Well, we shall requite it. admit your role
MOSCA He ever liked your course, sir; that first took him.
I oft have heard him say how he admired
Men of your large[3] profession, that could speak
To every cause, and things mere contraries,° utterly contradictory
Till they were hoarse again, yet all be law;
That with most quick agility could turn
And re-turn, make knots and undo them,
Give forked° counsel, take provoking gold ambiguous
On either hand, and put it up:[4] these men,
He knew, would thrive with their humility.° obsequiousness
And for his part, he thought he should be blessed
To have his heir of such a suffering° spirit, long-suffering
So wise, so grave, of so perplexed° a tongue, bewildering

---

[2] Employ me in your household (after Volpone's death).
[3] Expansive, liberal (with the suggestion of "unscrupulous").
[4] Take a bribe from each party to a suit and pocket it.

And loud withal,° that would not wag nor scarce — besides
Lie still without a fee, when every word
Your Worship but lets fall is a cecchine!° Another knocks. — gold coin
Who's that? One knocks; I would not have you seen, sir.
And yet—pretend you came and went in haste;
I'll fashion an excuse. And, gentle sir,
When you do come to swim in golden lard,
Up to the arms in honey, that your chin
Is born up stiff with fatness of the flood,
Think on your vassal; but° remember me. — only
I ha' not been your worst of clients.
VOLTORE Mosca—
MOSCA When will you have your inventory brought, sir?
Or see a copy of the will? [More knocking.] Anon!°— — Just a minute!
I'll bring em to you, sir. Away, begone,
Put business i'your face.[5] [Exit VOLTORE.]
VOLPONE Excellent, Mosca!
Come hither, let me kiss thee.
MOSCA Keep you still, sir.
Here is Corbaccio.
VOLHONE Set the plate away.
The vulture's gone, and the old raven's come.

SCENE 4. The scene continues.

MOSCA [to VOLPONE] Betake you to your silence and your sleep;
[He puts up the plate.]
Stand there and multiply.°—Now shall we see — beget more booty
A wretch who is indeed more impotent
Than this° can feign to be, yet hopes to hop — Volpone
Over his grave.
[Enter] CORBACCIO.
Signor Corbaccio!
You're very welcome, sir.
CORBACCIO How does your patron?
MOSCA Troth, as he did, sir: no amends.
CORBACCIO What? Mends he?
MOSCA NO, sir, he is rather worse.
CORBACCIO That's well. Where is he?
MOSCA Upon his couch, sir, newly fall'n asleep.
CORBACCIO Does he sleep well?
MOSCA NO wink, sir, all this night,
Nor yesterday, but slumbers.° — dozes fitfully
CORBACCIO Good! He should take
Some counsel of physicians. I have brought him
An opiate here, from mine own doctor—
MOSCA He will not hear of drugs.
CORBACCIO Why, I myself
Stood by while't was made, saw all th'ingredients,

---

[5] Look as if you were here on business.

And know it cannot but most gently work.
My life for his, 'tis but to make him sleep.
VOLPONE [aside] Ay, his last sleep, if he would take it.
MOSCA Sir,
He has no faith in physic.° medicine
CORBACCIO 'Say you? 'Say you?
MOSCA He has no faith in physic. He does think
Most of your doctors[1] are the greater danger
And worse disease t'escape. I often have Heard him protest that your physician
Should never be his heir.
CORBACCIO Not I his heir?
MOSCA Not your physician, sir.
CORBACCIO Oh, no, no, no,
I do not mean it.
MOSCA No, sir, nor their fees
He cannot brook.° He says they flay° a man tolerate / skin
Before they kill him.
CORBACCIO Right, I do conceive° you. understand
MOSCA And then, they do it by experiment,[2]
For which the law not only doth absolve 'em,
But gives them great reward; and he is loath
To hire his death so.
CORBACCIO It is true, they kill
With as much license as a judge.
MOSCA Nay, more:
For he° but kills, sir, where the law condemns, the judge
And these° can kill him,° too. the doctors / the judge
CORBACCIO Ay, or me
Or any man. How does his apoplex?° apoplexy, stroke
Is that strong on him still?
MOSCA Most violent.[3]
His speech is broken and his eyes are set,° fixed
His face drawn longer than 'twas wont—
CORBACCIO How? How?
Stronger than he was wont?
MOSCA No, sir: his face
Drawn longer than 'twas wont.
CORBACCIO Oh, good.
MOSCA His mouth
Is ever gaping, and his eyelids hang.
CORBACCIO Good.
MOSCA A freezing numbness stiffens all his joints,
And makes the color of his flesh like lead.
CORBACCIO 'Tis good.
MOSCA His pulse beats slow and dull.
CORBACCIO Good symptoms still.

1.4
[1] Not Corbaccio's doctors, but doctors generally. (Also in line 23.)
[2] By testing possible remedies on their patients.
[3] In the following lines, Mosca attributes to Volpone a wide variety of symptoms that were, even occurring singly, considered sure signs of impending death.

MOSCA And from his brain—
CORBACCIO Ha? How? Not from his brain?
MOSCA Yes, sir, and from his brain—
CORBACCIO I conceive you, good.
MOSCA —Flows a cold sweat with a continual rheum° mucus discharge
Forth the resolved° corners of his eyes. watery; limp
CORBACCIO Is't possible? Yet I am better, ha!
How does he with the swimming of his head?
MOSCA Oh, sir, 'tis past the scotomy;[4] he now
Hath lost his feeling, and hath left to snort;° stopped snoring
You hardly can perceive him that he breathes.
CORBACCIO Excellent, excellent. Sure I shall outlast him!
This makes me young again a score of years.
MOSCA I was a-coming for you, sir,
CORBACCIO Has he made his will?
What has he giv'n me?
MOSCA No, sir.
CORBACCIO Nothing? Ha?
MOSCA He has not made his will, sir.
CORBACCIO Oh, oh, oh.
What then did Voltore, the lawyer, here?
MOSCA He smelt a carcass, sir, when he but heard
My master was about his testament°— making his will
As I did urge him to it, for your good—
CORBACCIO He came unto him, did he? I thought so.
MOSCA Yes, and presented him this piece of plate.
CORBACCIO To be his heir?
MOSCA I do not know, sir.
CORBACCIO True,
I know it too.
MOSCA [aside] By your own scale,° sir. scale of values
CORBACCIO [showing a bag of gold] Well,
I shall prevent° him yet. See, Mosca, look, forestall
Here I have brought a bag of bright cecchines,
Will quite weigh down his plate.
MOSCA Yea, marry, sir!
This is true physic, this your sacred medicine;
No talk of opiates to° this great elixir.[5] compared to
CORBACCIO Tis aurum palpabile, if not potabile.[6]
MOSCA It shall be ministered to him in his bowl?
CORBACCIO Ay, do, do, do.
MOSCA Most blessed cordial!° heart medicine
This will recover him.
CORBACCIO Yes, do, do, do.
MOSCA I think it were not best, sir.
CORBACCIO What?
MOSCA To recover him.

[4] Dizziness, accompanied by partial blindness.

[5] In alchemy, a liquid thought to be capable of prolonging life indefinitely or changing base metal into gold.

[6] It is gold that can be felt, if not drunk. (Latin.) Dissolved gold was used as a medicine.

CORBACCIO Oh, no, no, no; by no means.
MOSCA Why, sir, this
Will work some strange effect, if he but feel it.
CORBACCIO Tis true, therefore forbear, I'll take my venture.[0] investment
Give me't again. [He snatches for the hag.]
MOSCA [keeping it out of his reach] At no hand.[0] Pardon me, By no means
You shall not do yourself that wrong, sir. I
Will so advise you, you shall have it all.
CORBACCIO HOW?
MOSCA All, sir, 'tis your right, your own; no man
Can claim a part. 'Tis yours without a rival,
Decreed by destiny.
CORBACCIO HOW? HOW, good Mosca?
MOSCA I'll tell you, sir. This fit he shall recover—
CORBACCIO I do conceive you.
MOSCA —and, on first advantage[0] opportunity
Of his gained sense, will I re-importune him
Unto the making of his testament,
And show him this.
CORBACCIO Good, good.
MOSCA 'Tis better yet,
If you will hear, sir.
CORBACCIO Yes, with all my heart.
MOSCA NOW, would I counsel you, make home with speed;
There frame a will, whereto you shall inscribe
My master your sole heir.
CORBACCIO And disinherit
My son?
MOSCA Oh, sir, the better, for that color[0] appearance, fiction
Shall make it much more taking.[0] plausible; attractive
CORBACCIO Oh, but color?[0] it's only a ruse?
MOSCA This will, sir, you shall send it unto me.
Now, when I come to enforce[0]—as I will do— urge
Your cares, your watchings, and your many prayers,
Your more than many gifts, your this day's present,
And last produce your will, where—without thought
Or least regard unto your proper issue,[0] own offspring
A son so brave[0] and highly meriting— splendid
The stream of your diverted love hath thrown you
Upon my master, and made him your heir,
He cannot be so stupid or stone dead
But out of conscience and mere gratitude—
CORBACCIO He must pronounce me his?
MOSCA 'Tis true.
CORBACCIO This plot
Did I think on before.
MOSCA I do believe it.
CORBACCIO DO you not believe it?
MOSCA Yes, sir.
CORBACCIO Mine own project.
MOSCA Which when he hath done, sir—

CORBACCIO Published me his heir?
MOSCA And you so certain to survive him—
CORBACCIO Ay.
MOSCA Being so lusty a man—
CORBACCIO 'Tis true.
MOSCA Yes, sir—
CORBACCIO I thought on that too. See how he° should be Mosca
The very organ to express my thoughts!
MOSCA YOU have not only done yourself a good—
CORBACCIO But multiplied it on my son?
MOSCA Tis right, sir.
CORBACCIO Still my invention.
MOSCA 'Las, sir, heaven knows,
It hath been all my study, all my care,
(I e'en grow gray withal) how to work things—
CORBACCIO I do conceive, sweet Mosca.
MOSCA YOU are he
For whom I labor here.
CORBACCIO Ay, do, do, do.
I'll straight about it. [CORRACCIO starts to leave.]
MOSCA Rook go with you,[7] raven!
CORBACCIO I know thee honest.
MOSCA YOU do lie, sir—
CORBACCIO And—
MOSCA Your knowledge is no better than your ears, sir.
CORBACCIO I do not doubt to be a father to thee.
MOSCA Nor I to gull my brother of his blessing.[8]
CORBACCIO I may ha' my youth restored to me, why not?
MOSCA Your Worship is a precious ass—
CORBACCIO What say'st thou?
MOSCA I do desire Your Worship to make haste, sir.
CORBACCIO 'Tis done, 'tis done, I go. [Exit.]
VOLPONE [leaping from the bed] Oh, I shall burst!
Let out my sides,° let out my sides— Loosen my clothes
MOSCA Contain
Your flux of laughter, sir. You know this hope
Is such a bait it covers any hook.
VOLPONE Oh, but thy working and thy placing it!
I cannot hold;° good rascal, let me kiss thee. contain my delight
I never knew thee in so rare a humor.° so excellently witty
MOSCA Alas, sir, I but do as I am taught:
Follow your grave instructions, give 'em words,
Pour oil into their ears,° and send them hence. Flatter them
VOLPONE 'Tis true, 'tis true. What a rare punishment
Is avarice to itself![9]

[7] May you be swindled ("rooked"). Playing on "rook" meaning "crow," "raven." This speech and Mosca's following lines, through line 130, could be considered asides since Corbaccio cannot hear them; but they need not be delivered sotto voce.

[8] If Corbaccio were Mosca's father, then Bonario would be his brother. A reference to Genesis 25, in which Jacob tricks his elder brother, Esau, into resigning his birthright, and Genesis 27, in which Jacob tricks their dying father, Isaac, into giving him the paternal blessing and property.

[9] Quoting the Stoic philosopher Seneca's Moral Epistles, no. 115.

MOSCA Ay, with our help, sir.
VOLPONE SO many cares, so many maladies,
So many fears attending on old age,
Yea, death so often called on,° as no wish invoked
Can be more frequent with 'em, their limbs faint,
Their senses dull, their seeing, hearing, going,° ability to walk
All dead before them; yea, their very teeth,
Their instruments of eating, failing them—
Yet this is reckoned life! Nay, here was one
Is now gone home that wishes to live longer!
Feels not his gout nor palsy, feigns himself
Younger by scores of years, flatters his age
With confident belying it,[1] hopes he may
With charms, like Aeson,[2] have his youth restored,
And with these thoughts so battens,° as if fate gluts himself
Would be as easily cheated on as he,
And all turns air!° Another knocks. is illusory
Who's that there, now? A third?
MOSCA Close,° to your couch again. I hear his voice. Hide yourself
It is Corvino, our spruce° merchant. dapper
VOLPONE [lying down again] Dead.° I'll play dead
MOSCA Another bout, sir, with your eyes.
[He applies ointment.]
Who's there?

SCENE 5. The scene continues.

[Enter] CORVINO.

Signor Corvino! Come° most wished for! Oh, You come
How happy were you if you knew it now!
CORVINO Why? What? Wherein?
MOSCA The tardy hour is come, sir.
CORVINO He is not dead?
MOSCA Not dead, sir, but as good;
He knows no man.
CORVINO HOW shall I do, then?
MOSCA Why, sir?
CORVINO I have brought him here a pearl.
MOSCA Perhaps he has
So much remembrance left as to know you, sir;
He still calls on you; nothing but your name
Is in his mouth. Is your pearl orient,[1] sir?
CORVINO Venice was never owner of the like.
VOLPONE [weakly] Signor Corvino—
MOSCA Hark.
VOLPONE —Signor Corvino—
MOSCA He calls you. Step and give it him.—He's here, sir,
And he has brought you a rich pearl.

---

[1] Deceives himself, and attempts to deceive others, about his age by vigorously refusing to admit the truth.

[2] Father of the Greek hero Jason; his youth was restored by Medea, his sorceress daughter-in-law.

1.5

[1] Especially brilliant. (The most beautiful pearls came from the Indian Ocean.)

CORVINO [to VOLPONE] How do you, sir?
[To MOSCA] Tell him it doubles the twelfth carat.[2]
[He gives VOLPONE the pearl.]
MOSCA [to CORVINO] Sir,
He cannot understand. His hearing's gone;
And yet it comforts him to see you—
CORVINO Say
I have a diamond for him too.
MOSCA Best show't, sir.
Put it into his hand; 'tis only there
He apprehends; he has his feeling yet.
[CORVINO gives VOLPONE the diamond.]
See how he grasps it!
CORVINO Las, good gentleman!
How pitiful the sight is!
MOSCA Tut, forget, sir.
The weeping of an heir should still° be laughter always
Under a Visor. mask
CORVINO Why, am I his heir?
MOSCA Sir, I am sworn; I may not show the will Till he be dead. But here has been Corbaccio,
Here has been Voltore, here were others too,
I cannot number 'em they were so many,
All gaping here for legacies; but I,
Taking the vantage° of his naming you— opportunity
"Signor Corvino! Signor Corvino!"—took
Paper and pen and ink, and there I asked him Whom he would have his heir? "Corvino." Who Should be executor? "Corvino." And
To any question he was silent to,
I still interpreted the nods he made
Through weakness for consent, and sent home th'others,
Nothing bequeathed them but to cry and curse.
CORVINO Oh, my dear Mosca! (They embrace.) Does he not perceive us?
MOSCA NO more than a blind harper.[3] He knows no man,
No face of friend, nor name of any servant,
Who 'twas that fed him last or gave him drink;
Not those he hath begotten or brought up
Can he remember.
CORVINO Has he children?
MOSCA Bastards,[4]
Some dozen or more, that he begot on beggars,
Gypsies and Jews and blackmoors,° when he was drunk. black Africans
Knew you not that, sir? 'Tis the common fable.° rumor
The dwarf, the fool, the eunuch are all his;
He's the true father of his family
In all save° me, but he has given em nothing. except

---

[2] In the seventeenth century, a carat was between 1/144 and 1/150 of an ounce. A twentv-four-carat pearl was therefore very large, weighing roughly 1/6 of an ounce.

[3] Harp players were often blind.

[4] By law, ordinarily barred from the line of inheritance.

CORVINO That's well, that's well. Art sure he does not hear us?
MOSCA Sure, sir? Why, look you, credit your own sense.° believe your senses
[Shouting at VOLPONE] The pox° approach and add to your diseases syphilis
If it would send you hence the sooner, sir.
For your incontinence, it hath deserved it
Throughly° and throughly, and the plague to boot. thoroughly
[To CORVINO] YOU may come near, sir. [Shouting at VOLPONE again]
Would you would once close
Those filthy eyes of yours, that flow with slime
Like two frog-pits,° and those same hanging cheeks, mud puddles
Covered with hide instead of skin—nay, help, sir—
That look like frozen dishclouts° set on end! dishrags
CORVINO [shouting at VOLPONE] Or like an old smoked wall on which the rain
Ran down in streaks!
MOSCA Excellent, sir! Speak out;
You may be louder yet; a culverin° firearm
Discharged in his ear would hardly bore it.
CORVINO [shouting] His nose is like a common sewer, still° running. continually
MOSCA Tis good! And what his mouth?
CORVINO [shouting] A very draught!° cesspool
MOSCA Oh, stop it up—
CORVINO By no means.
MOSCA Pray you let me.
Faith, I could stifle him rarely with a pillow
As well as any woman that should keep° him. take care of CORVINO DO as you will, but I'll be gone.
MOSCA Be so;
It is your presence makes him last so long.
CORVINO I pray you, use no violence.
MOSCA No, sir? Why?
Why should you be thus scrupulous? Pray you, sir.
CORVINO Nay, at your discretion.
MOSCA Well, good sir, begone.
CORVINO I will not trouble him now to take my pearl?
MOSCA Pooh! Nor your diamond. What a needless care
Is this afflicts you? Is not all here yours?
Am not I here, whom you have made your creature?
That owe my being to you?
CORVINO Grateful Mosca!
Thou art my friend, my fellow, my companion,
My partner, and shalt share in all my fortunes.
MOSCA Excepting one.
CORVINO What's that?
MOSCA Your gallant° wife, sir. splendid
[Exit CORVINO.]
Now is he gone. We had no other means
To shoot him hence but this.
VOLPONE My divine Mosca!
Thou hast today outgone thyself. Another knocks.
Who's there?

I will be troubled with no more. Prepare
Me music, dances, banquets, all delights.
The Turk[5] is not more sensual in his pleasures
Than will Volpone. [Exit MOSCA.]
Let me see, a pearl?
A diamond? Plate? Cecchines? Good morning's purchase.° haul
Why, this is better than rob churches, yet,
Or fat by eating, once a month, a man." i.e., taking monthly interest
[Enter MOSCA.]
Who is't?
MOSCA The beauteous Lady Would-be, sir,
Wife to the English knight, Sir Politic Would-be—
This is the style, sir, is directed me[6]—
Hath sent to know how you have slept tonight,° last night
And if you would be visited.
VOLPONE Not now.
Some three hours hence—
MOSCA I told the squire° so much. messenger
VOLPONE When I am high with mirth and wine: then, then.
'Fore heaven, I wonder at the desperate° valor reckless
Of the bold English, that they dare let loose
Their wives to all encounters![7]
MOSCA Sir, this knight
Had not his name for nothing. He is politic,° canny
And knows, howe'er his wife affect strange° airs, foreign; bizarre
She hath not yet the face[8] to be dishonest.° unchaste
But had she Signor Corvino's wife's face—
VOLPONE Has she so rare a face?
MOSCA Oh, sir, the wonder,
The blazing star[9] of Italy! A wench
O'the first year!° A beauty ripe as harvest! unflawed and in her prime Whose skin is whiter than a swan, all over,
Than silver, snow, or lilies! A soft lip,
Would° tempt you to eternity of kissing! That would
And flesh that melteth in the touch to blood![1]
Bright as your gold, and lovely as your gold!
VOLPONE Why had not I known this before?
MOSCA Alas, sir,
Myself but yesterday discovered it.
VOLPONE HOW might I see her?
MOSCA Oh, not possible.
She's kept as warily as is your gold:
Never does come abroad,° never takes air outside
But at a window. All her looks are sweet
As the first° grapes or cherries, and are watched of the season

---

[5] Stereotyped as given to decadent luxuries.
[6] This is the mode of address I've been told to use.
[7] Married Englishwomen were reputed to enjoy more personal freedom than their southern European counterparts; Venetian wives in particular were much restricted, though Celia's situation is obviously extreme (see below, lines 118—26).
[8] (1) Beauty; (2) shamelessness.
[9] Comet. (Rare and beautiful.)
[1] (1) Blushes; (2) sexual responsiveness. (Mosca is evidently conjecturing here.)

As near° as they are. closely
VOLPONE I must see her—
MOSCA Sir,
There is a guard of ten spies thick upon her—
All his whole household—each of which is set
Upon his fellow, and have all their charge
When he goes out; when he comes in, examined.[2]
VOLPONE. I will go see her, though but at her window.
MOSCA In some disguise, then.
VOLPONE That is true. I must Maintain mine own shape still the same.[3] We'll think.
[Exeunt.]

Act 2

SCENE 1. Saint Mark's Square.

[Enter] POLITIC WOULD-BE [and] PEREGRINE,
POLITIC Sir, to a wise man all the world's his soil.[1]
It is not Italy, nor France, nor Europe
That must bound me if my fates call me forth.
Yet I protest it is no salt° desire inordinate
Of seeing countries, shifting a religion,[2]
Nor any disaffection to the state
Where I was bred—and unto which I owe
My dearest plots°—hath brought me out;° much less projects / abroad
That idle, antique, stale, gray-headed project
Of knowing men's minds and manners with Ulysses;[3]
But a peculiar humor° of my wife's whim
Laid for this height° of Venice, to observe, latitude
To quote,° to learn the language, and so forth.— jot things down
I hope you travel, sir, with license?[4]
PEREGRINE Yes.
POLITIC I dare the safelier converse. How long, sir,
Since you left England?
PEREGRINE Seven weeks.
POLITIC SO lately!
You ha' not been with my Lord Ambassador?
PEREGRINE Not yet, sir.
POLITIC Pray you, what news, sir, vents our climate?[5]
I heard last night a most strange thing reported
By some of my lord's° followers, and I long the ambassador's
To hear how't will be seconded.° confirmed
PEREGRINE What was't, sir?
POLITIC Marry, sir, of a raven that should build° reportedly built
In a ship royal of the King's.

---

[2] Each member of the household spies on all the others; each gets his instructions when Corvino departs and is interrogated when he returns.

[3] I must, in my own person, continue to pretend to be near death.

2.1

[1] Proverbial, like most of Sir Pol's "original" advice. "Soil": native land.

[2] Throughout the 16th and 17th centuries, members of religious minorities throughout Europe sought refuge in lands more hospitable to their faiths.

[3] The hero of the Odyssey, an archetype of the wise traveler.

[4] A passport. (English people could not travel abroad without permission.)

[5] Comes from our part of the world?

PEREGRINE [aside] This fellow,
Does he gulF me, trow?° Or is gulled?—Your name, sir? trick / do you suppose?
POLITIC My name is Politic Would-be.
PEREGRINE [aside] Oh, that speaks° him.— characterizes
A knight, sir?
POLITIC A poor knight, sir.[6]
PEREGRINE Your lady
Lies° here in Venice for intelligence° stays / news
Of tires° and fashions and behavior apparel
Among the courtesans?[7] The fine Lady Would-be?
POLITIC Yes, sir, the spider and the bee ofttimes
Suck from one flower.
PEREGRINE Good Sir Politic,
I cry you mercy!° I have heard much of you. heg your pardon
'Tis true, sir, of your raven.
POLITIC On your knowledge?
PEREGRINE Yes, and your lion's whelping in the Tower.[8]
POLITIC Another whelp!
PEREGRINE Another, sir.
POLITIC NOW, heaven!
What prodigies° be these? The fires at Berwick! strange occurrences
And the new star![9] These things concurring,° strange! happening together
And full of omen! Saw you those meteors?
PEREGRINE I did, sir.
POLITIC Fearful! Pray you sir, confirm me:
Were there three porpoises seen above the bridge,[1]
As they give out?° people report
PEREGRINE Six, and a sturgeon, sir.
POLITIC I am astonished!
PEREGRINE Nay, sir, be not so.
I'll tell you a greater prodigy than these—
POLITIC What should these things portend!
PEREGRINE The very day—
Let me be sure—that I put forth from London,
There was a whale discovered in the river
As high° as Woolwich,[2] that had waited there— far upstream
Few know how many months—for the subversion
Of the Stode Fleet.[3]
POLITIC Is't possible? Believe it,
'Twas either sent from Spain or the Archdukes.[4]
Spinola's[5] whale, upon my life, my credit!° honor
Will they not leave these projects? Worthy sir,
Some other news.

---

[6] In the first decade of the 17th century. King James I raised badly needed money by selling knighthoods to many whose birth, attainments, or wealth would not have previously merited a title.

[7] Venice was famous for its elegant prostitutes.

[8] A lioness kept at the Tower of London gave birth in 1604 and 1605.

[9] The fires at Berwick were aurora borealis visible above Berwick, Northumberland, in 1605, said to resemble battling armies. The new star, a supernova, was described bv the astronomer Johannes Kepler in 1604.

[1] A porpoise was found upstream of London Bridge in the Thames River the January before Volpone was first performed.

[2] A town on the Thames, a bit to the east of London.

[3] The English merchant adventurers' ships, which were harboring at Stade, in the mouth of the Elbe River.

[4] The Archduke Albert of Austria and his wife, Isabella, the Infanta of Spain, ruled the Netherlands in the name of Spain.

[5] Ambrosio de Spinola was general of the Spanish army in the Netherlands.

PEREGRINE Faith, Stone the fool is dead;
And they do lack a tavern-fool extremely.
POLITIC Is Mas' Stone dead?[6]
PEREGRINE He's dead, sir. Why, I hope
You thought him not immortal? [Aside] Oh, this knight,
Were he well known, would be a precious thing
To fit our English stage. He that should write
But such a fellow should be thought to feign
Extremely, if not maliciously.
POLITIC Stone dead!
PEREGRINE Dead. Lord, how deeply, sir, you apprehend it!
He was no kinsman to you?
POLITIC That° I know of. Not that
Well, that same fellow was an unknown fool.[7]
PEREGRINE And yet you knew him, it seems?
POLITIC I did so. Sir,
I knew him one of the most dangerous heads
Living within the state, and so I held° him. considered
PEREGRINE Indeed, sir?
POLITIC While he lived, in action,° subversive activities
He has received weekly intelligence,
Upon my knowledge, out of the Low Countries,
For all parts of the world, in cabbages,° a Dutch import
And those dispensed again to ambassadors
In oranges, muskmelons, apricots,
Lemons, pome-citrons,° and suchlike—sometimes grapefruitlike fruits
In Colchester oysters, and your Selsey cockles.[8]
PEREGRINE YOU make me wonder!
POLITIC Sir, upon my knowledge.
Nay, I have observed him at your public ordinary° tavern
Take his advertisement° from a traveler— information
A concealed statesman—in a trencher° of meat, wooden plate
And instantly before the meal was done
Convey an answer in a toothpick.[9]
PEREGRINE Strange!
How could this be, sir?
POLITIC Why, the meat was cut
So like his character,° and so laid as he code letters
Must easily read the cipher.
PEREGRINE I have heard
He could not read, sir.
POLITIC SO 'twas given out,
In polity,° by those that did employ him. craftily
But he could read, and had your languages,° knew foreign languages
And to't° as sound a noddle°— in addition / head
PEREGRINE I have heard, sir,

---

[6] "Mas' " means "master," a term of address for boys and fools. Stone, King James's outspoken court jester, was a well-known urban character. He was whipped the year before Volpone's first performance for slandering the Lord Admiral. Politic is evidently unaware of the play on words in "Stone dead."

[7] The person who said this was not commonly recognized as a spy; he used foolery as his cover.

[8] Expensive delicacies, unlikely tavern fare.

[9] Presumably by inserting a tiny note into a toothpick hollowed out for espionage use.

That your baboons were spies, and that they were
A kind of subtle nation near to China.
POLITIC Ay, ay, your Mamuluchi.[1] Faith, they had Their hand in a French plot or two, but they Were so extremely given to women as They made discovery of° all. Yet I They revealed
Had my advices° here, on Wednesday last, information
From one of their own coat;° they were returned, kind
Made their relations,° as the fashion is, re-ports
And now stand fair° for fresh employment. ready
PEREGRINE [aside] Heart,
This Sir Pol will be° ignorant of nothing. admit to being
[To POLITIC] It seems, sir, you know all?
POLITIC Not all, sir. But
I have some general notions; I do love
To note and to observe. Though I live out,° abroad
Free from the active torrent, yet I'd mark
The currents and the passages of things
For mine own private use, and know the ebbs
And flows of state.
PEREGRINE Believe it, sir, I hold
Myself in no small tie unto my fortunes° much obliged to my luck
For casting me thus lucidly upon you,
Whose knowledge—if your bounty equal it—
May do me great assistance in instruction
For my behavior and my bearing, which
Is yet so rude and raw—
POLITIC Why, came you forth
Empty of rules for travel?
PEREGRINE Faith, I had
Some common ones from out that vulgar grammar,[2]
Which he that cried° Italian to me taught me. taught orally
POLITIC Why, this it is that spoils all our brave bloods,° fine young men
Trusting our hopeful° gentry unto pedants, promising
Fellows of outside and mere bark.[3] You seem
To be a gentleman of ingenuous race°— honorable family
I not profess it,° but my fate hath been don't declare it openly
To be where I have been consulted with
In this high kind,° touching some great men's sons, important matter
Persons of blood° and honor— noble birth
PEREGRINE Who be these, sir?

SCENE 2. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA [and] NANO [disguised as a mountebank's assistants].

MOSCA Under that window, there't must be. The same.
[MOSCA and NANO set up a platform.]

---

[1] Mamluks, a class of warriors originally from Asia Minor, who ruled Egypt from 1250 to 1517.
[2] Modern language textbook, which sometimes included travelers' tips.
[3] Superficial accomplishments.

POLITIC Fellows to mount a bank!° Did your instructor platform
In the dear tongues[1] never discourse to you
Of the Italian mountebanks?
PEREGRINE Yes, sir.
POLITIC Why,
Here shall you see one.
PEREGRINE They are quacksalvers,
Fellows that live by venting° oils and drugs. selling
POLITIC Was that the character he gave you of them?
PEREGRINE AS I remember.
POLITIC Pity his ignorance.
They are the only knowing men of Europe!
Great general scholars, excellent physicians,
Most admired statesmen, professed favorites
And cabinet counselors° to the greatest princes! close advisers
The only languaged° men of all the world! most eloqnent
PEREGRINE And I have heard they are most lewd° impostors, ignorant
Made all of terms° and shreds, no less beliers jargon
Of great men's favors than their own vile med'cines,
Which they will utter° upon monstrous oaths, advertise for sale
Selling that drug for twopence ere they part
Which they have valued at twelve crowns° before. silver or gold coins
POLITIC Sir, calumnies are answered best with silence.
Yourself shall judge. [To MOSCA and NANO] Who is it mounts, my friends?
MOSCA Scoto of Mantua,[2] sir.
POLITIC Is't he? [To PEREGRINE] Nay, then,
I'll proudly promise, sir, you shall behold
Another man than has been fancied° to you. presented in imagination
I wonder yet that he should mount his bank
Here in this nook, that has been wont t'appear
In face oP the piazza! Here he comes. Facing

[Enter] VOLPONE [disguised as a mountebank, followed by] a crowd.

VOLPONE [to NANO] Mount, zany.° clown; performer

[VOLPONE and NANO climb onto the platform.]

CROWD Follow, follow, follow, follow, follow!
POLITIC See how the people follow him! He's a man
May write ten thousand crowns in bank here. Note,
Mark but his gesture. I do use° to observe make it my practice
The state° he keeps, in getting up. stateliness
PEREGRINE 'Tis worth it, sir.

VOLPONE Most noble gentlemen and my worthy patrons, it may seem strange that I, your Scoto Mantuano, who was ever wont to fix my bank in face of the public piazza near the shelter of the portico to the procuratia,[3] should now, after eight months' absence from this illustrious city of Venice, humbly retire myself into an obscure nook of the piazza.

POLITIC [to PEREGRINE] Did not I now object the same?°

ask the same question

PEREGRINE Peace, sir.

VOLPONE Let me tell you: I am not, as your Lombard proverb saith, cold on my feet,° or content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate than I accustomed; look not for it. Nor that the calumnious reports of that impudent detractor and shame to our profession (Alessandro Buttone,° I mean) who gave out in public I was condemned a 'sforzato° to the galleys for poisoning the Cardinal Bembo's—cook,[4] hath at all attached,° much less dejected me. No, no, worthy gentlemen. To tell you true, I cannot endure to see the rabble of these ground ciarlitani,[5] that spread their cloaks on the pavement as if they meant to do feats of activity° and then come in lamely with their moldy tales out of Boccaccio, like stale Tabarine,[6] the fabulist: some of them discoursing their travels and of their tedious captivity in the Turks' galleys, when indeed, were the truth known, they were the Christians' galleys, where very temperately they ate bread and drunk water as a wholesome penance, enjoined them by their confessors, for base pilferies.

POLITIC I told you, sir, his end.

PEREGRINE You did so, sir.

VOLPONE I protest, I and my six servants are not able to make of this precious liquor so fast as it is fetched away from my lodging by gentlemen of your city, strangers of the terra firma,[8] worshipful merchants, ay, and senators too, who ever since my arrival have detained me to their uses by their since there is no enjoying this world without thee? Be not then so sparing of your purses, honorable gentlemen, as to abridge the natural course of life—

PEREGRINE You see his end?

POLITIC Ay, is't not good?

VOLPONE For when a humid flux° or catarrh, by the muta- runny discharge bility of air, falls from your head into an arm or shoulder or any other part, take you a ducat or your cecchine of gold and apply to the place affected; see what good effect it can tion, that hath only power to disperse all malignant humors termed an abstract of the theoric and practic in the Aesculapian[2] art. Twill cost you eight crowns. And, Zan Fritatta,[3] pray thee sing a verse extempore in honor of it.

POLITIC How do you like him, sir?

PEREGRINE Most strangely, I!

[9] Renaissance medicine was based on the theory of the humors, four bodily fluids whose balance within the body determined both physical and mental health. Their qualities, in various combinations, were hot, cold, moist, and dry; hence Peregrine's comment in the next line.

NANO [sings] Had old Hippocrates or Galen,[5]
That to their books put med'cines all in,
But known this secret, they had never
(Of which they will be guilty ever)
Been murderers of so much paper,° written so much

Nor Raymond Lully's great elixir.
Ne had been known the Danish Gonswart
Or Paracelsus with his long sword.[8]

PEREGRINE All this yet will not do; eight crowns is high.

VOLPONE [to NANO] No more.—Gentlemen, if I had but time to discourse to you the miraculous effects of this my oil, surnamed oglio del Scoto, with the countless catalogue of those I have cured of th'aforesaid and many more diseases, the patents and privileges of all the princes and commonwealths of Christendom, or but the depositions of those that appeared on my part before the signory of the Sanitd,[9] and most learned College of Physicians, where I was authorized, upon notice taken of the admirable virtues of my medicaments and mine own excellency in matter of rare and unknown secrets, not only to disperse them publicly in this famous city but in all the territories that happily joy under the government of the most pious and magnificent states of Italy. But may some other gallant fellow say, "Oh, there be divers that make profession° to have as good and as experimented receipts as yours." Indeed, very many have assayed like apes in imitation of that which is really and essentially in me, to make oP this oil; bestowed great cost in furnaces, stills, alembics,[1] continual fires, and preparation of the ingredients (as indeed there goes to it six hundred several simples,° besides some quantity of human fat for the conglutination,° which we buy of the anatomists); but, when these practitioners come to the last decoction,° blow, blow, puff, puff, and all flies infumo° Ha, ha, ha! Poor wretches! I rather pity their folly and indiscretion° than their loss of time and money; for those may be recovered by industry, but to be a fool born is a disease incurable. VOLPONE But to our price.

PEREGRINE And that withal,° Sir Pol. ; well

VOLPONE YOU all know, honorable gentlemen, I never valued this ampulla, or vial, at less than eight crowns, but for this time I am content to be deprived of it for six; six crowns is the price, and less, in courtesy, I know you cannot offer me.
Take it or leave it howsoever, both it and I am at your service. I ask you not as the value of the thing, for then I should demand° of you a thousand crowns; so the Cardinals Mon- ask talto, Fernese, the great Duke of Tuscany, my gossip,° with buddy divers other princes, have given me. But I despise money.
Only to show my affection to you, honorable gentlemen,
and your illustrious state here, I have neglected the messages of these princes, mine own offices,° framed° my jour- duties / devised ney hither only to present you with the fruits of my travels.

stance° beating around the bush

PEREGRINE Will you be that heroic spark,° Sir Pol? gallant

CELIA at the window throws down her handkerchief [with a coin tied inside it].

Oh, see! The window has prevented you.° beaten you to it

VOLPONE Lady, I kiss your bounty, and, for this timely grace
you have done your poor Scoto of Mantua, I will return you, over and above my oil, a secret of that high and inestimable nature shall° make you forever enamored on that minute which will

SCENE 3. The scene continues.

[Enter] CORVINO. He beats away the mountebank, etc.

CORVINO Spite o'the devil, and my shame! Come down here,
Come down! No house but mine to make your scene?° stage set

---

3. I won't reduce the price by even a tiny coin.
4. Spanish gold coin worth about one English pound.
5. In his capacity as the god of health.
6. The virginal is a type of harpsichord; its "jacks" are quills that pluck strings when the keys are played, but the term was also sometimes used for the keys.

Signor Flaminio, will you down, sir? Down!
What, is my wife your Franciscina, sir?[1]
No windows on the whole piazza here
To make your properties° but mine? But mine? stage props
Heart! Ere tomorrow I shall be new christened
And called the pantalone di besogniosi[2]
About the town. [Exeunt VOLPONE, NANO, and MOSCA, followed by CORVINO and the crowd.]
PEREGRINE What should this mean, Sir Pol?
POLITIC Some trick of state, believe it. I will home.
PEREGRINE It may be some design on you.
POLITIC I know not.
I'll stand upon my guard.
PEREGRINE It is your best,° sir. best course of action
POLITIC This three weeks, all my advices, all my letters,
They have been intercepted,
PEREGRINE Indeed, sir?
Best have a care.
POLITIC Nay, so I will. [Exit.]
PEREGRINE This knight,
I may not lose him,° for my mirth, till night. [Exit.] I won't leave him

SCENE 4. VOLPONE*'s house.*

[Enter] VOLPONE [and] MOSCA.

VOLPONE Oh, I am wounded!
MOSCA Where, sir?
VOLPONE Not without;° externally
Those blows were nothing; I could bear them ever,
But angry Cupid, bolting° from her° eyes, shooting darts / Celia's
Hath shot himself into me like a flame,
Where now he flings about his burning heat,
As in a furnace an ambitious° fire rising
Whose vent is stopped. The fight is all within me.
I cannot live except thou help me, Mosca;
My liver[1] melts, and I, without the hope
Of some soft air from her refreshing breath,
Am but a heap of cinders.
MOSCA 'Las, good sir!
Would you had never seen her.
VOLPONE Nay, would thou
Hadst never told me of her.
MOSCA Sir, 'tis true;
I do confess I was unfortunate,
And you unhappy; but I'm bound in conscience
No less than duty to effect my best
To your release of torment, and I will, sir.

[1] Corvino imagines the scene in terms of a stock episode from the Italian commedia dell'arte, in which the young lover, conventionally named Flaminio after the famous actor Flaminio Scala, seduces Franciscina, the easygoing serving wench.

2.4

[1] Supposed to be the seat of lust.

VOLPONE Dear Mosca, shall I hope?
MOSCA Sir, more than dear,
I will not bid you to despair of aught
Within a human compass. that's humanly possible
VOLPONE Oh, there spoke
My better angel. Mosca, take my keys.
Gold, plate, and jewels, all's at thy devotion;[0] disposal
Employ them how thou wilt; nay, coin me too,[2]
So° thou in this but crown my longings. Mosca? provided that
MOSCA Use but your patience.
VOLPONE SO I have.[3]
MOSCA I doubt not
To bring success to your desires.
VOLPONE Nay, then,
I not repent me of my late disguise.
MOSCA If you can horn him,[4] sir, you need not.
VOLPONE True;
Besides, I never meant him for my heir.
Is not the color o'my beard and eyebrows[5]
To make me known?
MOSCA NO jot.
VOLPONE I did it well.
MOSCA SO well, would I could follow you in mine
With half the happiness![0] And yet I would success
Escape your epilogue.[0] the beating
VOLPONE But were they gulled[0] fooled
With a belief that I was Scoto?
MOSCA Sir,
Scoto himself could hardly have distinguished!
I have not time to flatter you now. We'll part,
And, as I prosper, so applaud my art. [Exeunt.]

SCENE 5. CORVINO S house.

[Enter] CORVINO [and] CELIA.

CORVINO Death of mine honor, with the city's fool?
A juggling, tooth-drawing,[1] prating[0] mountebank? chattering
And at a public window? Where, whilst he
With his strained action[0] and his dole of faces[2] overacting
To his drug lecture draws your itching ears,
A crew of old, unmarried, noted lechers
Stood leering up like satyrs;[0] and you smile lustfid goat-men
Most graciously! And fan your favors forth
To give your hot spectators satisfaction!
What, was your mountebank their call? Their whistle?[3]
Or were you enamored on his copper rings?

---

[2] Use my coins as well. (But also with the implication "make coins out of me," i.e., "turn my body into money.")
[3] Punning on the original meaning of "patience," "enduring blows."
[4] Cuckold him. (The husbands of adulterous wives were traditionally supposed to sprout horns.)
[5] Red, because he is a fox.

2.5

[1] Mountebanks, like barbers, performed dental work.
[2] Small repertory of facial expressions.
[3] Used to lure trained falcons.

His saffron jewel with the toadstone° in't? agatelike stone
Or his embroidered suit with the cope-stitch,° gaudy needlework
Made of a hearse-cloth? Or his old tilt-feather?[4]
Or his starched beard? Well! You shall have him, yes.
He shall come home and minister unto you
The fricace for the mother.[5] Or, let me see,
I think you'd rather mount?[6] Would you not mount?
Why, if you'll mount, you may; yes truly, you may—
And so you may be seen down to th'foot.
Get you a cittern, Lady Vanity,[7]
And be a dealer with the virtuous man;
Make one.[8] I'll but protest° myself a cuckold -proclaim
And save your dowry.[9] I am a Dutchman, I!
For if you thought me an Italian,
You would be damned ere you did this, you whore.[1]
Thou'dst tremble to imagine that the murder
Of father, mother, brother, all thy race,
Should follow as the subject of my justice!
CELIA Good sir, have patience!
CORVINO [drawing a weapon] What couldst thou propose Less to thyself° than, in this heat of wrath as your punishment
And stung with my dishonor, I should strike
This steel unto thee, with as many stabs
As thou wert gazed upon with goatish° eyes? lustful
CELIA Alas, sir, be appeased! I could not think
My being at the window should more now
Move your impatience than at other times.
CORVINO NO? Not to seek and entertain a parley° have a conversation
With a known knave? Before a multitude?
You were an actor with your handkerchief!
Which he most sweetly kissed in the receipt,
And might, no doubt, return it with a letter,
And point the place where you might meet—your sister's,
Your mother's, or your aunt's might serve the turn.° occasion; sexual act
CELIA Why, dear sir, when do I make these excuses?
Or ever stir abroad but to the church?
And that, so seldom—
CORVINO Well, it shall be less;
And thy restraint before was liberty
To what I now decree: and therefore, mark me.
[Pointing to the window] First, I will have this bawdy light dammed up,
And, till't be done, some two or three yards off
I'll chalk a line, o'er which if thou but chance

[4] The feather from a tilting (jousting) helmet. A hearse-cloth is a heavy cloth for draping over a coffin.
[5] Womb massage; with obvious sexual innuendo. "The mother" was a term for the uterus, but also for a variety of ailments, from cramps to depression, that were supposed to originate there.
[6] (1) Climb up on the mountebank's stage yourself; (2) take the top sexual position.
[7] Allegorical character of a morality play representing pride and worldly pleasure. A cittern is a guitarlike instrument that conventionally was played by whores.
[8] Join up with him. (With sexual innuendo.)
[9] The husbands of proven adultresses could divorce them and keep their dowry.
[1] The Dutch were proverbially phlegmatic, in contrast to Italians, who were stereotypically impetuous and vengeful.

To set thy desp'rate foot, more hell, more horror,
More wild, remorseless rage shall seize on thee
Than on a conjurer that had heedless left
His circle's safety ere his devil was laid.[2]
Then here's a lock which I will hang upon thee.
[He shows a chastity belt.]
And now I think on't, I will keep thee backwards;[3]
Thy lodging shall be backwards, thy walks backwards,
Thy prospect°—all be backwards; and no pleasure view (see n. 3)
That thou shalt know but backwards. Nay, since you force
My honest nature, know it is your own
Being too open makes me use you thus,
Since you will not contain your subtle° nostrils delicate; crafty
In a sweet° room, but they must snuff the air sweet-smelling
Of rank and sweaty passengers°— Knock within. passersby
One knocks.
Away, and be not seen, pain of thy life!
Not look toward the window. If thou dost—
[CELIA begins to exit.]
Nay stay, hear this—-let me not prosper, whore,
But I will make thee an anatomy,[4]
Dissect thee mine own self, and read a lecture
Upon thee to the city, and in public.
Away! [Exit CELIA.]
Who's there?
[Enter] Servitore [a SERVANT],
SERVANT 'Tis Signor Mosca, sir.

SCENE 6. The scene continues.

CORVINO Let him come in. [Exit SERVANT.]
His master's dead! There's yet
Some good to help the bad.
[Enter] MOSCA.
My Mosca, welcome!
I guess your news.
MOSCA I fear you cannot, sir.
CORVINO Is't not his death?
MOSCA Rather the contrary.
CORVINO Not his recovery?
MOSCA Yes, sir.
CORVINO I am cursed,
I am bewitched! My crosses° meet to vex me! misfortunes
How? How? How? How?
MOSCA Why, sir, with Scoto's oil.
Corbaccio and Voltore brought of it
Whilst I was busy in an inner room—

---

[2] Conjurers protected themselves from the devils who served them by staying inside a magical circle.
[3] In the back part of the house, lacking a view out onto the piazza; but with the suggestion of anal intercourse, supposedly favored by Italians.
[4] Use you for anatomical research. (In the early modern period, physicians obtained the bodies of executed criminals upon which to perform dissections, often before large crowds.)

CORVINO Death! That damned mountebank! But for the law,
Now, I could kill the rascal. T cannot be
His oil should have that virtue. Ha' not I Known him a common rogue, come fiddling in
To th'osteria° with a tumbling whore, tavern (Italian)
And, when he has done all his forced tricks, been glad
Of a poor spoonful of dead wine with flies in't?
It cannot be. All his ingredients
Are a sheep's gall, a roasted bitch's marrow,
Some few sod° earwigs, pounded caterpillars, boiled
A little capon's grease, and fasting spittle:[1]
I know 'em to a dram.° tiny amount
MOSCA I know not, sir,
But some on't there they poured into his ears,
Some in his nostrils, and recovered him,
Applying but the fricace.° massage
CORVINO Pox o'that fricace!
MOSCA And since, to seem the more officious° zealous
And flatt'ring of his health, there they have had—
At extreme fees—the College of Physicians
Consulting on him how they might restore him;
Where one would have a cataplasm[2] of spices,
Another a flayed ape clapped to his breast,
A third would ha' it a dog, a fourth an oil
With wildcats' skins. At last, they all resolved
That to preserve him was no other means
But some young woman must be straight sought out,
Lusty and full of juice, to sleep by him;
And to this service—most unhappily
And most unwillingly—am I now employed,
Which here I thought to preacquaint you with,
For your advice, since it concerns you most,
Because I would not do that thing might cross
Your ends,[3] on whom I have my whole dependence, sir.
Yet if I do it not, they may delate[4]
My slackness to my patron, work me out
Of his opinion;° and there all your hopes, favor
Ventures, or whatsoever, are all frustrate.
I do but tell you, sir. Besides, they are all
Now striving who shall first present him. Therefore,
I could entreat you briefly, conclude somewhat;° decide something
Prevent 'em if you can.
CORVINO Death to my hopes!
This is my villainous fortune! Best to hire
Some common courtesan.
MOSCO Ay, I thought on that, sir.

2.6

[1] Saliva of a fasting person (Scoto cannot afford anything to eat).

[2] Poultice. (The substances described in the following lines were believed to work by absorbing the patient's infection, which bodes ill for the young woman prescribed for Volpone in lines 34—35.)

[3] Do anything that might frustrate your purposes.

[4] Report. (A legal term for making an accusation.)

But they are all so subtle,° full of art,° cunning / deceit
And age again° doting and flexible, old people moreover
So as—I cannot tell—we may perchance
Light on a quean° may cheat us all. whore (who)
CORVINO 'Tis true.
MOSCA No, no; it must be one that has no tricks, sir,
Some simple thing, a creature made unto° it; suited to; forced into
Some wench you may command. Ha' you no kinswoman?
Godso°—think, think, think, think, think, think, think, sir. an oath
One o'the doctors offered there his daughter.
CORVINO How!
MOSCA Yes, Signor Lupo,° the physician. Wolf (Italian)
CORVINO His daughter?
MOSCA And a virgin, sir. Why, alas,
He knows the state of's body, what it is,
That naught can warm his blood, sir, but a fever,
Nor any incantation raise his spirit.° vigor; semen
A long forgetfulness hath seized that part.° his penis
Besides, sir, who shall know it? Some one or two—
CORVINO I pray thee give me leave.° [He walks apart.] If any man give me a minute
But I had had this luck—The thing in 'tself,
I know, is nothing.—Wherefore should not I
As well command my blood and my affections
As this dull doctor? In the point of honor
The cases are all one, of wife and daughter.
MOSCA [aside] I hear him coming.° coming around
CORVINO [aside] She shall do't. 'Tis done.
'Slight,° if this doctor, who is not engaged, by God's light (an oath)
Unless't be for his counsel (which is nothing),[5]
Offer his daughter, what should I, that am
So deeply in? I will prevent him. Wretch!
Covetous wretch!—Mosca, I have determined.
MOSCA How, sir?
CORVINO We'll make all sure. The party you wot° of know (a circumlocution)
Shall be mine own wife, Mosca.
MOSCA Sir, the thing
(But that I would not seem to counsel you)
I should have motioned° to you at the first. proposed
And, make your count,° you have cut all their throats. rest assured
Why, 'tis directly taking a possession![6]
And in his next fit we may let him go.
'Tis but to pull the pillow from his head
And he is throttled; t had been done before,
But for your scrupulous doubts,
CORVINO Ay, a plague on't!
My conscience fools my wit.° Well, I'll be brief, common sense
And so be thou, lest they should be before us.

[5] Who is not financially involved, except for whatever slight fee he could expect for his advice.

[6] A legal term for the heir's formal assumption of inherited property.

Go home, prepare him, tell him with what zeal
And willingness I do it; swear it was
On the first hearing (as thou mayst do, truly)
Mine own free motion.° initiative
MOSCA Sir, I warrant you,
I'll so possess° him with it that the rest impress
Of his starved clients shall be banished all,
And only you received. But come not, sir,
Until I send, for I have something else
To ripen for your good; you must not know't.
CORVINO But do not you forget to send, now.
MOSCO Fear not.
[Exit.]

SCENE 7. The scene continues.

CORVINO Where are you, wife? My Celia? Wife?
[Enter] CELIA [weeping.]
What, blubbering?
Come, dry those tears. I think thou thought'st me in earnest?
Ha! By this light, I talked so but to try° thee. test
Methinks the lightness° of the occasion triviality
Should ha' confirmed thee.[1] Come, I am not jealous.
CELIA No?
CORVINO
Faith, I am not, I, nor never[2] was;
It is a poor, unprofitable humor.
Do not I know if women have a will They'll do 'gainst all the watches° o'the world? despite the vigilance
And that the fiercest spies are tamed with gold?
Tut, I am confident in thee, thou shalt see't;
And see, I'll give thee cause too, to believe it.
Come, kiss me. Go and make thee ready straight
In all thy best attire, thy choicest jewels;
Put em all on, and, with em thy best looks.
We are invited to a solemn feast
At old Volpone's, where it shall appear
How far I am free from jealousy or fear. [Exeunt.]

Act 3

SCENE 1. The piazza.

[Enter] MOSCA.
MOSCA I fear I shall begin to grow in love
With my dear self and my most prosp'rous parts,° talents
They do so spring and burgeon.° I can feel swell; thrive
A whimsy° i'my blood. I know not how, giddiness
Success hath made me wanton. I could skip

2.7
[1] Convinced you that I was not serious.

[2] Double negatives are grammatical in Jacobean English.

Out of my skin now like a subtle snake,
I am so limber. Oh, your parasite
Is a most precious thing, dropped from above,° sent from heaven
Not bred mongst clods and clodpolls here on earth.
I muse the mystery was not made a science,
It is so liberally professed![1] Almost
All the wise world is little else in nature
But parasites or subparasites. And yet
I mean not those that have your bare town-art,[2]
To know who's fit to feed em; have no house,
No family, no care, and therefore mold
Tales for men's ears,° to bait° that sense; or get tell juicy rumors I entice
Kitchen-invention, and some stale receipts° recipes
To please the belly and the groin;° nor those, as aphrodisiacs
With their court-dog tricks, that can fawn and fleer,° smile insincerely
Make their revenue out of legs and faces,
Echo my lord, and lick away a moth;[3]
But your fine, elegant rascal, that can rise
And stoop almost together, like an arrow,
Shoot through the air as nimbly as a star,° meteor
Turn short as doth a swallow, and be here
And there and here and yonder all at once,
Present to any humor, all occasion,[4]
And change a visor° swifter than a thought! mask; expression
This is the creature had the art born with him,
Toils not to learn it, but doth practice it
Out of most excellent nature, and such sparks
Are the true parasites, others but their zanies.° clownish imitators

SCENE 2. The scene continues.

[Enter] BONARIO.

[Aside] Who's this? Bonario? Old Corbaccio's son?
The person I was bound° to seek.—Fair sir, on my way
You are happ'ly met.

BONARIO That cannot be by thee.

MOSCA Why, sir?

BONARIO Nay, pray thee know thy way and leave me
I would be loath to interchange discourse
With such a mate° as thou art. fellow (contemptuous)

MOSCA Courteous sir,
Scorn not my poverty.

BONARIO Not I, by heaven,
But thou shalt give me leave to hate thy baseness.

MOSCA Baseness?

BONARIO Ay. Answer me, is not thy sloth
Sufficient argument? Thy flattery?

3.1

[1] I wonder why the craft was not made a subject for academic study, it is so frequently practiced! (Punning on the "liberal professions.")

[2] Crude skills of ingratiation, sufficient only for getting free meals in taverns.

[3] Make a living from bows and sycophantic looks, repeat anything a nobleman says, and fawn over him, fussing over every detail of his appearance.

[4] Ready to respond to any mood or opportunity.

Thy means of feeding?
MOSCA Heaven, be good to me!
These imputations are too common, sir,
And eas'ly stuck on virtue when she's poor.
You are unequal° to me, and howe'er superior; unfair
Your sentence° may be righteous, yet you are not, verdict
That, ere you know me, thus proceed in censure.
Saint Mark bear witness 'gainst you, 'tis inhuman. [He weeps.]
BONARIO [aside] What? Does he weep? The sign is soft and good.
I do repent me that I was so harsh.
MOSCA 'Tis true that, swayed by strong necessity,
I am enforced to eat my careful bread
With too much obsequy;° 'tis true, beside, obsequiousness
That I am fain° to spin mine own poor raiment obliged
Out of my mere observance,° being not born deferential service
To a free fortune. But that I have done
Base offices in rending friends asunder,
Dividing families, betraying counsels,
Whispering false lies, or mining° men with praises, undermining
Trained° their credulity with perjuries, lured on
Corrupted chastity, or am in love
With mine own tender ease, but would not rather Prove° the most rugged and laborious course undergo
That might redeem my present estimation,[1]
Let me here perish in all hope of goodness.
BONARIO [aside] This cannot be a personated passion!—
I was to blame, so to mistake thy nature;
Pray thee forgive me, and speak out thy business.
MOSCA Sir, it concerns you; and though I may seem
At first to make a main° offense in manners great
And in my gratitude unto my master,
Yet for the pure love which I bear all right
And hatred of the wrong, I must reveal it.
This very hour your father is in purpose
To disinherit you—
BONARIO How!
MOSCA And thrust you forth
As a mere stranger to his blood. Tis true, sir.
The work no way engageth° me but as concerns
I claim an interest in the general state
Of goodness and true virtue, which I hear
T'abound in you, and for which mere respect,° for which reason alone
Without a second aim, sir, I have done it.
BONARIO This tale hath lost thee much of the late° trust recent
Thou hadst with me. It is impossible.
I know not how to lend it any thought° believe that
My father should be so unnatural.
MOSCA It is a confidence that well becomes

3.2

[1] That might improve your current appraisal of me.

Your piety;[0] and formed, no doubt, it is — filial loyalty
From your own simple innocence, which makes
Your wrong more monstrous and abhorred. But, sir,
I now will tell you more. This very minute
It is or will be doing; and if you
Shall be but pleased to go with me, I'll bring you,
I dare not say where you shall see, but where
Your ear shall be a witness of the deed:
Hear yourself written bastard, and professed
The common issue of the earth.[2]
BONARIO I'm mazed!
MOSCA Sir, if I do it not, draw your just sword
And score your vengeance on my front[0] and face; — brow
Mark me your villain. You have too much wrong,
And I do suffer for you, sir. My heart
Weeps blood in anguish—
BONARIO Lead. I follow thee. [Exeunt.]

SCENE 3. VOLPONE'S house.

[Enter] VOLPONE, NANO, ANDROGYNO, [and] CASTRONE.

VOLPONE Mosca stays long, methinks. Bring forth your sports
And help to make the wretched time more sweet.
NANO Dwarf, fool, and eunuch, well met here we be.
A question it were now, whether[0] of us three, — which
Being all the known delicates[0] of a rich man, — playthings
In pleasing him, claim the precedency can?
CASTRONE I claim for myself.
ANDROGYNO And so doth the fool.
NANO 'Tis foolish indeed; let me set you both to school.
First, for your dwarf: he's little and witty,
And everything, as it is little, is pretty;
Else why do men say to a creature of my shape,
So soon as they see him, "It's a pretty little ape"?
And why a pretty ape? But for pleasing imitation
Of greater men's action in a ridiculous fashion.
Beside, this feat[0] body of mine doth not crave — neat, trim
Half the meat, drink, and cloth one of your bulks will have.
Admit your fool's face be the mother of laughter,
Yet for his brain, it must always come after;[0] — he lesser
And though that do feed him,[0] it's a pitiful case,[1] — earns his keep
His body is beholding[0] to such a bad face. One knocks. — beholden
VOLPONE Who's there? My couch. [He lies down.] Away, look, Nano, see!
Give me my caps, first—go, inquire.
[Exeunt NANO, ANDROGYNO, and CASTRONE.]
Now, Cupid
Send[0] it be Mosca, and with fair return![0] — grant / good results

---

[2] A bastard was called filius terrae, "son of the earth."

3.3

[1] With a pun on "container."

[Enter NANO.]
NANO It is the beauteous Madam—
VOLPONE Would-be—is it?
NANO The same
VOLPONE NOW, torment on me! Squire her in,
For she will enter or dwell here forever.
Nay, quickly, that my fit were past! [Exit NANO.]
I fear
A second hell, too, that my loathing this
Will quite expel my appetite to the other.° Celia
Would she were taking, now, her tedious leave.
Lord, how it threats me what I am to suffer!

SCENE 4. The scene continues.

[Enter] LADY [WOULD-BE and] NANO.
LADY WOULD-BE [to NANO] I thank you, good sir. Pray you signify Unto your patron I am here.[1] [Regarding herself in a mirror] This band° ruff
Shows not my neck enough. I trouble you, sir.
Let me request you, bid one of my women
Come hither to me. [Exit NANO.]
In good faith, I am dressed
Most favorably today!° It is no matter; sarcastic
Tis well enough.
[Enter NANO and FIRST] WOMAN.
Look, see, these petulant things!° her women; her curls
How they have done this!
VOLPONE [aside] I do feel the fever
Ent'ring in at mine ears. Oh, for a charm
To fright it hence!
LADY WOULD-BE [to FIRST WOMAN] Come nearer. Is this curl
In his° right place? Or this? Why is this higher its
Than all the rest? You ha' not washed your eyes yet?
Or do they not stand even° i'your head? level
Where's your fellow? Call her. [Exit FIRST WOMAN.]
NANO [aside] Now Saint Mark
Deliver us! Anon she'll beat her women
Because her nose is red.
[Enter FIRST and SECOND WOMEN.]
LADY WOULD-BE I pray you, view
This tire,° forsooth. Are all things apt or no? headdress
SECOND WOMAN One hair a little here sticks out, forsooth.
LADY WOULD-BE Does't so, forsooth? [To FIRST WOMAN] And where was your dear sight
When it did so, forsooth? What now? Bird-eyed?° startled (?); asquint (?)
[To SECOND WOMAN]
And you, too? Pray you both approach and mend it.
[They tend to her.]
Now, by that light,° I muse you're not ashamed! i.e., by heaven

3.4
[1] Much of Lady Would-be's dialogue in the following scene is adapted from Libanius of Antioch's On Talkative Women.

I, that have preached these things so oft unto you,
Read you the principles, argued all the grounds,
Disputed every fitness, every grace,
Called you to counsel of so frequent dressings—
NANO (aside) More carefully than of your fame° or honor. reputation
LADY WOULD-BE Made you acquainted what an ample dowry
The knowledge of these things would be unto you,
Able alone to get you noble husbands
At your return,° and you thus to neglect it? to England
Besides, you seeing what a curious° nation fastidious
Th'Italians are, what will they say of me?
"The English lady cannot dress herself."
Here's a fine imputation to our country!
Well, go your ways, and stay i'the next room.
This fucus° was too coarse, too; it's no matter. makeup
[To NANO] Good sir, you'll give 'em entertainment?° look after them
[Exeunt NANO and WOMEN.]
VOLPONE [aside] The storm comes toward me.
LADY WOULD-BE [approaching the bed] How does my Volp?
VOLPONE Troubled with noise. I cannot sleep; I dreamt
That a strange Fury entered now my house,
And with the dreadful tempest of her breath
Did cleave my roof asunder.
LADY WOULD-BE Believe me, and I
Had the most fearful dream, could I remember't—VOLPONE [aside] Out on° my fate! I ha' giv'n her the occasion curses on How to torment me: she will tell me hers.
LADY WOULD-BE Methought the golden mediocrity,° golden mean
Polite and delicate—
VOLPONE Oh, if you do love me,
No more! I sweat and suffer at the mention
Of any dream. Feel how I tremble yet.
LADY WOULD-BE Alas, good soul! The passion of the heart.° heartburn
Seed pearl were good now, boiled with syrup of apples,
Tincture of gold and coral, citron pills,
Your elecampane° root, myrobalans[2]— perennial herb
VOLPONE [aside] Ay me, I have ta'en a grasshopper by the wing!
LADY WOULD-BE Burnt silk and amber; you have muscadel
Good i'the house—-
VOLPONE YOU will not drink and part?
LADY WOULD-BE NO, fear not that. I doubt we shall not get
Some English saffron—half a dram would serve—
Your sixteen cloves, a little musk, dried mints,
Bugloss,° and barley-meal— an herb
VOLPONE [aside] She's in again.
Before I feigned diseases; now I have one.
LADY WOULD-BE And these applied with a right scarlet cloth—
VOLPONE [aside] Another flood of words! A very torrent!
LADY WOULD-BE Shall I, sir, make you a poultice?

---

[2] Dried tropical fruits.

VOLPONE No, no, no.
I'm very well; you need prescribe no more.
LADY WOULD-BE I have a little studied physic, but now
I'm all for music, save i'the forenoons
An hour or two for painting. I would have
A lady indeed t' have all letters and arts,
Be able to discourse, to write, to paint,
But principal, as Plato holds,° your music in The Republic
(And so does wise Pythagoras, I take it)
Is your true rapture, when there is concent° harmony
In face, in voice, and clothes, and is indeed
Our sex's chiefest ornament.
VOLPONE The poet° Sophocles, in Ajax
As old in time as Plato, and as knowing,
Says that your highest female grace is silence.
LADY WOULD-BE Which o' your poets? Petrarch? Or Tasso? Or Dante?
Guarini? Ariosto? Aretine?
Cieco di Hadria?[3] I have read them all.
VOLPONE [aside] Is everything a cause to my destruction?
LADY WOULD-BE [searching her garments] I think I ha' two or three of 'em about me.
VOLPONE [aside] The sun, the sea will sooner both stand still
Than her eternal tongue! Nothing can scape it.
LADY WOULD-BE Here's Pastor Fido[4]—
VOLPONE [aside] Profess obstinate silence,
That's now my safest.
LADY WOULD-BE All our English writers,
I mean such as are happy in th'Italian,
Will deign to steal out of this author mainly,
Almost as much as from Montaignie;° French essayist
He has so modern and facile° a vein, graceful
Fitting the time, and catching the court ear.
Your Petrarch is more passionate, yet he,
In days of sonneting, trusted em with much.[5]
Dante is hard, and few can understand him.
But for a desperate° wit, there's Aretine! outrageous
Only his pictures are a little obscene[6]—
You mark me not?
VOLPONE Alas, my mind's perturbed.
LADY WOULD-BE Why, in such cases we must cure ourselves,
Make use of our philosophy—
VOLPONE Ay me!
LADY WOULD-BE And, as we find our passions do rebel,
Encounter em with reason, or divert em
By giving scope unto some other humor
Of lesser danger—as in politic bodies° political councils

---

[3] Lady Would-be juxtaposes major Italian writers with the minor di Hadria and the obscene Aretino.

[4] A pastoral by Giovanni Guarini, translated into English in 1602.

[5] When sonnet writing was popular, gave poets plenty to imitate.

[6] The libertine poems of Aretine (Pietro Aretine 1492—1556) were published with pornographic illustrations by Giulio Romano.

There's nothing more doth overwhelm the judgment
And clouds the understanding than too much
Settling and fixing and (as 'twere) subsiding° alchemical jargon
Upon one object. For the incorporating
Of these same outward things into that part
Which we call mental leaves some certain feces° dregs
That stop the organs and, as Plato says,
Assassinates our knowledge.
VOLPONE [aside] Now, the spirit
Of patience help me!
LADY WOULD-BE Come, in faith, I must
Visit you more o'days and make you well.
Laugh and be lusty.° merry
VOLPONE [aside] My good angel save me!
LADY WOULD-BE There was but one sole man in all the world
With whom I e'er could sympathize, and he Would lie you° often three, four hours together lie
To hear me speak, and be sometime so rapt
As he would answer me quite from the purpose,
Like you—and you are like him, just. I'll discourse—
An't° be but only, sir, to bring you asleep— if it
How we did spend our time and loves together
For some six years.
VOLPONE Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh!
LADY WOULD-BE For we were coaetani° and brought up— the same age
VOLPONE [aside] Some power, some fate, some fortune rescue me!

SCENE 5. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA.

MOSCA God save you, madam.
LADY WOULD-BE Good sir.
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] Mosca? Welcome,
Welcome to my redemption.
MOSCA [to VOLPONE] Why, sir?
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] Oh,
Rid me of this my torture quickly, there,
My madam with the everlasting voice!
The bells in time of pestilence ne'er made
Like noise, or were in that perpetual motion;[1]
The cockpit° comes not near it. All my house cockfighting arena
But now steamed like a bath with her thick breath.
A lawyer could not have been heard, nor scarce
Another woman, such a hail of words
She has let fall. For hell's sake, rid her hence.
MOSCA [aside to VOLPONE] Has she presented?° given a gift
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] Oh, I do not care.
I'll take her absence upon any price,
With any loss.

3.5
[1] Church bells marked the deaths of parishioners; in times of plague they therefore rang almost constantly.

MOSCA Madam—
LADY WOULD-BE I ha' brought your patron
A toy,° a cap here, of mine own work— trifle; embroidered piece
MOSCA [taking it from her] Tis well.
I had forgot to tell you, I saw your knight
Where you'd little think it—
LADY WOULD-BE Where?
MOSCA Marry,
Where yet, if you make haste, you may apprehend him,
Rowing upon the water in a gondole
With the most cunning courtesan of Venice.
LADY WOULD-BE Is't true?
MOSCA Pursue em, and believe your eyes.
Leave me to make your gift. [Exit LADY WOULD-BE.]
I knew 'twould take.° do the trick
For lightly,° they that use themselves most license commonly
Are Still° most jealous. always
VOLPONE Mosca, hearty thanks
For thy quick fiction and delivery of me.
Now, to my hopes, what say'st thou?
[Enter LADY WOULD-BE.]
LADY WOULD-BE But do you hear, sir?
VOLPONE [aside] Again! I fear a paroxysm.° relapse
LADY WOULD-BE Which way
Rowed they together?
MOSCA Toward the Rialto.° commercial district
LADY WOULD-BE I pray you, lend me your dwarf.
MOSCA I pray you, take him.
[Exit LADY WOULD-BE.]
Your hopes, sir, are like happy blossoms: fair,
And promise timely fruit if you will stay
But the maturing. Keep you at your couch.
Corbaccio will arrive straight with the will;
When he is gone I'll tell you more. [Exit.]
VOLPONE My blood,
My spirits are returned. I am alive;
And like your wanton° gamester at primero,[2] reckless; lustful
Whose thought had whispered to him, not go° less, don't gamble
Methinks I lie, and draw—for an encounter.[3]
[He gets into bed and closes the bed curtains.]

SCENE 6. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA [and] BONARIO. [MOSCA shows BONARIO to a hiding place.]
MOSCA Sir, here concealed you may hear all. But pray you
Have patience, sir. (One knocks.) The same's your father knocks.
I am compelled to leave you.
BONARIO DO SO. Yet

[2] A card game.
[3] (1) Winning play in primero; (2) sexual act.

Cannot my thought imagine this a truth.
[He conceals himself.]

SCENE 7. The scene continues.

[Enter] CORVINO [and] CELIA. MOSCA [crosses the stage to intercept them],
MOSCA Death on me! You are come too soon. What meant you?
Did not I say I would send?
CORVINO Yes, but I feared
You might forget it, and then they prevent us.
MOSCA [aside] Prevent? Did e'er man haste so for his horns?° cuckold's horns
A courtier would not ply it so for a place.[1]
[To CORVINO] Well, now there's no helping it, stay here;
I'll presently return. [He crosses the stage to BONARIO.]
CORVINO Where are you, Celia?
You know not wherefore I have brought you hither?
CELIA Not well, except you told me.
CORVINO Now I will.
Hark hither. [CORVINO and CELIA talk apart.]
MOSCA (to RONARIO) Sir, your father hath sent word
It will be half an hour ere he come;
And therefore, if you please to walk the while
Into that gallery, at the upper end
There are some books to entertain the time;
And I'll take care no man shall come unto you, sir.
BONARIO Yes, I will stay there, [aside] I do doubt this fellow.
[He retires.]
MOSCA There, he is far enough; he can hear nothing.
And for° his father, I can keep him off. as for [MOSCA joins VOLPONE and opens his bed curtains.]
CORVINO [to CELIA] Nay, now, there is no starting back, and therefore Resolve upon it; I have so decreed.
It must be done. Nor would I move't° afore, suggest it
Because I would avoid all shifts° and tricks evasions
That might deny me.
CELIA Sir, let me beseech you,
Affect° not these strange trials. If you doubt undertake
My chastity, why, lock me up forever;
Make me the heir of darkness. Let me live
Where I may please° your fears, if not your trust. satisfy
CORVINO Believe it, I have no such humor, I.
All that I speak, I mean; yet I am not mad,
Not horn-mad,° see you? Go to, show yourself crazy with jealousy[1]
Obedient, and a wife.
CELIA O heaven!
CORVINO I say it,
Do so.
CELIA Was this the train?° scheme

3.7
[1] Work so hard for a position at court.

CORVINO I have told you reasons:
What the physicians have set down; how much
It may concern me; what my engagements are;
My means, and the necessity of those means
For my recovery. Wherefore, if you be Loyal and mine, be won, respect my venture.° su-ppon my endeavor
CELIA Before your honor?
CORVINO Honor? Tut, a breath.
There's no such thing in nature; a mere term
Invented to awe fools. What is my gold
The worse for touching? Clothes for being looked on?
Why, this's no more. An old, decrepit wretch,
That has no sense,° no sinew; takes his meat sensory perception
With others' fingers; only knows to gape
When you do scald his gums; a voice, a shadow.
And what can this man hurt you?
CELIA Lord! What spirit
Is this hath entered him?
CORVINO And for your fame,° reputation
That's such a jig;° as if I would go tell it, joke
Cry° it on the piazza! Who shall know it advertise
But he that cannot speak it,° and this fellow° Volpone / Mosca
Whose lips are i'my pocket, save yourself?
If you'll proclaim't, you may. I know no other
Should come to know it.
CELIA Are heaven and saints then nothing?
Will they be blind or stupid?
CORVINO How?° What's this?
CELIA Good sir,
Be jealous still, emulate them, and think
What hate they burn with toward every sin.
CORVINO I grant you, if I thought it were a sin
I would not urge you. Should I offer this
To some young Frenchman, or hot Tuscan blood
That had read Aretine, conned° all his prints, learned by heart
Knew every quirk within lust's labyrinth,
And were professed critic° in lechery, connoisseur
And I would look upon him and applaud him,
This were a sin. But here 'tis contrary,
A pious work, mere charity, for physic,
And honest polity° to assure mine own. prudence
CELIA O heaven! Canst thou suffer such a change?
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] Thou art mine honor, Mosca, and my pride,
My joy, my tickling, my delight! Go, bring 'em.
MOSCA [to CORVINO] Please you draw near, sir.
CORVINO [dragging CELIA toward VOLPONE] Come on, what—
You will not be rebellious? By that light—
MOSCA [to VOLPONE] Sir, Signor Corvino here is come to see you.
VOLPONE Oh!
MOSCA And, hearing of the consultation had
So lately for your health, is come to offer,
Or rather, sir, to prostitute—

CORVINO Thanks, sweet Mosca.
MOSCA Freely, unasked or unentreated—
CORVINO Well.
MOSCA AS the true, fervent instance of his love,
His own most fair and proper wife, the beauty
Only of price° in Venice— beyond comparison
CORVINO Tis well urged.
MOSCA To be your comfortress and to preserve you.
VOLPONE Alas, I am past already! Pray you, thank him
For his good care and promptness. But for° that, as for
'Tis a vain labor e'en to fight 'gainst heaven,
Applying fire to a stone (uh! uh! uh! uh!),
Making a dead leaf grow again. I take
His wishes gently, though; and you may tell him
What I have done for him. Marry, my state is hopeless!
Will him to pray for me, and t' use his fortune
With reverence when he comes to't.
MOSCA [to CORVINO] DO you hear, sir?
Go to him with your wife.
CORVINO [to CELIA] Heart of my father!° an oath
Wilt thou persist thus? Come, I pray thee, come.
Thou see'st 'tis nothing. [He threatens to strike her.] Celia! By this hand,
I shall grow violent. Come, do't, I say.
CELIA Sir, kill me, rather. I will take down poison,
Eat burning coals, do anything—
CORVINO Be damned!
Heart! I will drag thee hence, home, by the hair,
Cry thee a strumpet through the streets, rip up
Thy mouth unto thine ears, and slit thy nose
Like a raw rochet!°—Do not tempt me. Come, a fish, the red gurnard
Yield! I am loath—Death!° I will buy some slave God's death! (an oath)
Whom I will kill,[2] and bind thee to him alive,
And at my window hang you forth, devising
Some monstrous crime, which I in capital letters
Will eat into thy flesh with aquafortis° nitric acid
And burning cor'sives° on this stubborn breast. corrosives
Now, by the blood thou hast incensed, I'll do t.
CELIA Sir, what you please, you may; I am your martyr.
CORVINO Be not thus obstinate. I ha' not deserved it.
Think who it is entreats you. Pray thee, sweet!
Good faith, thou shalt have jewels, gowns, attires,
What° thou wilt think and ask. Do but go kiss him. whatever
Or touch him but. For my sake. At my suit.
This once. No? Not? I shall remember this.
Will you disgrace me thus? Do you thirst my undoing?
MOSCA Nay, gentle lady, be advised.
CORVINO NO, no.
She has watched her time.[3] God's precious,[4] this is scurvy;

---

[2] In the following lines, Corvino elaborates luridly upon the fate that the notorious rapist Tarquin promised the chaste Roman matron Lucretia if she did not capitulate; unlike Celia, Lucretia yielded to threats.

[3] Waited for her chance (to ruin me).

[4] God's precious blood. (An oath.)

Tis very scurvy, and you are—
MOSCA Nay, good, sir.
CORVINO An arrant locust,[0] by heaven, a locust. Whore, destroyer
Crocodile,[5] that hast thy tears prepared,
Expecting[0] how thou'lt bid 'em flow! anticipating
MOSCA Nay, pray you, sir,
She will consider.
CELIA Would my life would serve
To satisfy—-
CORVINO 'Sdeath, if she would but speak to him
And save my reputation, 'twere somewhat—
But spitefully to effect my utter ruin!
MOSCA Ay, now you've put your fortune in her hands.
Why, i'faith, it is her modesty; I must quit[0] her. absolve
If you were absent she would be more coming,[0] compliant
I know it, and dare undertake for her.
What woman can before her husband? Pray you,
Let us depart and leave her here.
CORVINO Sweet Celia,
Thou mayst redeem all yet; I'll say no more.
If not, esteem yourself as lost.-—Nay, stay there.
[Exeunt CORVINO and MOSCA.]
CELIA O God and his good angels! Whither, whither
Is shame fled human breasts, that with such ease
Men dare put off your[0] honors and their own? God's and the angels'
Is that which ever was a cause of life[0] sex and wedlock
Now placed beneath the basest circumstance,[0] lowest of concerns
And modesty an exile made for money?
He [VOLPONE] leaps off from his couch.
VOLPONE Ay, in Corvino, and such earth-fed minds
That never tasted the true heav'n of love.
Assure thee, Celia, he that would sell thee
Only for hope of gain, and that uncertain,
He would have sold his part of paradise
For ready money, had he met a copeman." buyer
Why art thou mazed to see me thus revived?
Rather applaud thy beauty's miracle;
Tis thy great work, that hath, not now alone[0] not only just now
But sundry times raised me in several shapes,
And but this morning like a mountebank
To see thee at thy window. Ay, before
I would have left my practice[0] for thy love, scheming
In varying figures I would have contended
With the blue Proteus or the horned flood.[6]
Now art thou welcome.
CELIA Sir!
VOLPONE Nay, fly me not,

---

[5] Which was supposed to weep while preying upon its victims.

[6] Proteus is a shape-changing sea god with whom Menelaus wrestles in the Odyssey[1]. The "horned flood" is the river god Achelous, defeated by Hercules despite changing into an ox.

Nor let thy false imagination
That I was bedrid make thee think I am so.
Thou shalt not find it. I am now as fresh,
As hot, as high, and in as jovial plight[0] robust condition
As when—in that so celebrated scene,
At recitation of our comedy
For entertainment of the great Valois[7]—
I acted young Antinoiis,[8] and attracted
The eyes and ears of all the ladies present,

T'admire each graceful gesture, note, and footing.[0] dance step

SONG

[He sings.] Come, my Celia, let us prove,[9]
While we can, the sports of love.
Time will not be ours forever;
He at length our good will sever.
Spend not then his gifts in vain.
Suns that set may rise again,
But if once we lose this light
Tis with us perpetual night.
Why should we defer our joys?
Fame and rumor are but toys.[0] trifles
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies?
Or his[0] easier ears beguile, Corvino's
Thus removed by our wile?
Tis no sin love's fruits to steal,
But the sweet thefts to reveal.
To be taken,[0] to be seen, caught
These have crimes accounted been.
CELIA Some serene[0] blast me, or dire lightning strike poisonous mist
This my offending face!
VOLPONE Why droops my Celia?
Thou hast in place of a base husband found
A worthy lover. Use thy fortune well,
With secrecy and pleasure. See, behold
What thou art queen of, not in expectation,[0] merely in hope
As I feed others, but possessed and crowned.
[He reveals his treasures.]
See here a rope of pearl, and each more orient[0] brilliant
Than that the brave Egyptian queen caroused;[1]
Dissolve and drink em. See, a carbuncle[2]
May put out both the eyes of our Saint Mark;[3]
A diamond would have bought Lollia Paulina[4]

---

[7] Henry of Valois, Duke of Anjou, and later King Henry III of France (1574—89), was sumptuously entertained at Venice in 1574. His sexual taste for men was widely remarked.

[8] The beautiful homosexual favorite of the Roman emperor Hadrian.

[9] Try out. (The song is an adaptation of the Roman poet Catullus's fifth ode.)

[1] Cleopatra dissolved and drank a pearl during a banquet with her lover, Marc Antony. "Brave": magnificent.

[2] Ruby, thought to emit light.

[3] Patron saint of Venice, whose statue stood in the basilica.

[4] Third wife of the Roman emperor Caligula.

When she came in like starlight, hid with jewels
That were the spoils of provinces. Take these,
And wear, and lose 'em; yet remains an earring
To purchase them again, and this whole state.
A gem but worth a private patrimony
Is nothing; we will eat such at a meal.
The heads of parrots, tongues of nightingales,
The brains of peacocks and of ostriches
Shall be our food, and, could we get the phoenix,[5]
Though nature lost her kind,[0] she were our dish. it became extinct
CELIA Good sir, these things might move a mind affected
With such delights; but I, whose innocence
Is all I can think wealthy[0] or worth th'enjoying, valuable
And which once lost, I have naught to lose beyond it,
Cannot be taken with these sensual baits.
If you have conscience—
VOLPONE 'Tis the beggar's virtue.
If thou hast wisdom, hear me, Celia.
Thy baths shall be the juice of July flowers,[0] clove pinks
Spirit[0] of roses, and of violets, extract
The milk of unicorns, and panthers' breath[6]
Gathered in bags, and mixed with Cretan wines.
Our drink shall be prepared gold and amber,
Which we will take until my roof whirl round
With the vertigo; and my dwarf shall dance,
My eunuch sing, my fool make up the antic,[7]
Whilst we, in changed shapes, act Ovid's tales:
Thou like Europa now and I like Jove,
Then I like Mars and thou like Erycine,[8]
So of the rest, till we have quite run through
And wearied all the fables of the gods.
Then will I have thee in more modern forms,
Attired like some sprightly dame of France,
Brave Tuscan lady, or proud Spanish beauty;
Sometimes unto the Persian Sophy's[0] wife, Shah of Persia's
Or the Grand Signor's[0] mistress; and for change, Sultan of Turkey's
To one of our most artful courtesans,
Or some quick[0] Negro, or cold Russian. energetic
And I will meet thee in as many shapes,
Where we may so transfuse[0] our wand'ring souls pour into each other
Out at our lips, and score up sums of pleasures,
[He sings.] That the curious shall not know
How to tell° them as they flow; count
And the envious, when they find
What their number is, be pined.[0] tormented

---

[5] Mythical bird, of which it was supposed that only one existed at a time; it died in flames and was reborn from its own ashes.
[6] Panthers were believed to use their sweet-smelling breath to lure prey.
[7] Grotesque dance or pageant.
[8] Ovid's Metamorphoses retells the pagan myths of transformation. Jove, king of the gods, became a bull to seduce the lovely Europa. The adulterous couple Mars, god of war, and Erycine (Venus), goddess of sexual love, were caught in a net by Vulcan, her husband.

CELIA If you have ears that will be pierced, or eyes
That can be opened, a heart may be touched,
Or any part that yet sounds man[9] about you;
If you have touch of holy saints or heaven,
Do me the grace to let me scape. If not,
Be bountiful and kill me. You do know
I am a creature hither ill betrayed
By one whose shame I would forget it were.
If you will deign me neither of these graces,
Yet feed your wrath, sir, rather than your lust—
It is a vice comes nearer manliness—
And punish that unhappy crime of nature
Which you miscall my beauty. Flay my face
Or poison it with ointments for seducing
Your blood to this rebellion.° Rub these hands sexual mutiny
With what may cause an eating leprosy
E'en to my bones and marrow—anything
That may disfavor me,° save in my honor— make me ugly
And I will kneel to you, pray for you, pay down
A thousand hourly vows, sir, for your health,
Report and think you virtuous—
VOLPONE Think me cold,
Frozen, and impotent, and so report me?
That I had Nestor's[1] hernia, thou wouldst think.
I do degenerate, and abuse my nation[2]
To play with opportunity thus long.
I should have done the act and then have parleyed.
Yield, or I'll force thee.
CELIA O just God!
VOLPONE [seizing CELIA] In vain—
He [BONARIO] leaps out from where MOSCA had placed him.
BONARIO Forbear, foul ravisher, libidinous swine!
Free the forced lady or thou diest, impostor.
But that I am loath to snatch thy punishment
Out of the hand of justice, thou shouldst yet
Be made the timely sacrifice of vengeance
Before this altar and this dross,° thy idol.— the treasure
Lady, let's quit the place. It is the den
Of villainy. Fear naught; you have a guard;
And he° ere long shall meet his just reward. Volpone
[Exeunt BONARIO and CELIA.]
VOLPONE Fall on me, roof, and bury me in ruin!
Become my grave, that wert my shelter! Oh!
I am unmasked, unspirited, undone,
Betrayed to beggary, to infamy—

---

[9] That has a hint of manliness.

[1] Nestor was the oldest of the Greek leaders in the Trojan War.

[2] I fall away from my ancestors' virtues and abuse the Italian reputation for virility.

SCENE 8. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA [bloody].[1]

MOSCA Where shall I run, most wretched shame of men,
To beat out my unlucky brains?
VOLPONE Here, here.
What! Dost thou bleed?
MOSCA Oh, that his well-driv'n sword
Had been so courteous to have cleft me down
Unto the navel, ere I lived to see
My life, my hopes, my spirits, my patron, all
Thus desperately engaged° by my error! placed at risk
VOLPONE Woe on thy fortune!
MOSCA And my follies, sir.
VOLPONE Th'hast made me miserable.
MOSCA And myself, sir.
Who would have thought he would have hearkened° so? eavesdropped
VOLPONE What shall we do?
MOSCA I know not. If my heart
Could expiate the mischance, I'd pluck it out.
Will you be pleased to hang me, or cut my throat?
And I'll requite you, sir. Let's die like Romans,
Since we have lived like Grecians.[2] They knock without.
VOLPONE Hark, who's there?
I hear some footing: officers, the Saffi,° arresting officers
Come to apprehend us! I do feel the brand
Hissing already at my forehead; now
Mine ears are boring.[3]
MOSCA To your couch, sir; you
Make that place good, however.[4] [VOLPONE gets into bed.]
Guilty men
Suspect° what they deserve still.° [He opens the door.] dread/always Signor Corbaccio!

SCENE 9. The scene continues.

[Enter] CORBACCIO [and converses with] MOSCA;
VOLTORE [enters unnoticed by them].

CORBACCIO Why, how now, Mosca!
MOSCA Oh, undone, amazed, sir.
Your son—I know not by what accident—
Acquainted with your purpose to my patron
Touching° your will and making him your heir, concerning
Entered our house with violence, his sword drawn,

3.8
[1] Bonario apparently remembered Mosca's invitation, in 3.2.66—68, to punish him if he turns out to be lying: "draw your just sword / And score your vengeance on my front and face; / Mark me your villain."
[2] Romans often committed suicide in adversity; Greeks were thought to be pleasure-loving.
[3] Branding was a common criminal punishment; ear-boring is described as an Italian torture in Thomas Nashe's Unfortunate Traveler (1594).
[4] (1) Defend that place, whatever happens; (2) maintain your invalid's role at all costs, since that role suits you.

Sought for you, called you wretch, unnatural,
Vowed he would kill you.
CORBACCIO Me?
MOSCA Yes, and my patron.
CORRACCIO This act shall disinherit him indeed.
Here is the will.
MOSCA [taking it from him] Tis well, sir.
CORBACCIO Right and well.
Be you as careful now for me.
MOSCA My life, sir,
Is not more tendered;° I am only yours. cherished.
CORBACCIO How does he? Will he die shortly, think'st thou?
MOSCA I fear
He'll outlast May.
CORRACCIO Today?
MOSCA NO, last out May, sir.
CORRACCIO Couldst thou not gi' him a dram?° dose (of poison)
MOSCA Oh, by no means, sir.
CORBACCIO Nay, I'll not bid you.
VOLTORE [aside] This is a knave, I see.
[VOLTORE comes forward to speak privately with MOSCA.]
MOSCA [aside] How, Signor Voltore! Did he hear me?
VOLTORE Parasite!
MOSCA Who's that? Oh, sir, most timely welcome—
VOLTORE Scarce° only just in time
To the discovery of your tricks, I fear.
You are his only? And mine also? Are you not?
MOSCA Who, I, sir? [They speak out of CORBACCIO S hearing.]
VOLTORE YOU, sir. What device° is this ruse
About a will?
MOSCA A plot for you, sir.
VOLTORE Come,
Put not your foists° upon me. I shall scent 'em. tricks; stenches
MOSCA Did you not hear it?
VOLTORE Yes, I hear Corbaccio
Hath made your patron there his heir.
MOSCA 'Tis true,
By my device, drawn to it by my plot,
With hope—
VOLTORE Your patron should reciprocate?
And you have promised?
MOSCA For your good I did, sir.
Nay, more, I told his son, brought, hid him here
Where he might hear his father pass the deed,
Being persuaded to it by this thought, sir,
That the unnaturalness, first, of the act,
And then, his father's oft disclaiming in° him disowning
(Which I did mean t' help on) would sure enrage him
To do some violence upon his parent,
On which the law should take sufficient hold,

And you be stated° in a double hope. installed
Truth be my comfort and my conscience,
My only aim was to dig you a fortune
Out of these two old rotten sepulchres—
VOLTORE I cry thee mercy, Mosca.
MOSCA Worth your patience
And your great merit, sir. And see the change!
VOLTORE Why? What success?° outcome
MOSCA Most hapless!° You must help, sir. unfortunate
Whilst we expected th'old raven, in comes
Corvino's wife, sent hither by her husband—
VOLTORE What, with a present?
MOSCA No, sir, on visitation—
I'll tell you how, anon—and, staying long,
The youth, he grows impatient, rushes forth,
Seizeth the lady, wounds me, makes her swear—
Or he would murder her, that was his vow—
T'affirm my patron to have done her rape,
Which how unlike° it is, you see! And hence, unlikely
With that pretext, he's gone t'accuse his father,
Defame my patron, defeat you—
VOLTORE Where's her husband?
Let him be sent for straight.
MOSCA Sir, I'll go fetch him.
VOLTORE Bring him to the Scrutineo.° Venetian law court
MOSCA Sir, I will.
VOLTORE This must be stopped.
MOSCA Oh, you do nobly, sir.
Alas, 'twas labored all, sir, for your good;
Nor was there want of counsel° in the plot. lack of wisdom
But fortune can at any time o'erthrow
The projects of a hundred learned clerks,° sir. scholars
CORBACCIO [striving to hear] What's that?
VOLTORE [to CORBACCIO] Will't please you, sir, to go along?
[Exeunt CORBACCIO and VOLTORE.]
MOSCA Patron, go in and pray for our success.
VOLPONE [rising] Need makes devotion. Heaven your labor bless!

Act 4

SCENE 1. The piazza.

[Enter] POLITIC [and] PEREGRINE,
POLITIC I told you, sir, it° was a plot. You see the mountebank episode
What observation is! You mentioned me
For° some instructions; I will tell you, sir, as one who could give
Since we are met here, in this height° of Venice, latitude
Some few particulars I have set down
Only for this meridian, fit to be known
Of your crude° traveler, and they are these. inexperienced

I will not touch, sir, at your phrase or clothes,
For they are old.[1]
PEREGRINE Sir, I have better.
POLITIC Pardon,
I meant as they are themes.[0] topics for advice
PEREGRINE Oh, sir, proceed.
I'll slander[0] you no more of wit, good sir. accuse
POLITIC First, for your garb,[2] it must be grave and serious,
Very reserved and locked;[0] not° tell a secret guarded / do not
On any terms, not to your father; scarce
A fable[3] but with caution. Make sure choice
Both of your company and discourse. Beware
You never speak a truth—
PEREGRINE HOW!
POLITIC Not to strangers,[0] foreigners
For those be they you must converse with most;
Others[0] I would not know, sir, but at distance, fellow countrymen
So as I still might be a saver[4] in em.
You shall have tricks else passed upon you hourly.
And then, for your religion, profess none,
But wonder at the diversity of all,
And, for your part, protest, were there no other
But simply the laws o'th'land, you could content you.
Nick Machiavel and Monsieur Bodin both
Were of this mind.[5] Then must you learn the use
And handling of your silver fork[0] at meals, an Italian novelty
The metal[0] of your glass—these are main matters composition
With your Italian—and to know the hour
When you must eat your melons and your figs.
PEREGRINE IS that a point of state,[0] too? statecraft
POLITIC Here it is.
For your Venetian, if he see a man
Preposterous in the least, he has[0] him straight; sees through
He has, he strips[0] him. I'll acquaint you, sir. ridicules; defrauds
I now have lived here—'tis some fourteen months;
Within the first week of my landing here,
All took me for a citizen of Venice,
I knew the forms so well—
PEREGRINE [aside] And nothing else.
POLITIC I had read Contarine,[6] took me a house,
Dealt with my Jews[7] to furnish it with movables[0]— household goods
Well, if I could but find one man, one man
To mine own heart, whom I durst trust, I would—

4.1
[1] I will not discuss those familiar ("old") topics: the language one ought to use or the clothes one ought to wear. In the next line, in an attempt at a joke, Peregrine deliberately misconstrues "your clothes" to refer to his own apparel, but Politic does not get it.
[2] As for a traveler's bearing.
[3] An apparently trivial story subject to political allegorization.
[4] So that I might not be imposed upon. ("Be a saver" is a gambling term, meaning "to escape loss.")
[5] Political theorists Niccolo Machiavelli (1469-1527) and Jean Bodin (1530-1596) argued that religious zeal was often politically inexpedient or divisive; as a result both were popularly thought to be atheists.
[6] An English translation of Gasparo Contarini's important book, The Commonwealth and Government of Venice, was published in 1599.
[7] The usual Jews. (In Venice Jews served as moneylenders and pawnbrokers.)

PEREGRINE What? What, sir?
POLITIC Make him rich, make him a fortune.
He should not think[0] again. I would command it. have to think
PEREGRINE AS how?
POLITIC With certain projects[0] that I have— entrepreneurial schemes
Which I may not discover.[0] reveal
PEREGRINE [aside] If I had
But one[0] to wager with, I would lay odds, now, Someone
He tells me instantly.
POLITIC One is—and that
I care not greatly who knows—to serve the state
Of Venice with red herrings for three years,
And at a certain rate, from Rotterdam,[8]
Where I have correspondence. [He shows PEREGRINE a paper.]
There's a letter
Sent me from one o'th'States,[0] and to that purpose; Dutch provinces
He cannot write his name, but that's his mark.
PEREGRINE [examining the paper] He is a chandler?[9]
POLITIC NO, a cheesemonger.
There are some other[0] too, with whom I treat[0] others / deal
About the same negotiation;
And I will undertake it, for 'tis thus
I'll do't with ease; I've cast it all.[0] Your hoy[1] figured it all out
Carries but three men in her and a boy,
And she shall make me three returns[0] a year. round trips
So if there come but one of three, I save;[0] break even
If two, I can defalk.[0] But this is, now, pay off loans
If my main project fail.
PEREGRINE Then you have others?
POLITIC I should be loath to draw[0] the subtle air breathe
Of such a place without my thousand aims.
I'll not dissemble, sir: where'er I come,
I love to be considerative;[0] and 'tis true analytic
I have at my free hours thought upon
Some certain goods[0] unto the state of Venice, benefits
Which I do call my cautions,[0] and, sir, which precautions
I mean, in hope of pension,[0] to propound financial reward
To the Great Council, then unto the Forty,
So to the Ten.[2] My means[0] are made already— contacts
PEREGRINE By whom?
POLITIC Sir, one that though his place b'obscure,
Yet he can sway and they will hear him. He's A commendatore.
PEREGRINE What, a common sergeant?

---

[8] Venice, on the Adriatic Sea, had little need to import pickled fish from afar.
[9] Candlemaker. (Evidently the paper is grease-stained.)
[1] Small vessel, not suitable for long voyages. Sir Pol's scheme is thus obviously impractical.
[2] The Great Council was a large legislative group made up of wealthy Venetians; the Councils of Forty were much smaller groups that oversaw judicial affairs; the Council of Ten consisted of the elected Doge and his cabinet.

POLITIC Sir, such as they are put it in their mouths
What they should say, sometimes, as well as greater.[3]
I think I have my notes to show you—
[He searches in his garments.]
PEREGRINE Good, sir.
POLITIC But you shall swear unto me on your gentry° gentleman's honor
Not to anticipate—
PEREGRINE I, sir?
POLITIC Nor reveal
A circumstance—My paper is not with me.
PEREGRINE Oh, but you can remember, sir.
POLITIC My first is Concerning tinderboxes.° You must know for lighting fires
No family is here without its box.
Now, sir, it being so portable a thing,
Put case° that you or I were ill affected° suppose / disposed
Unto the state; sir, with it in our pockets
Might not I go into the Arsenale?[4]
Of you? Come out again? And none the wiser?
PEREGRINE Except yourself, sir.
POLITIC GO tO,° then. I therefore impatient expression
Advertise to° the state how fit it were warn
That none but such as were known patriots,
Sound lovers of their country, should be suffered
T'enjoy them° in their houses, and even those tinderhoxes
Sealed° at some office, and at such a bigness licensed; sealed shut
As might not lurk in pockets.
PEREGRINE Admirable!
POLITIC My next is, how t'inquire and be resolved° satisfied
By present° demonstration whether a ship immediate Newly arrived from Syria, or from Any suspected part of all the Levant,° Middle East
Be guilty of the plague. And where they use° are accustomed
To lie out° forty, fifty days sometimes at anchor
About the Lazaretto,[5] for their trial,
I'll save that charge and loss unto the merchant,
And in an hour clear the doubt.
PEREGRINE Indeed, sir?
POLITIC Or—I will lose my labor.
PEREGRINE My faith, that's much.
POLITIC Nay, sir, conceive° me. 'Twill cost me in onions[6] understand
Some thirty livres°— French coins
PEREGRINE Which is one pound sterling.
POLITIC Beside my waterworks. For this I do, sir.
First I bring in your ship° 'twixt two brick walls— a ship in question
But those the state shall venture.° On the one pay for

---

[3] Common men, as well as those of higher status, may sometimes make suggestions to the government.

[4] Shipyard where Venice built and repaired its naval vessels.

[5] Quarantine hospital on an outlying island.

[6] Onions were popularly supposed to absorb plague infection,

I strain° me a fair tarpaulin, and in that stretch
I stick my onions cut in halves; the other
Is full of loopholes out at which I thrust
The noses of my bellows, and those bellows
I keep with° waterworks in perpetual motion[7]— by means of Which is the easiest matter of a hundred.° as easy as can be
Now, sir, your onion, which doth naturally
Attract th'infection, and your bellows, blowing
The air upon him,° will show instantly it (the onion)
By his changed color if there be contagion,
Or else remain as fair as at the first.
Now 'tis known, 'tis nothing.° there's nothing to it
PEREGRINE You are right, sir.
POLITIC I would I had my note.
[He searches again in his garments.]
PEREGRINE Faith, so would I;
But, you ha' done well for once, sir.
POLITIC Were I false,° traitorous
Or would be made so, I could show you reasons
How I could sell this state now to the Turk,[8]
Spite of their galleys° or their— warships
PEREGRINE Pray you, Sir Pol.
POLITIC I have 'em° not about me. the notes
PEREGRINE That I feared.
They are there, sir? [He indicates a book POLITIC is holding.]
POLITIC NO, this is my diary,
Wherein I note my actions of the day.[9]
PEREGRINE Pray you, let's see, sir. What is here? [Reading]
"Notandum Be it noted
A rat had gnawn my spur leathers;° notwithstanding laces
I put on new and did go forth, but first
I threw three beans over the threshold.° Item, for good luck
I went and bought two toothpicks, whereof one
I burst immediately in a discourse
With a Dutch merchant, 'bout ragion' del stato.° political expediency
From him I went, and paid a moccinigo° small coin
For piecing° my silk stockings; by the way mending
I cheapened sprats,[1] and at Saint Mark's I urined."
Faith, these are politic notes!
POLITIC Sir, I do slip° let pass
No action of my life thus but I quote° it. without noting
PEREGRINE Believe me, it is wise!
POLITIC Nay, sir, read forth.

[7] Perpetual-motion machines were popular attractions in early modern England, but Jonson regarded them contemptuously. Since Venice is in flat marshland, there are no waterfalls to harness there, as Sir Pol proposes.

[8] The Ottoman Turks, southeast of Venice along the Adriatic Sea, were maritime and religious rivals and a long-standing military threat.

[9] Many Renaissance travel writers recommended that travelers keep a written record of their journeys.

[1] Bargained over some small fish.

SCENE 2. The scene continues.

[Enter] LADY [WOULD-BE], NANO, [and the two] WOMEN.
[They do not see POLITIC and PEREGRINE at first.]

LADY WOULD-BE Where should this loose knight be, trow?° do you suppose?
Sure he's housed.° in a brothel
NANO Why, then he's fast.° fast-moving; secure
LADY WOULD-BE Ay, he plays both° with me. both fast and loose
I pray you, stay. This heat will do more harm
To my complexion than his heart is worth.
I do not care to hinder, but to take° him. catch
[She rubs her cheeks.]
How it° comes off! the makeup
FIRST WOMAN [pointing] My master's yonder.
LADY WOULD-BE Where?
FIRST WOMAN With a young gentleman.
LADY WOULD-BE That same's the party,
In man's apparel![1] [To NANO] Pray you, sir, jog my knight.
I will be tender to his reputation,
However he demerit.° deserves blame
POLITIC [seeing her] My lady!
PEREGRINE Where?
POLITIC 'Tis she indeed, sir; you shall know her. She is,
Were she not mine,[2] a lady of that merit
For fashion and behavior; and for beauty
I durst compare—
PEREGRINE It seems you are not jealous,
That dare commend her.
POLITIC Nay, and for discourse—
PEREGRINE Being your wife, she cannot miss° that. lack (sarcastic)
POLITIC [introducing PEREGRINE] Madam,
Here is a gentleman; pray you use him fairly.
He seems a youth, but he is—
LADY WOULD-BE None?
POLITIC Yes, one
Has° put his face as soon° into the world— who has / so young
LADY WOULD-BE YOU mean, as early? But today
POLITIC HOW'S this!
LADY WOULD-BE Why, in this habit,° sir; you apprehend° me. apparel / understand
Well, Master Would-be, this doth not become you;
I had thought the odor, sir, of your good name
Had been more precious to you, that you would not Have done this dire massacre on your honor—
One of your gravity and rank besides!
But knights, I see, care little for the oath
They make to ladies, chiefly their own ladies.
POLITIC Now, by my spurs—the symbol of my knighthood—

4.2
[1] Lady Would-be believes that Peregrine is the whore Mosca mentioned, in transvestite attire.
[2] Even though I, her husband, say so.

PEREGRINE (aside) Lord, how his brain is humbled[3] for an oath!
POLITIC —I reach° you not. comprehend
LADY WOULD-BE Right, sir, your polity° cunning
May bear° it through thus. [To PEREGRINE] Sir, a word with you. bluff
I would be loath to contest publicly
With any gentlewoman, or to seem
Froward° or violent; as The Courtier[4] says, bad-tempered
It comes too near rusticity° in a lady, ill breeding
Which I would shun by all means. And however
I may deserve from Master Would-be, yet
T' have one fair gentlewoman° thus be made i.e., Peregrine
Th'unkind instrument to wrong another,
And one she knows not, ay, and to persevere,
In my poor judgment is not warranted
From being a solecism° in our sex, impropriety
If not in manners.
PEREGRINE How is this?
POLITIC Sweet madam,
Come nearer to your aim.° speak more clearly
LADY WOULD-BE Marry, and will, sir.
Since you provoke me with your impudence
And laughter of your light land-siren[5] here,
Your Sporus,[6] your hermaphrodite—
PEREGRINE What's here?
Poetic fury and historic storms![7]
POLITIC The gentleman, believe it, is of worth,
And of our nation.
LADY WOULD-BE Ay, your Whitefriars° nation! London brothel district
Come, I blush for you, Master Would-be, I,
And am ashamed you should ha' no more forehead° shame
Than thus to be the patron, or Saint George,[8]
To a lewd harlot, a base fricatrice,° whore
A female devil in a male outside.
POLITIC [to PEREGRINE] Nay,
An° you be such a one, I must bid adieu If
To your delights. The case appears too liquid.[9]
[POLITIC starts to leave.]
LADY WOULD-BE Ay, you may carry't clear, with your state-face!° dignified expression
But for your carnival concupiscence,° lecherous strumpet
Who here is fled for liberty of conscience° licentious conduct
From furious persecution of the marshal,[1]
Her will I disc'ple.° discipline

---

[3] Literally, "brought down" to his feet—where spurs, the appurtenances of a knight, are worn.
[4] Baldassare Castiglione's famous handbook of gentility.
[5] The Sirens were mythical sea creatures who lured sailors to their deaths by sitting on dangerous rocks and singing irresistibly. (Lady Would-be refers to Peregrine.)
[6] A eunuch whom the emperor Nero dressed in drag and married.
[7] Peregrine notes that even Lady Would-be's tantrums include literary allusions.
[8] Patron saint of England, often pictured rescuing a damsel from a dragon.
[9] Obvious. (Politic has become convinced that his wife is right in believing that Peregrine is a transvestite whore.)
[1] Official charged with punishing prostitutes. Lady Would-be thinks that Peregrine has dressed as a man to flee prosecution.

[Exit POLITIC, LADY POLITIC UCCOStS PEREGRINE.]

PEREGRINE This is fine, i'faith!
And do you use this° often? Is this part act this way
Of your wit's exercise, 'gainst you have occasion?[2]
Madam—
LADY WOULD-BE GO tO,° sir. impatient expression
PEREGRINE Do you hear me, lady?
Why, if your knight have set you to beg shirts,[3]
Or to invite me home, you might have done it
A nearer° way by far. more direct
LADY WOULD-BE This cannot work you
Out of my snare.
PEREGRINE Why, am I in it, then?
Indeed, your husband told me you were fair,
And so you are; only your nose inclines—
That side that's next the sun—to the queen-apple.[4]
LADY WOULD-BE This cannot be endured by any patience.

SCENE 3. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA.

MOSCA What's the matter, madam?
LADY WOULD-RE If the Senate° Venetian government
Right not my quest° in this, I will protest 'em petition
To all the world no aristocracy.
MOSCA What is the injury, lady?
LADY WOULD-BE Why, the callet° prostitute
You told me of, here I have ta'en disguised.
MOSCA Who, this? What means Your Ladyship? The creature
I mentioned to you is apprehended now
Before the Senate. You shall see her—
LADY WOULD-BE Where?
MOSCA I'll bring you to her. This young gentleman,
I saw him land this morning at the port.
LADY WOULD-BE Is't possible! How has my judgment wandered!
[Releasing PEREGRINE] Sir, I must, blushing, say to you I have erred,
And plead your pardon.
PEREGRINE What, more changes yet?
LADY WOULD-BE I hope you ha' not the malice to remember
A gentlewoman's passion. If you stay
In Venice here, please you to use me,[1] sir—
MOSCA Will you go, madam?
LADY WOULD-BE Pray you, sir, use me. In faith,
The more you see me, the more I shall conceive
You have forgot our quarrel.

[Exeunt MOSCA, LADY WOULD-BE, NANO, and WOMEN.]

---

[2] To keep it ready for when it is really needed?

[3] Peregrine pretends to believe that Lady Would-be is tearing off his shirt in order to give it to her husband. Probably she is just trying to prevent his leaving.

[4] A bright red apple. See 3.4.15—16, where we learn that Lady Would-be is sensitive about her red nose.

4.3

[1] Make use of my services. (With a sexual innuendo continued in "The more you see me, the more I shall conceive" [line 18], where "conceive" means both "understand" and "conceive a child.")

PEREGRINE This is rare!
Sir Politic Would-be? No, Sir Politic Bawd,
To bring me thus acquainted with his wife!
Well, wise Sir Pol, since you have practiced thus
Upon my freshmanship,[2] I'll try your salt-head,
What proof[0] it is against a counterplot. [Exit.] how invulnerable

SCENE 4. The Scrutineo, or Court of Law, in the Doge's palace

[Enter] VOLTORE, CORBACCIO, CORVINO, [and] MOSCA.

VOLTORE Well, now you know the carriage[0] of the business, management
Your constancy is all that is required
Unto the safety of it.
MOSCA Is the lie
Safely conveyed[0] amongst us? Is that sure? agreed upon
Knows every man his burden?[0] refrain, tune
CORVINO Yes.
MOSCA Then shrink not.
CORVINO [aside to MOSCA] But knows the advocate the truth?
MOSCA [aside to CORVINO] Oh, sir,
By no means. I devised a formal[0] tale elaborate
That salved your reputation. But be valiant, sir.
CORVINO I fear no one but him,[0] that this his pleading Voltore
Should make him stand for a co-heir—
MOSCA Co-halter![1]
Hang him, we will but use his tongue, his noise,
As we do Croaker's,[0] here. Corbaccio's
CORVINO Ay, what shall he do?
MOSCA When we ha' done, you mean?
CORVINO Yes.
MOSCA Why, we'll think—
Sell him for mummia;[2] he's half dust already.
{[Aside] to VOLTORE) DO not you smile to see this buffalo,[3]
How he doth sport it with his head? [To himself] I should,
If all were well and past. {[Aside] to CORBACCIO) Sir, only you
Are he that shall enjoy the crop[0] of all, harvest
And these not know for whom they toil.
CORBACCIO Ay, peace!
MOSCA {[aside] to CORVINO) But you shall eat it. [To himself]
Much![0] (then to VOLTORE again) Worshipful sir, Sure you will!
Mercury[4] sit upon your thund'ring tongue,
Or the French Hercules, and make your language
As conquering as his club,[5] to beat along,
As with a tempest, flat, our adversaries!

---

[2] Taken advantage of my inexperience. (Peregrine apparently believes that Sir Pol has deliberately involved him in a humiliating setup. "Salt-head," following, plays on both "salt" meaning "seasoned," "old," and "salt" meaning "lecherous."

4.4

[1] Playing on "halter," a hangman's noose, to suggest that both Corbaccio and Voltore are being duped.

[2] Powdered embalmed corpse, used medicinally.

[3] Corvino, with his cuckold's horns.

[4] May the god of rhetoric (and thieves).

[5] After his tenth labor, according to some legendary accounts, Hercules, aged by now but powerfully eloquent, fathered the Celts in Gaul, or France. He was traditionally pictured with a club.

[Aside to CORVINO*]* But much more yours,° sir. your adversaries
VOLTORE Here they come. Ha' done.° shut up
MOSCA I have another witness° if you need, sir, Lady Would-be
I can produce.
VOLTORE Who is it?
MOSCA Sir, I have her.

SCENE 5. The scene continues.

[Enter] four AVOCATORI, BONARIO, CELIA. Notario
[NOTORY], COMMENDATORI° [and other court officials]. laiv court deputies

FIRST AVOCATORE The like of this the Senate never heard of.
SECOND AVOCATORE 'Twill come most strange to them when we report it.
FOURTH AVOCATORE The gentlewoman has been ever held
Of unreproved name.
THIRD AVOCATORE So, the young man.
FOURTH AVOCATORE The more unnatural part that of his father.
SECOND AVOCATORE More of the husband.
FIRST AVOCATORE I not know to give
His act a name, it is so monstrous!
FOURTH AVOCATORE But the impostor,° he is a thing created Volpone
T'exceed example!° precedent
FIRST AVOCATORE And all aftertimes!° later eras
SECOND AVOCATORE I never heard a true voluptuary
Described but him.
THIRD AVOCATORE Appear yet those were cited?
NOTARY All but the old magnifico, Volpone.
FIRST AVOCATORE Why is not he here?
MOSCA Please Your Fatherhoods,
Here is his advocate. Himself's so weak,
So feeble—
FOURTH AVOCATORE What are you?
BONARIO His parasite,
His knave, his pander! I beseech the court
He may be forced to come, that your grave eyes
May bear strong witness of his strange impostures.
VOLTORE Upon my faith and credit with your virtues,
He is not able to endure the air.
SECOND AVOCATORE Bring him, however.
THIRD AVOCATORE We will see him.
FOURTH AVOCATORE Fetch him.
[Exit officers.]
VOLTORE Your Fatherhoods' fit pleasures be obeyed,
But sure the sight will rather move your pities
Than indignation. May it please the court,
In the meantime he may be heard in me.
I know this place most void of prejudice,
And therefore crave it, since we have no reason
To fear our truth should hurt our cause.
THIRD AVOCATORE Speak free.
VOLTORE Then know, most honored fathers, I must now

Discover° to your strangely abused ears reveal
The most prodigious and most frontless° piece shameless
Of solid° impudence and treachery complete
That ever vicious nature yet brought forth
To shame the state of Venice. [Indicating CECLIA] This lewd woman,
That wants° no artificial looks or tears who lacks
To help the visor° she has now put on, (weeping) mask
Hath long been known a close° adulteress secret; intimate
To that lascivious youth there [indicating BONARIO]; not suspected,
I say, but known, and taken in the act
With him; and by this man, the easy° husband, lenient
Pardoned; whose timeless° bounty makes him now unseasonable; endless
Stand here, the most unhappy, innocent person
That ever man's own goodness made accused.[1]
For these, not knowing how to owe" a gift acknowledge
Of that dear grace but° with their shame, being placed other than
So above all powers of their gratitude,[2]
Began to hate the benefit, and in place
Of thanks devise t'extirp° the memory to extirpate, wipe out
Of such an act. Wherein I pray Your Fatherhoods
To observe the malice, yea, the rage of creatures
Discovered in their evils, and what heart° audacity
Such take even from their crimes. But that anon
Will more appear. This gentleman, the father,
[indicating CORBACCIO]
Hearing of this foul fact,° with many others deed
Which daily struck at his too tender ears,
And grieved in nothing more than that he could not Preserve himself a parent—his son's ills° evil deeds
Growing to that strange flood—at last decreed
To disinherit him.
FIRST AVOCATORE These be strange turns!
SECOND AVOCATORE The young man's fame° was ever fair reputation and honest.
VOLTORE So much more full of danger is his vice,
That can beguile so under shade of virtue.
But, as I said, my honored sires, his father
Having this settled purpose, by what means
To him° betrayed we know not, and this day Bonario
Appointed for the deed, that parricide—
I cannot style him better°—by confederacy give him a better name
Preparing this his paramour to be there,
Entered Volpone's house—who was the man,
Your Fatherhoods must understand, designed
For the inheritance—there sought his father.
But with what purpose sought he him, my lords?
I tremble to pronounce it, that a son

4.5

[1] That ever had his own goodness turned against him.

[2] Since the rare value of Corvino's forgiveness was so far beyond their powers of gratitude.

Unto a father, and to such a father,
Should have so foul, felonious intent:
It was to murder him. When, being prevented
By his more happy° absence, what then did he? Corbaccio's fortunate
Not check his wicked thoughts; no, now new deeds—
Mischief doth ever end where it begins[3]—
An act of horror, fathers! He dragged forth
The aged gentleman, that had there lain bedrid
Three years and more, out of his innocent couch;
Naked upon the floor there left him; wounded
His servant in the face, and with this strumpet,
The stale° to his forged practice,° who was glad decoy/plot
To be so active—I shall here desire
Your Fatherhoods to note but my collections° deductions
As most remarkable—thought at once to stop
His father's ends,° discredit his free choice aims
In the old gentleman,° redeem themselves Volpone
By laying infamy upon this man° Corvino
To whom with blushing they should owe their lives.
FIRST AVOCATORE What proofs have you of this?
BONARIO Most honored fathers,
I humbly crave there be no credit given
To this man's mercenary tongue.
SECOND AVOCATORE Forbear.
BONARIO His soul moves in his fee.
THIRD AVOCATORE Oh, sir!
BONARIO This fellow,
For six sols° more, would plead against his Maker. halfpennies
FIRST AVOCATORE You do forget yourself.
VOLTORE Nay, nay, grave fathers,
Let him have scope. Can any man imagine
That he will spare 's° accuser, that would not spare his
Have spared his parent?
FIRST AVOCATORE Well, produce your proofs.
CELIA I would I could forget I were a creature!° living being
VOLTORE [calling a witness] Signor Corbaccio!
FOURTH AVOCATORE What is he?
VOLTORE The father.
SECOND AVOCATORE Has he had an oath?
NOTARY Yes.
CORBACCIO What must I do now?
NOTARY Your testimony's craved.
CORBACCIO [mis-hearing] Speak to the knave?
I'll ha' my mouth first stopped with earth! My heart
Abhors his knowledge;° I disclaim in° him. knowing him/disavow
FIRST AVOCATORE But for what cause?
CORBACCIO The mere portent of nature.[4]
He is an utter stranger to my loins.

---

[3] Wickedness is always persistent.
[4] A completely monstrous birth. (A deformed child was often considered to be a portent, or evil omen.)

BONARIO Have they made you to this?
CORBACCIO I will not hear thee,
Monster of men, swine, goat, wolf, parricide!
Speak not, thou viper.
BONARIO Sir, I will sit down,
And rather wish my innocence should suffer
Than I resist the authority of a father.
VOLTORE [calling a witness] Signor Corvino!
SECOND AVOCATORE This is strange!
FIRST AVOCATORE Who's this?
NOTARY The husband.
FOURTH AVOCATORE Is he sworn?
NOTARY He is.
THIRD AVOCATORE Speak, then.
CORVINO This woman, please Your Fatherhoods, is a whore
Of most hot exercise, more than a partridge,[5]
Upon record°— as is well attested
FIRST AVOCATORE No more.
CORVINO Neighs like a jennet.° mare (in heat)
NOTARY Preserve the honor of the court.
CORVINO I shall,
And modesty of your most reverend ears.
And yet I hope that I may say these eyes
Have seen her glued unto that piece of cedar,
That fine well-timbered gallant;[6] and that here
[Pointing to his forehead] The letters may be read, thorough the horn,[7]
That make the story perfect.° complete
MOSCA [aside to CORVINO] Excellent, sir!
CORVINO [aside to MOSCA] There is no shame in this, now, is there?
MOSCA [aside to CORVINO] None.
CORVINO [to the court] Or if I said I hoped that she were onward° well on her way
To her damnation, if there be a hell
Greater than whore and woman—a good Catholic
May make the doubt°— may wonder
THIRD AVOCATORE His grief hath made him frantic.
FIRST AVOCATORE Remove him hence. She [CELIA] swoons.
SECOND AVOCATORE Look to the woman!
CORVINO [taunting her] Rare!
Prettily feigned! Again!
FOURTH AVOCATORE Stand from about her.
FIRST AVOCATORE Give her the air.
THIRD AVOCATORE [to MOSCA] What can you say?
MOSCA My wound,
May't please Your Wisdoms, speaks for me, received
In aid of my good patron when he° missed Bonario

---

[5] A bird capable of numerous consecutive sexual acts and so a byword for lechery.

[6] Corvino sarcastically compliments Bonario as a strapping fellow to whom Celia no doubt wishes to cling. The cedars of the Middle East are tall and stately.

[7] Children learned to read the alphabet from pages protected by transparent sheets of horn. (With an allusion to the cuckold's horn.)

His sought-for father, when that well-taught dame
Had her cue given her to cry out a rape.
BONARIO Oh, most laid° impudence! Fathers— premeditated
THIRD AVOCATORE Sir, be silent.
You had your hearing free,° so must they theirs. uninterrupted
SECOND AVOCATORE I do begin to doubt th'imposture here.
FOURTH AVOCATORE This woman has too many moods.
VOLTORE Grave fathers,
She is a creature of a most professed
And prostituted lewdness.
CORVINO Most impetuous!
Unsatisfied,° grave fathers! insatiable
VOLTORE May her feignings
Not take° Your Wisdoms! But° this day she baited take in / only
A stranger, a grave knight, with her loose eyes
And more lascivious kisses. This man° saw 'em Mosca
Together on the water in a gondola.
MOSCA Here is the lady herself that saw 'em too,
Without;° who then had in the open streets waiting outside
Pursued them, but for saving her knight's honor.
FIRST AVOCATORE Produce that lady.
SECOND AVOCATORE Let her come.
[Exit MOSCA.]
FOURTH AVOCATORE These things,
They strike with wonder!
THIRD AVOCATORE I am turned a stone!

SCENE 6. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA [and] LADY [WOULD-BE],
MOSCA Be resolute, madam.
LADY WOULD-BE Ay, this same is she.
[To CELIA] Out, thou chameleon° harlot! Now thine eyes deceitfully changeable
Vie tears with the hyena.[1] Dar'st thou look Upon my wronged face? [To the AVOCATORI] I cry° your pardons. beg
I fear I have forgettingly transgressed
Against the dignity of the court—
SECOND AVOCATORE NO, madam.
LADY WOULD-BE And been exorbitant°— excessive
SECOND AVOCATORE You have not, lady.
FOURTH AVOCATORE These proofs are strong.
LADY WOULD-BE Surely, I had no purpose
To scandalize your honors, or my sex's.
THIRD AVOCATORE We do believe it.
LADY WOULD-BE Surely, you may believe it.
SECOND AVOCATORE Madam, we do.
LADY WOULD-BE Indeed, you may. My breeding
Is not so coarse—
FOURTH AVOCATORE We know it.

4.6
[1] A symbol of treachery, the hyena was supposed to be able to change its sex and the color of its eyes at will and to imitate human voices.

LADY WOULD-BE —to offend
With pertinacy°— stubborn resolution
THIRD AVOCATORE Lady—
LADY WOULD-BE —such a presence;
No, surely.
FIRST AVOCATORE We well think it.
LADY WOULD-BE YOU may think it.
FIRST AVOCATORE [to the other AVOCATORI] Let her o'ercome.° have the last word
[To CELIA and BONARIO] What witnesses have you
To make good your report?
BONARIO Our consciences.
CELIA And heaven, that never fails the innocent.
FOURTH AVOCATORE These are no testimonies.
BONARIO Not in your courts,
Where multitude and clamor overcomes.
FIRST AVOCATORE Nay, then, you do wax insolent.
VOLPONE is brought in [on a litter], as impotent.° disabled
[LADY WOULD-BE embraces him.]° see 5.2.97
VOLTORE Here, here
The testimony comes that will convince
And put to utter dumbness their bold tongues.
See here, grave fathers, here's the ravisher,
The rider on men's wives, the great impostor,
The grand voluptuary! Do you not think
These limbs should affect venery?[2] Or these eyes
Covet a concubine? Pray you, mark these hands:
Are they not fit to stroke a lady's breasts?
Perhaps he doth dissemble?
BONARIO So he does.
VOLTORE Would you ha' him tortured?
BONARIO I would have him proved.[3]
VOLTORE Best try him, then, with goads or burning irons;
Put him to the strappado.[4] I have heard
The rack[5] hath cured the gout; faith, give it him
And help him of a malady; be courteous.
I'll undertake, before these honored fathers,
He shall have yet as many left° diseases remaining
As she has known adulterers, or thou strumpets.
O my most equal° hearers, if these deeds, impartial
Acts of this bold and most exorbitant strain,
May pass with sufferance,° what one citizen be permitted
But owes the forfeit of his life, yea, fame
To him that dares traduce him?[6] Which of you
Are safe, my honored fathers? I would ask,
With leave of Your grave Fatherhoods, if their plot

---

[2] Delight in sexual activity.
[3] Tested for impotence, a regular court procedure in some divorce and rape cases. (Torture was another method sometimes used to extract confessions.)
[4] Torture in which the victim's arms were tied behind his back; he was then hoisted up by the wrists and dropped.
[5] Torture instrument that stretched the victim to the point of dislocating his joints.
[6] What citizen is there whose life and reputation might not be forfeit to a slanderer?

Have any face or color like to truth?
Or if unto the dullest nostril here
It smell not rank and most abhorred slander?
I crave your care of this good gentleman,
Whose life is much endangered by their fable;
And as for them, I will conclude with this:
That vicious persons, when they are hot, and fleshed[7]
In impious acts, their constancy° abounds. resoluteness
Damned deeds are done with greatest confidence.
FIRST AVOCATORE Take 'em to custody, and sever them.
SECOND AVOCATORE Tis pity two such prodigies° should live. monsters
[Exeunt CELIA and BONARIO, guarded.]
FIRST AVOCATORE Let the old gentleman be returned with care.
I'm sorry our credulity wronged him.
[Exeunt litter-bearers with VOLPONE.]
FOURTH AVOCATORE These are two creatures!° monsters
THIRD AVOCATORE I have an earthquake in me!
SECOND AVOCATORE Their shame, even in their cradles, fled their faces.
FOURTH AVOCATORE [to VOLTORE] You've done a worthy service to the state, sir,
In their discovery.
FIRST AVOCATORE You shall hear ere night
What punishment the court decrees upon em.
VOLTORE We thank Your Fatherhoods.
[Exeunt AVOCATORI, NOTARY, COMMENDATORI.]
[To MOSCA] HOW like you it?
MOSCA Rare!
I'd ha' your tongue, sir, tipped with gold for this;
I'd ha' you be the heir to the whole city;
The earth I'd have want men ere you want living.° lack income
They're bound to erect your statue in Saint Mark's.—
Signor Corvino, I would have you go
And show yourself,[8] that you have conquered
CORVINO Yes.
MOSCA [aside to CORVINO] It was much better that you should profess
Yourself a cuckold thus, than that the other[9]
Should have been proved.
CORVINO Nay, I considered that.
Now it is her fault.
MOSCA Then it had been yours.
CORVINO True. I do doubt this advocate still.
MOSCA I'faith,
You need not; I dare ease you of that care.
CORVINO I trust thee, Mosca.
MOSCA As your own soul, sir.
[Exit CORVINO.]
CORBACCIO Mosca!
MOSCA Now for your business, sir.

---

[7] Excited by the taste of blood, like hunting hounds.

[8] Appear in public. (To indicate that he is not ashamed of having admitted to being a cuckold.)

[9] The attempt to prostitute Celia to Volpone.

CORBACCIO How? Ha' you business?
MOSCA Yes, yours, sir.
CORBACCIO Oh, none else?
MOSCA None else, not I.
CORBACCIO Be careful, then.
MOSCA Best you with both your eyes,° sir. rest assured
CORBACCIO Dispatch it.[1]
MOSCA Instantly.
CORBACCIO And look that all
Whatever be put in: jewels, plate, moneys,
Household stuff, bedding, curtains.
MOSCA Curtain rings, sir.
Only the advocate's fee must be deducted.
CORBACCIO I'll pay him, now; you'll be too prodigal.
MOSCA Sir, I must tender° it. present
CORBACCIO Two cecchines is well?
MOSCA No, six, sir.
CORBACCIO 'Tis too much.
MOSCA He talked a great while,
You must consider that, sir.
CORBACCIO [giving money] Well, there's three—
MOSCA I'll give it him.
CORBACCIO Do so, and [he tips MOSCA*]* there's for thee.
[Exit CORBACCIO.]
MOSCA [aside] Bountiful bones! What horrid strange offense
Did he commit 'gainst nature in his youth
Worthy this age?° [To VOLTORE*]* You see, sir, how I work to deserve this old age
Unto your ends; take you no notice.° leave it to me
VOLTORE No,
I'll leave you.
MOSCA All is yours, [Exit VOLTORE.]
[aside] the devil and all,
Good advocate! [To LADY WOULD-BE] Madam, I'll bring you home
LADY WOULD-BE No, I'll go see your patron.
MOSCA That you shall not.
I'll tell you why. My purpose is to urge
My patron to reform° his will; and, for
The zeal you've shown today, whereas before
You were but third or fourth, you shall be now
Put in the first, which would appear as begged
If you were present. Therefore—
LADY WOULD-BE You shall sway me.
[Exeunt.]

Act 5

SCENE 1. VOLPONE'S house.

[Enter] VOLPONE [attended].
VOLPONE Well, I am here, and all this brunt° is past.

---

[1] I.e., Hurry to make Volpone's will, since Corbaccio has already delivered on his half of the promise.

I ne'er was in dislike with my disguise
Till this fled° moment; here 'twas good, in private, past
But, in your public—cave° whilst I breathe. watch out
Fore God, my left leg 'gan to have the cramp,
And I apprehended straight° some power had struck me thought at once
With a dead palsy.° Well, I must be merry paralysis
And shake it off. A many of these fears
Would put me into some villainous disease,
Should they come thick upon me. I'll prevent 'em.
Give me a bowl of lusty wine to fright
This humor from my heart.[1]—Hum, hum, hum! He drinks.
'Tis almost gone already; I shall conquer,° overcome my fears
Any device, now, of rare ingenious knavery,
That would possess me with a violent laughter,
Would make me up° again. So, so, so, so. Drinks again. restore me
This heat is life; 'tis blood by this time. [Calling] Mosca!

SCENE 2. The scene continues.

[Enter] MOSCA

MOSCA How now, sir? Does the day look clear again?
Are we recovered and wrought out of error
Into our way, to see our path before us?
Is our trade free once more?
VOLPONE Exquisite Mosca!
MOSCA Was it not carried learnedly?
VOLPONE And stoutly.° resolutely
Good wits are greatest in extremities.
MOSCA It were a folly beyond thought to trust
Any grand act unto a cowardly spirit.
You are not taken with it enough, methinks?
VOLPONE Oh, more than if I had enjoyed the wench!
The pleasure of all womankind's not like it.
MOSCA Why, now you speak, sir. We must here be fixed;
Here we must rest. This is our masterpiece.
We cannot think to go beyond this.
VOLPONE True,
Th'hast played thy prize,[1] my precious Mosca.
MOSCA Nay, sir,
To gull° the court— hoodwink
VOLPONE And quite divert the torrent
Upon the innocent.
MOSCA Yes, and to make
So rare a music out of discords[2]—
VOLPONE Right.
That yet to me's the strangest, how th'ast borne it!° brought it off
That these,° being so divided 'mongst themselves, these men
Should not scent° somewhat, or° in me or thee, suspect I either

5.1
[1] Wine was supposed to convert quickly to blood (see line 17), thus giving courage to the drinker.
5.2
[1] Professional fencers "played the prize," i.e., competed for purses and titles, in virtuoso displays of swordsmanship.
[2] To bring harmony out of various discordant elements was thought to be the highest achievement of art.

Or doubt their own side." position
MOSCA True, they will not see't.
Too much light blinds em, I think. Each of 'em
Is so possessed and stuffed with his own hopes
That anything unto the contrary,
Never so true or never so apparent,
Never so palpable, they will resist it—
VOLPONE Like a temptation of the devil.
MOSCA Bight, sir.
Merchants may talk of trade, and your great signors
Of land that yields well; but if Italy
Have any glebe° more fruitful than these fellows, soil
I am deceived. Did not your advocate rare?° do brilliantly
VOLPONE Oh!—"My most honored fathers, my grave fathers,
Under correction of Your Fatherhoods,
What face of truth is here? If these strange deeds
May pass, most honored fathers"—I had much ado
To forbear laughing.
MOSCA 'T seemed to me you sweat,° sir. sweated (with fear)
VOLPONE In troth, I did a little.
MOSCA But confess, sir,
Were you not daunted?
VOLPONE In good faith, I was
A little in a mist,° but not dejected;° uncertain / overwhelmed
Never but still myself.
MOSCA I think° it, sir. believe
Now, so truth help me, I must needs say this, sir,
And out of conscience for your advocate:
He's taken pains, in faith, sir, and deserved,
In my poor judgment—I speak it under favor,° with your permission
Not to contrary° you, sir—very richly— contradict
Well—to be cozened.° cheated
VOLPONE Troth, and I think so too,
By that° I heard him° in the latter end. what / him say
MOSCA Oh, but before, sir! Had you heard him first
Draw it to certain heads, then aggravate,[3]
Then use his vehement figures°—I looked still figiires of speech
When he would shift[4] a shirt; and doing this
Out of pure love, no hope of gain—
VOLPONE Tis right.
I cannot answer° him, Mosca, as I would, repay
Not vet; but for thy sake, at thy entreaty
I will begin ev'n now to vex 'em all,
This very instant.
MOSCA Good, sir.
VOLPONE Call the dwarf
And eunuch forth.
MOSCA [calling] Castrone, Nano!

---

[3] Arrange his material under various headings, then bring charges.

[4] Change (because his efforts made him sweat),

[Enter] NANO [and] CASTRONE.
NANO Here.
VOLPONE Shall we have a jig, now?
MOSCA What you please, sir.
VOLPONE [to CASTRONE and NANO] Go,
Straight give out about the streets, you two,
That I am dead. Do it with constancy,[0] conviction
Sadly, do you hear? Impute it to the grief
Of this late slander. [Exeunt CASTRONE and NANO.]
MOSCA What do you mean, sir?
VOLPONE Oh,
I shall have instantly my vulture, crow,
Raven come flying hither on the news
To peck for carrion, my she-wolf[0] and all, Lady Would-be Greedy and full of expectation—
MOSCA And then to have it ravished from their mouths?
VOLPONE 'Tis true. I will ha' thee put on a gown[5]
And take upon thee as ° thou wert mine heir; act as though
Show 'em a will. Open that chest and reach Forth one of those that has the blanks.[0] I'll straight blank spaces
Put in thy name.
MOSCA [fetching a blank will] It will be rare, sir.
VOLPONE Ay,
When they e'en gape, and find themselves deluded—
MOSCA Yes.
VOLPONE And thou use them scurvily. Dispatch,
Get on thy gown.
[VOLPONE signs the will MOSCA has given him.
MOSCA puts on a mourning garment.]
MOSCA But, what, sir, if they ask
After the body?
VOLPONE Say it was corrupted.
MOSCA I'll say it stunk, sir, and was fain° t'have it I was obliged
Coffined up instantly and sent away.
VOLPONE Anything; what thou wilt. Hold, here's my will.
Get thee a cap, a count-book, pen and ink,
Papers afore thee; sit as thou wert taking
An inventory of parcels.[0] I'll get up
Behind the curtain on a stool, and hearken;
Sometime peep over, see how they do look,
With what degrees their blood doth leave their faces.
Oh, 'twill afford me a rare meal of laughter!
MOSCA Your advocate will turn stark dull[0] upon it. gloomy
VOLPONE It will take off his oratory's edge.
MOSCA But your clarissimo,[0] old round-back, he aristocrat (Corbaccio)
Will crump you[0] like a hog-louse with the touch. curl up on you
VOLPONE And what Corvino?

---

5. This must be the long black gown ordinarily worn by chief mourners, not the clarissimo's (aristocrat's) garment, which Mosca dons later in the scene and which constitutes a different kind of insult to Voltore, Corbaccio, and Corvino.

MOSCA Oh, sir, look for him
Tomorrow morning with a rope and a dagger[6]
To visit all the streets; he must run mad.
My lady, too, that came into the court
To bear false witness for Your Worship—
VOLPONE Yes,
And kissed me 'fore the fathers, when my face
Flowed all with oils.[0] see 4.6.20.1-2
MOSCA And sweat, sir. Why, your gold
Is such another[0] med'cine, it dries up so effective a
All those offensive savors! It transforms
The most deformed, and restores 'em lovely,
As 'twere the strange poetical girdle.[7] Jove
Could not invent t'himself a shroud more subtle
To pass Acrisius' guards.[8] It is the thing
Makes all the world her grace, her youth, her beauty.
VOLPONE I think she loves me.
MOSCA Who? The lady, sir?
She's jealous of you.[9]
VOLPONE Dost thou say so?
[Knocking offstage.]
MOSCA Hark,
There's some already.
VOLPONE Look.
MOSCA [peeping out the door] It is the vulture.
He has the quickest scent.
VOLPONE I'll to my place,
Thou to thy posture.[0] pose
MOSCA I am set.
VOLPONE But, Mosca,
Play the artificer[0] now; torture em rarely. artist
[VOLPONE conceals himself]

SCENE 3. The scene continues.

[Enter] VOLTORE.
VOLTORE How now, my Mosca?
MOSCA [pretending not to notice him, and reading from an inventory] "Turkey carpets,[0] nine"— Oriental rugs
VOLTORE Taking an inventory? That is well.
MOSCA "TWO suits of bedding, tissue"[1]—
VOLTORE Where's the will?
Let me read that the while.[0] while you're busy
[Enter] CORBACCIO [on a litter].
CORBACCIO [to the litter-heaters] So, set me down

---

[6] Traditional equipment of suicidal madmen, borne by the allegorical figure of Despair in Spenser's Faerie Queene 1.9, and by the revenger Hieronimo in The Spanish Tragedy.

[7] The girdle of Venus, the goddess of love, made its wearer irresistible.

[8] King Acrisius shut his daughter Danae in a tower, but the god Jove came to her in a shower of gold

[9] (1) Devoted to you; (2) covetous of your wealth.

5.3

[1] Sets of bedcovers and hangings, made of cloth with gold or silver threads interwoven. The fancy textiles Mosca mentions in this scene were extremely expensive to produce in the days before automation.

And get you home. [Exeunt litter-bearers.]
VOLTORE Is he come now to trouble us?
MOSCA "Of cloth-of-gold,[2] two more"—
CORBACCIO Is it done, Mosca?
MOSCA "Of several velvets,[0] eight"— separate velvet hangings
VOLTORE [aside] I like his care.
CORBACCIO [to MOSCA] Dost thou not hear?
[Enter] CORVINO.
CORVINO Ha! Is the hour come, Mosca?
VOLPONE peeps from behind a traverse.[0] expose
VOLPONE [aside] Ay, now they muster.[0] assemble
CORVINO What does the advocate here?
Or this Corbaccio?
CORBACCIO What do these here?
[Enter] LADY [WOULD-BE].
LADY WOULD-BE Mosca,
Is his thread spun?[3]
MOSCA "Eight chests of linen"—
VOLPONE [aside] Oh,
My fine Dame Would-be, too!
CORVINO Mosca, the will,
That I may show it these, and rid 'em hence.
MOSCA "Six chests of diaper, four of damask"[4]—there.
[He gives them the will.]
CORBACCIO Is that the will?
MOSCA "Down beds and bolsters"—
VOLPONE [aside] Rare!
Be busy still. Now they begin to flutter;
They never think of me. Look, see, see, see!
How their swift eyes run over the long deed
Unto the name, and to the legacies,
What is bequeathed them there—
MOSCA "Ten suits of hangings"[0]— sets of tapestries
VOLPONE [aside] Ay, i' their garters,[5] Mosca. Now their hopes
Are at the gasp.° last gasp
VOLTORE Mosca the heir!
CORBACCIO What's that?
VOLPONE [aside] My advocate is dumb. Look to my merchant;
He has heard of some strange storm, a ship is lost,
He faints. My lady will swoon. Old glazen-eyes,[6]
He hath not reached his despair yet.
CORBACCIO All these
Are out of hope; I'm sure the man.
COBVINO But, Mosca—
MOSCA "Two cabinets"—

---

[2] Cloth made of gold threads.

[3] Is he dead? (In Greek mythology, the Fates spin out the thread of a human being's life and cut it at the time of death.)

[4] Two kinds of costly textile with interwoven motifs. Diaper was linen with a diamond pattern; damask could be linen or silk with floral or other designs.

[5] "Go hang yourself in your own garters" was a common phrase of ridicule.

[6] Corbaccio wears spectacles (see also line 63 below).

CORVINO Is this in earnest?
MOSCA "One
Of ebony"—
CORVINO Or do you but delude me?
MOSCA "The other, mother-of-pearl"—I am very busy.
Good faith, it is a fortune thrown upon me—
"Item, one salt° of agate"—not my seeking. saltcellar
LADY WOULD-BE Do you hear, sir?
MOSCA "A perfumed box"—pray you, forbear;
You see I am troubled°—"made of an onyx"— busy
LADY WOULD-BE HOW!
MOSCA Tomorrow or next day I shall be at leisure
To talk with you all.
CORVINO Is this my large hope's issue?°
LADY WOULD-BE Sir, I must have a fairer answer.
MOSCA Madam!
Marry, and shall: pray you, fairly° quit my house. positively
Nay, raise no tempest with your looks, but hark you,
Remember what Your Ladyship offered me' implicitly, sexual favors
To put you in° an heir; go to, think on't, your name in as
And what you said e'en your best madams did
For maintenance,° and why not you? Enough. financial support
Go home and use the poor Sir Pol, your knight, well,
For fear I tell some riddles.° Go, be melancholic. secrets
[Exit LADY WOULD-BE.]
VOLPONE [aside] Oh, my fine devil!
CORVINO Mosca, pray you a word.
MOSCA Lord! Will not you take your dispatch hence yet?
Methinks of all you should have been th'example.° led the way
Why should you stay here? With what thought? What promise?
Hear you, do not you know I know you an ass?
And that you would most fain have been a wittol° willing cuckold
If fortune would have let you? That you are
A declared cuckold, on good terms?° This pearl, good standing
You'll say, was yours? Right. This diamond?
I'll not deny't, but thank you. Much here else?
It may be so. Why, think that these good works
May help to hide your bad. I'll not betray you.
Although you be but extraordinary° in name only
And have it° only in title, it sufficeth. the name of cuckold
Go home. Be melancholic too, or mad. [Exit CORVINO.]
VOLPONE [aside] Rare, Mosca! How his villainy becomes him!
VOLTORE [aside] Certain he doth delude all these for me.
CORBACCIO [finally making out the will] Mosca the heir?
VOLPONE [aside] Oh, his four eyes have found it!
CORBACCIO I'm cozened, cheated by a parasite-slave!
Harlot,[7] th'ast gulled me.
MOSCA Yes, sir. Stop your mouth,
Or I shall draw the only tooth is left.

---

[7] A word used of wicked men as well as women.

Are not you he, that filthy covetous wretch
With the three legs,° that here, in hope of prey, including his cane
Have, any time this three year, snuffed about
With your most grov'ling nose, and would have hired
Me to the pois'ning of my patron? Sir?
Are not you he that have today in court
Professed the disinheriting of your son?
Perjured yourself? Go home, and die, and stink.
If you but croak a syllable, all comes out.
Away and call your porters. Go, go stink! [Exit CORBACCIO.]
VOLPONE [aside] Excellent varlet!° servant; rascal
VOLTORE Now, my faithful Mosca,
I find thy constancy—
MOSCA Sir?
VOLTORE Sincere.
MOSCA "A table
Of porphyry"—I marl° you'll be thus troublesome. marvel
VOLTORE Nay, leave off now, they are gone.
MOSCA Why, who are you?
What? Who did send for you? Oh, cry you mercy,° beg your pardon
Reverend sir! Good faith, I am grieved for you,
That any chance of mine should thus defeat
Your—I must needs say—most deserving travails.
But I protest, sir, it was cast upon me,
And I could almost wish to be without it,
But that the will o'th'dead must be observed.
Marry, my joy is that you need it not;
You have a gift, sir—thank your education—
Will never let you want, while there are men
And malice to bleed causes.° Would I had lawsuits
But half the like, for all my fortune, sir!
If I have any suits—as I do hope,
Things being so easy and direct,[8] I shall not—
I will make bold with your obstreperous° aid, vociferous
Conceive me, for your fee,[9] sir. In meantime
You, that have so much law, I know, ha' the conscience
Not to be covetous of what is mine.
Good sir, I thank you for my plate;° 'twill help see 1.3.1-20
To set up a young mail." Good faith, you look set up my household
As you were costive;° best go home and purge, sir.
[Exit VOLTORE.]
VOLPONE [coming from behind the traverse] Bid him eat lettuce° well. My witty mischief, used as a laxative
Let me embrace thee! [He hugs MOSCA.] Oh, that I could now
Transform thee to a Venus!° Mosca, go, for Volpone's sexual use
Straight take my habit of clarissimo[1]
And walk the streets; be seen, torment em more.

---

[8] The situation being so straightforward.

[9] It being understood that I will pay you, of course.

[1] Aristocrat. (By obeying this order, Mosca violates the sumptuary laws that restricted the wearing of distinctive high-status garments, such as the clarissimo's robe, to persons of the appropriate rank.)

We must pursue as well as plot. Who would Have lost° this feast? missed
MOSCA I doubt° it will lose them.° fear / as dupes
VOLPONE Oh, my recovery shall recover all.[2]
That I could now but think on some disguise
To meet 'em in, and ask em questions.
How I would vex 'em still at every turn!
MOSCA Sir, I can fit you.
VOLPONE Canst thou?
MOSCA Yes, I know
One o'the commendatori, sir, so like you,
Him will I straight make drunk, and bring you his habit.
VOLPONE A rare disguise, and answering thy brain!° suiting your wit
Oh, I will be a sharp disease unto 'em.
MOSCA Sir, you must look for curses—
VOLPONE Till they burst!
The fox fares ever best when he is curst.° [Exeunt.] proverbial wisdom

SCENE 4. The WOULD-BES' house.

[Enter] PEREGRINE [in disguise, and] three MERCATORI [MERCHANTS],

PEREGRINE Am I enough disguised?
FIRST MERCHANT I warrant you.
PEREGRINE All my ambition is to fright him only.
SECOND MERCHANT If you could ship him away, 'twere excellent.
THIRD MERCHANT TO Zante, or to Aleppo?[1]
PEREGRINE Yes, and ha' his
Adventures put i'th'book of voyages,[2]
And his gulled° story registered for truth? erroneous
Well, gentlemen, when I am in awhile,
And that you think us warm in our discourse,
Know° your approaches. make
FIRST MERCHANT Trust it to our care.
[Exeunt MERCHANTS.]

[PEREGRINE knocks. A] WOMAN [servant answers the door].

PEREGRINE Save you, fair lady. Is Sir Pol within?
WOMAN I do not know, sir.
PEREGRINE Pray you, say unto him
Here is a merchant upon earnest business
Desires to speak with him.
WOMAN I will see, sir.
PEREGRINE Pray you.
[Exit WOMAN.]
I see the family is all female here.
[Enter WOMAN.]

---

[2] Volpone believes that by "undoing" his death, he will be able to resuscitate his scam.

5.4

[1] Zante is an island off Greece under Venetian control; Aleppo, a big trading center, is in Syria.

[2] An enlarged edition of Richard Hakluyt's Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffics, and Discoveries of the English Nation was published in 1598-1600.

WOMAN He says, sir, he has weighty affairs of state
That now require him whole;° some other time demand all his attention
You may possess° him. gain audience with
PEREGRINE Pray you say again,
If those require him whole, these will exact him° force him out
Whereof I bring him tidings. [Exit WOMAN.]
What might be
His grave affair of state, now? How to make Bolognian sausages here in Venice, sparing
One o'th'ingredients?
[Enter WOMAN.]
WOMAN Sir, he says he knows
By your word "tidings" that you are no statesman,[3]
And therefore wills you stay.° wishes you to wait
PEREGRINE Sweet, pray you return° him reply to
I have not read so many proclamations
And studied them for words as he has done,
But—here he deigns to come.
[Enter] POLITIC.
[Exit WOMAN.]
POLITIC Sir, I must crave
Your courteous pardon. There hath chanced today
Unkind disaster 'twixt my lady and me,
And I was penning my apology
To give her satisfaction, as you came now.
PEREGRINE Sir, I am grieved I bring you worse disaster.
The gentleman you met at th'port today,
That told you he was newly arrived—
POLITIC Ay, was
A fugitive punk?° prostitute
PEREGRINE NO, sir, a spy set on you;
And he has made relation to the Senate
That you professed to him to have a plot
To sell the state of Venice to the Turk.° see 4.1.128-30
POLITIC Oh, me!
PEREGRINE For which warrants are signed by this time
To apprehend you, and to search your study
For papers—
POLITIC Alas, sir, I have none but notes
Drawn out of playbooks°— printed plays
PEREGRINE All the better, sir.
POLITIC And some essays. What shall I do?
PEREGRINE Sir, best
Convey yourself into a sugar-chest;
Or, if you could lie round, a frail were rare,[4]
And I could send you aboard.
POLITIC Sir, I but talked so,
For discourse sake merely.° They knock without. Just to be conversing

---

[3] Government agent. (Sir Politic believes that a spy would use the word "intelligence.")

[4] If you could curl up, a fruit basket would be excellent.

PEREGRINE Hark, they are there!
POLITIC I am a wretch, a wretch!
PEREGRINE What will you do, sir?
Ha' you ne'er a currant-butt° to leap into? casket for currants
They'll put you to the rack; you must be sudden.
POLITIC Sir, I have an engine°— contrivance
THIRD MERCHANT [without] Sir Politic Would-be!
SECOND MERCHANT [without] Where is he?
POLITIC That I have thought upon beforetime.
PEREGRINE What is it?
POLITIC I shall ne'er endure the torture!
Marry, it is, sir, of a tortoiseshell, [producing the shell]
Fitted for these extremities. Pray you sir, help me.
Here I have a place, sir, to put back my legs—
Please you to lay it on, sir—with this cap
And my black gloves. I'll lie, sir, like a tortoise
Till they are gone.
PEREGRINE [laying the shell on POLITIC*'s back]* And call you this an engine?
POLITIC Mine own device—good sir, bid my wife's women
To burn my papers. [Exit PEREGRINE.]
They [the MERCHANTS] rush in.
FIRST MERCHANT Where's he hid?
THIRD MERCHANT We must
And will, sure, find him.
SECOND MERCHANT Which is his study?
[Enter PEREGRINE.]
FIRST MERCHANT What
Are you, sir?
PEREGRINE I'm a merchant, that came here
To look upon this tortoise.
THIRD MERCHANT How?
FIRST MERCHANT Saint Mark!
What beast is this?
PEREGRINE It is a fish.
SECOND MERCHANT [to POLITIC] Come out here!
PEREGRINE Nay, you may strike him, sir, and tread upon him.
He'll bear a cart.
FIRST MERCHANT What, to run over him?
PEREGRINE Yes.
THIRD MERCHANT Let's jump upon him.
SECOND MERCHANT Can he not go?° walk
PEREGRINE He creeps, sir.
FIRST MERCHANT [poking POLITIC] Let's see him creep.
PEREGRINE No, good sir, you will hurt him.
SECOND MERCHANT Heart! I'll see him creep, or prick his guts.
THIRD MERCHANT [to POLITIC] Come out here!
PEREGRINE [aside to POLITIC] Pray you, sir, creep a little.
[POLITIC creeps.]
FIRST MERCHANT Forth!

SECOND MERCHANT Yet further.
PEREGRINE [aside to POLITIC] Good sir, creep.
SECOND MERCHANT We'll see his legs.
They pull off the shell and discover[0] him. expose
THIRD MERCHANT Godso, he has garters!
FIRST MERCHANT Ay, and gloves!
SECOND MERCHANT Is this
Your fearful tortoise?
PEREGRINE [revealing himself] Now, Sir Pol, we are even.
For your next project I shall be prepared.
I am sorry for the funeral of your notes, sir. •
FIRST MERCHANT Twere a rare motion to be seen in Fleet Street![5]
SECOND MERCHANT Ay, i'the term.
FIRST MERCHANT Or Smithfield, in the fair.[6]
THIRD MERCHANT Methinks 'tis but a melancholic sight!
PEREGRINE Farewell, most politic tortoise.
[Exeunt PEREGRINE and MERCHANTS.]
[Enter WOMAN.]
POLITIC Where's my lady?
Knows she of this?
WOMAN I know not, sir.
POLITIC Inquire.
[Exit WOMAN.]
Oh, I shall be the fable of all feasts,[0] talk of the town
The freight of the gazetti, ship boys' tale,[7]
And, which is worst, even talk for ordinaries.[0]
[Enter WOMAN.]
WOMAN My lady's come most melancholic home,
And says, sir, she will straight to sea for physic.
POLITIC And I, to shun this place and clime forever,
Creeping with house on back, and think it well
To shrink my poor head in my politic shell. [Exeunt.]

SCENE 5. VOLPONE's house.

[Enter] VOLPONE [and] MOSCA, the first in the habit of a commentatore, the other, of a clarissimo.[0] see 5.3.104-15
VOLPONE Am I then like him?
MOSCA Oh, sir, you are he.
No man can sever[0] you. distinguish
VOLPONE Good.
MOSCA But what am I?
VOLPONE 'Fore heav'n, a brave[0] clarissimo; thou becom'st it! splendid
Pity thou wert not born one.
MOSCA If I hold
My made one, 'twill be well.
VOLPONE I'll go and see

---

[5] Puppet shows, called "motions," were frequently performed on London's Fleet Street, adjacent to the Inns of Court, where attorneys were trained and cases were argued during the three law terms.

[6] Smithfield, just northwest of London, was the site every August of Bartholomew Fair; puppet shows were a prime entertainment there.

[7] Topic of the newspapers and the gossip of boys serving on board ships.

What news, first, at the court.
MOSCA Do so. [Exit VOLPONE.]
My fox
Is out on° his hole,[1] and ere he shall reenter of I'll make him languish in his borrowed case,° disguise
Except he come to composition° with me. unless he makes a deal
[Calling] Androgyno, Castrone, Nano!
[Enter ANDROGYNO, CASTRONE, and NANO.]
ALL Here.
MOSCA Go recreate yourselves abroad;° go sport. outside
[Exeunt ANDROGYNO, CASTRONE, and NANO.]
So, now I have the keys, and am possessed.° in possession
Since he will needs be dead afore his time,
I'll bury him or gain by him. I am his heir,
And so will keep me° till he share at least. remain
To cozen him of all were but a cheat
Well placed; no man would construe it a sin.
Let his sport pay for't.° This is called the Fox Trap. [Exit.] for itself

SCENE 6. A street in Venice.

[Enter] CORBACCIO [and] CORVINO.
CORBACCIO They say the court is set.° in session
CORVINO We must maintain
Our first tale good, for both our reputations.
CORBACCIO Why, mine's no tale; my son would there have killed me.
CORVINO That's true; I had forgot. [Aside] Mine is, I am sure.—
But for your will, sir.
CORBACCIO Ay, I'll come upon him
For that hereafter, now his patron's dead.
[Enter] VOLPONE [disguised].
VOLPONE Signor Corvino! And Corbaccio! Sir,
Much joy unto you.
CORVINO Of what?
VOLPONE The sudden good
Dropped down upon you—
CORBACCIO Where?
VOLPONE And none knows how—
From old Volpone, sir.
CORBACCIO Out, arrant knave!
VOLPONE Let not your too much wealth, sir, make you furious.° insane
CORBACCIO Away, thou varlet!
VOLPONE Why, sir?
CORBACCIO Dost thou mock me?
VOLPONE YOU mock the world, sir.[1] Did you not change° wills? exchange
CORBACCIO Out, harlot!
VOLPONE [to CORVINO] Oh, belike you are the man,
Signor Corvino? Faith, you carry it° well; carry it off
You grow not mad withal. I love your spirit.

5.5
[1] Alluding to the children's game, fox-in-the-hole.

5.6
[1] Volpone pretends to believe that Corbaccio is misleading people by refusing to admit to his good fortune.

You are not overleavened° with your fortune. too puffed up
You should ha' some would swell now like a wine-vat
With such an autumn.° Did he gi' you all, sir? harvest
CORVINO Avoid,° you rascal! Go away
VOLPONE Troth, your wife has shown Herself a very° woman. But you are well; typical
You need not care; you have a good estate
To bear it out, sir, better by this chance—
Except Corbaccio have a share?
CORBACCIO Hence, varlet!
VOLPONE You will not be aknown,[2] sir; why, 'tis wise.
Thus do all gamesters at all games dissemble.
No man will seem to win.° admit he's winning
[Exeunt CORBACCIO and CORVINO.]
Here comes my vulture,
Heaving his beak up i'the air and snuffing.

SCENE 7. The scene continues.

[Enter] VOLTORE.
VOLTORE [to himself] Outstripped thus by a parasite? A slave
Would run on errands, and make legs° for crumbs? curtsies
Well, what I'll do—
VOLPONE The court stays for° Your Worship. awaits
I e'en rejoice, sir, at Your Worship's happiness,
And that it fell into so learned hands
That understand the fingering[1]—
VOLTORE What do you mean?
VOLPONE I mean to be a suitor to Your Worship
For the small tenement, out of reparations[2]—
That at the end of your long row of houses
By the piscaria.° It was in Volpone's time, fish market
Your predecessor, ere he grew diseased,
A handsome, pretty, customed° bawdy house much-patronized
As any was in Venice—none dispraised[3]—
But fell with him; his body and that house
Decayed together.
VOLTORE Come, sir, leave your prating.° chattering
VOLPONE Why, if Your Worship give me but your hand,
That I may ha' the refusal,° I have done. right of first refusal
'Tis a mere toy to you, sir, candle-rents,[4]
As Your learned Worship knows—
VOLTORE What do I know?
VOLPONE Marry, no end of your wealth, sir, God decrease° it. instead of "increase"
VOLTORE Mistaking knave! What, mock'st thou my misfortune?
VOLPONE His° blessing on your heart, sir! Would 'twere more. God's
[Exit VOLTORE.]
Now, to my first[5] again, at the next corner.

---

[2] You prefer not to be recognized (as heir).

5.7

[1] That understand how to handle money.

[2] For the rental house in bad repair.

[3] Not to disparage the others.

[4] (1) Revenue from deteriorating property; (2) "pin money," money for incidentals.

[5] The ones I was taunting earlier, Corvino and Corbaccio.

SCENE 8. The scene continues.

[Enter] CORBACCIO [and] CORVINO. [Enter] MOSCA, passant° [over the stage in clarissimo's attire, and exit]. passing
CORBACCIO See, in our habit! See the impudent varlet!
CORVINO That I could shoot mine eyes at him, like gunstones!° cannonballs
VOLPONE But, is this true, sir, of the parasite?
CORBACCIO Again t'afflict us? Monster!
VOLPONE In good faith, sir,
I'm heartily grieved a beard of your grave length° so wise an old. man
Should be so overreached. I never brooked° could stand
That parasite's hair; methought his nose should cozen.° he had a cheating nose
There still° was somewhat in his look did promise. always
The bane° of a clarissimo. ruin
CORBACCIO Knave—-
VOLPONE [to CORVINO] Methinks
Yet you that are so traded° i'the world, experienced
A witty merchant, the fine bird Corvino,
That have such moral emblems[1] on your name,
Should not have sung your shame and dropped your cheese,
To let the fox laugh at your emptiness.[2]
CORVINO Sirrah, you think the privilege of the place,[3]
And your red saucy cap, that seems to me
Nailed to your jolt-head with those two cecchines,[4]
Can warrant° your abuses. Come you hither. sanction
You shall perceive, sir, I dare beat you. Approach!
VOLPONE No haste, sir, I do know your valor well,
Since you durst publish° what you are, sir. make public
[VOLPONE makes as if to leave.]
CORVINO Tarry!
I'd speak with you.
VOLPONE Sir, sir, another time—
CORVINO Nay, now.
VOLPONE Oh, God, sir! I were a wise man
Would stand° the fury of a distracted cuckold. to withstand
MOSCA [enters and] walks by 'em.
CORBACCIO What! Come again?
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] Upon 'em, Mosca; save me.
CORBACCIO The air's infected where he breathes.
CORVINO Let's fly him.
[Exeunt CORVINO and CORBACCIO.]
VOLPONE Excellent basilisk![5] Turn upon the vulture.

SCENE 9. The scene continues.

[Enter] VOLTORE.
VOLTORE [to Mosca] Well, flesh fly, it is summer with you now;

5.8
[1] Mottoes accompanying symbolic engravings.
[2] As in Aesop's fable; see 1.2.95-97 and note.
[3] Violence was forbidden near the court.
[4] The commendatore's cap is decorated with gold buttons.
[5] A legendary monster whose breath and glance were deadly.

Your winter will come on.
MOSCA Good advocate,
Pray thee not rail, nor threaten out of place° thus; unsuitably
Thou'lt make a solecism,° as madam says. see 4.2.43
Get you a biggin[1] more; your brain breaks loose.
VOLTORE Well, sir. [Exit MOSCA.]
VOLPONE Would you ha' me beat the insolent slave?
Throw dirt upon his first good clothes?
VOLTORE This same° the disguised Volpone
Is doubtless some familiar!° attendant devil
VOLPONE Sir, the court,
In troth, stays for you. I am mad° a mule furious that
That never read Justinian[2] should get up
And ride an advocate. Had you no quirk° trick
To avoid gullage,° sir, by such a creature? deception
I hope you do but jest; he has not done't.
This's but confederacy to blind the rest.° Corvino and Corbaccio
You are the heir?
VOLTORE A strange, officious,
Troublesome knave! Thou dost torment me.
VOLPONE I know—
It cannot be, sir, that you should be cozened;
'Tis not within the wit of man to do it.
You are so wise, so prudent, and 'tis fit
That wealth and wisdom still should go together.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE 10. The law court.

[Enter] four AVOCATORI, NOTARIO [NOTARY], COMMENDATORI, BONARIO [and] CELIA [under guard], CORBACCIO, [and] CORVINO.

FIRST AVOCATORE Are all the parties here?
NOTARY All but the advocate.
SECOND AVOCATORE And here he comes.
FIRST AVOCATORE Then bring 'em forth to sentence.

[Enter] VOLTORE, [and] VOLPONE [still disguised as a commendatore].

VOLTORE O my most honored fathers, let your mercy
Once win upon° your justice, to forgive— prevail over
I am distracted—
VOLPONE (aside) What will he do now?
VOLTORE Oh,
I know not which t'address myself to first,
Whether Your Fatherhoods or these innocents°— Celia and Bonario
CORVINO [aside] Will he betray himself?
VOLTORE Whom equally
I have abused, out of most covetous ends—

5.9
[1] A larger skullcap (worn by lawyers).
[2] The Roman law, codified under Emperor Justinian and still influential on the Continent. Lawyers traditionally rode mules to the courts; here the image is comically inverted.

CORVINO [aside to CORBACCIO] The man is mad!
CORBACCIO What's that?
CORVINO
He is possessed.
VOLTORE For which, now struck in conscience, here I prostrate
Myself at your offended feet for pardon.
[He throws himself down.]
FIRST AND SECOND AVOCATORI Arise!
CELIA O heav'n, how just thou art!
VOLPONE [aside] I'm caught
I' mine own noose—
CORVINO [aside to CORBACCIO] Be constant, sir; naught now
Can help but impudence. [VOLTORE rises.]
FIRST AVOCATORE [to VOLTORE] Speak forward.° continue
COMMENDATORI [to the courtroom] Silence!
VOLTORE It is not passion° in me, reverend fathers, madness
But only conscience, conscience, my good sires,
That makes me now tell truth. That parasite,
That knave hath been the instrument of all.
SECOND AVOCATORE Where is that knave? Fetch him.
VOLPONE [as commendatore] I go. [Exit.]
CORVINO Grave fathers,
This man's distracted; he confessed it now;° just now
For, hoping to be old Volpone's heir,
Who now is dead—
THIRD AVOCATORE How?
SECOND AVOCATORE Is Volpone dead?
CORVINO Dead since,° grave fathers— since his appearance here
BONARIO O sure vengeance!
FIRST AVOCATORE Stay.
Then he was no deceiver?
VOLTORE Oh, no, none.
The parasite, grave fathers.
CORVINO He does speak
Out of mere envy, 'cause the servant's made
The thing he gaped° for. Please Your Fatherhoods, Voltore yearned
This is the truth; though I'll not justify
The other,° but he may be somedeal° faulty. Mosca / somewhat
VOLTORE Ay, to your hopes as well as mine, Corvino;
But I'll use modesty.° Pleaseth Your Wisdoms self-control
To view these certain notes, and but confer° them. compare
As I hope favor, they shall speak clear truth.
[He gives documents to the AVOCATORI.]
CORVINO The devil has entered him!
BONARIO Or bides in you.
FOURTH AVOCATORE We have done ill, by a public officer
To send for him, if he be heir.
SECOND AVOCATORE For whom?
FOURTH AVOCATORE Him that they call the parasite.
THIRD AVOCATORE 'Tis true;
He is a man of great estate now left.° bequeathed to him

FOURTH AVOCATORE [to NOTARY.] Go you and learn his name, and say the court
Entreats his presence here but to the clearing
Of some few doubts. [Exit NOTARY]
SECOND AVOCATORE This same's a labyrinth!
FIRST AVOCATORE [to CORVINO] Stand you unto° your first report? Do you stand by
CORVINO My state,° estate
My life, my fame°— reputation
BONARIO Where is't?[1]
CORVINO —are at the stake.
FIRST AVOCATORE [to CORBACCIO] Is yours so too?
CORBACCIO The advocate's a knave,
And has a forked tongue—
SECOND AVOCATORE Speak to the point.
CORBACCIO So is the parasite, too.
FIRST AVOCATORE This is confusion.
VOLTORE I do beseech Your Fatherhoods, read but those.
CORVINO And credit nothing the false spirit hath writ.
It cannot be but he is possessed, grave fathers.
[The AVOCATORI examine VOLTORE'S papers.]

SCENE 11. A street.[1]

[Enter] VOLPONE [on a separate part of the stage].
VOLPONE To make a snare for mine own neck! And run
My head into it willfully! With laughter!
When I had newly scaped, was free and clear!
Out of mere wantonness!° Oh, the dull devil caprice
Was in this brain of mine when I devised it,
And Mosca gave it second. He must now
Help to sear up° this vein, or we bleed dead.
[Enter] NANO, ANDROGYNO, [and] CASTRONE.
How now, who let you loose? Whither go you now?
What, to buy gingerbread? Or to drown kitlings?° kittens
NANO Sir, Master Mosca called us out of doors,
And bid us all go play, and took the keys.
ANDROGYNO Yes.
VOLPONE Did Master Mosca take the keys? Why, so!
I am farther in.° These are my fine conceits!° in trouble / notions
I must be merry, with a mischief to me!
What a vile wretch was I, that could not bear
My fortune soberly! I must ha' my crotchets° perverse whims
And my conundrums! Well, go you and seek him.
His meaning may be truer than my fear.[2]
Bid him he straight come to me, to the court.
Thither will I, and, if't be possible,

5.10
[1] Implying that Corvino has nothing of worth to lose.
5.11
[1] The courtroom characters remain visible onstage, perhaps in silent tableau, while Volpone is understood to be outside.
[2] Mosca's intentions may be truer (more my fear is true (accurate).

Unscrew[0] my advocate upon[0] new hopes. dissuade / by means of
When I provoked him, then I lost myself.
[Exeunt VOLPONE and his entourage. The AVOCATORI and parties to the courtroom proceedings remain onstage.]

SCENE 12. 77ZE courtroom.

FIRST AVOCATORE [with VOLTORE'S notes] These things can ne'er be reconciled. He here
Professeth that the gentleman[0] was wronged, Bonario
And that the gentlewoman was brought thither,
Forced by her husband, and there left.
VOLTORE Most true.
CELIA How ready is heav'n to those that pray!
FIRST AVOCATORE But that
Volpone would have ravished her, he holds
Utterly false, knowing his impotence.
CORVINO Grave fathers, he is possessed; again I say,
Possessed. Nay, if there be possession
And obsession, he has both.
THIRD AVOCATORE Here comes our officer.
[Enter VOLPONE, still disguised.]
VOLPONE The parasite will straight be here, grave fathers.
FOURTH AVOCATORE YOU might invent some other name, sir varlet.
THIRD AVOCATORE Did not the notary meet him?
VOLPONE Not that I know.
FOURTH AVOCATORE His coming will clear all.
SECOND AVOCATORE Yet it is misty.
VOLTORE May't please Your Fatherhoods—
VOLPONE (-whispers [to] the advocate) Sir, the parasite
Willed me to tell you that his master lives,
That you are still the man, your hopes the same;
And this was only a jest—
VOLTORE [aside to VOLPONE] HOW?
VOLPONE [aside to VOLTORE] Sir, to try
If you were firm, and how you stood affected.[0] how loyal you were
VOLTORE Art sure he lives?
VOLPONE DO I live,[0] sir? he's as alive as I am
VOLTORE Oh, me!
I was too violent.
VOLPONE Sir, you may redeem it.
They said you were possessed; fall down, and seem so.
I'll help to make it good. VOLTORE falls.
[Aloud] God bless the man!
[Aside to VOLTORE] Stop your wind hard, and swell.[1] [Aloud]
See, see, see, see!

5.12
[1] The details of Voltore's dispossession in the following lines resemble the fake exorcisms described in Samuel Harsnett's lively expose, A Discovery of the Fraudulent Practices of John Darrell (1599). "Stop your wind": hold your breath.

He vomits crooked pins! His eyes are set
Like a dead hare's hung in a poulter's[2] shop!
His mouth's running away!° [To CORVINO] DO you see, signor? — twitching spasmodically
Now 'tis in his belly.
CORVINO Ay, the devil!
VOLPONE Now in his throat.
CORVINO Ay, I perceive it plain.
VOLPONE Twill out, 'twill out! Stand clear. See where it flies,
In shape of a blue toad with a bat's wings!
[To CORBACCIO] DO not you see it, sir?
CORBACCIO What? I think I do.
CORVINO 'Tis too manifest.
VOLPONE Look! He comes t' himself!
VOLTORE Where am I?
VOLPONE Take good heart; the worst is past, sir.
You are dispossessed.
FIRST AVOCATORE What accident° is this? — unforeseen event
SECOND AVOCATORE Sudden, and full of wonder!
THIRD AVOCATORE If he were Possessed, as it appears, all this° is nothing. — Voltore's written statement
CORVINO He has been often subject to these fits.
FIRST AVOCATORE Show him that writing. [To VOLTORE] DO you know it, sir?
VOLPONE [aside to VOLTORE] Deny it, sir; forswear it; know it not.
VOLTORE Yes, I do know it well, it is my hand;
But all that it contains is false.
BONARIO Oh, practice!° — deception
SECOND AVOCATORE What maze is this!
FIRST AVOCATORE IS he not guilty, then,
Whom you there name the parasite?
VOLTORE Grave fathers,
No more than his good patron, old Volpone.
FOURTH AVOCATORE Why, he is dead!
VOLTORE Oh, no, my honored fathers.
He lives—
FIRST AVOCATORE HOW! Lives?
VOLTORE Lives.
SECOND AVOCATORE This is subtler yet!
THIRD AVOCATORE [to VOLTORE] YOU said he was dead?
VOLTORE Never.
THIRD AVOCATORE [to CORVINO] YOU said so?
CORVINO I heard so.
FOURTH AVOCATORE Here comes the gentleman; make him way.
[Enter MOSCA.]
THIRD AVOCATORE A stool!
FOURTH AVOCATORE [aside] A proper° man! And, were Volpone dead, — handsome
A fit match for my daughter.

---

[2] Seller of poultry and small game.

THIRD AVOCATORE Give him way.
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] iMosca, I was almost lost; the advocate
Had betrayed all; but now it is recovered.
All's o'the hinge° again. Say I am living. running smoothly
MOSCA [aloud] What busy° knave is this? Most reverend fathers, troublesome
I sooner had attended your grave pleasures,
But that my order for the funeral
Of my dear patron did require me—
VOLPONE {aside) Mosca!
MOSCA Whom I intend to bury like a gentleman.
VOLPONE [aside] Ay, quick,° and cozen me of all.[3] alive
SECOND AVOCATORE Still stranger!
More intricate!
FIRST AVOCATORE And come about° again! reversing direction
FOURTH AVOCATORE [aside] It is a match; my daughter is bestowed.
MOSCA [aside to VOLPONE] Will you gi' me half?
VOLPONE [aside to MOSCA] First, I'll be hanged.
MOSCA [aside to VOLPONE]
I know
Your voice is good. Cry not so loud.
FIRST AVOCATORE Demand° question
The advocate. [To VOLTORE] Sir, did not you affirm
Volpone was alive?
VOLPONE Yes, and he is;
This gent'man told me so. (Aside to MOSCA) Thou shalt have half.
MOSCA Whose drunkard is this same? Speak, some that know him;
I never saw his face. (Aside to VOLPONE) I cannot now
Afford it you so cheap.
VOLPONE (aside to MOSCA) No?
FIRST AVOCATORE [to VOLTORE] What say you?
VOLTORE The officer told me.
VOLPONE I did, grave fathers,
And will maintain he lives with mine own life,
And that this creature° told me. (Aside) I was born Mosca
With all good stars my enemies.
MOSCA Most grave fathers,
If such an insolence as this must pass° be permitted
Upon me, I am silent. 'Twas not this
For which you sent, I hope.
SECOND AVOCATORE [pointing to VOLPONE] Take him away.
VOLPONE (aside to MOSCA) Mosca!
THIRD AVOCATORE Let him be whipped.
VOLPONE (aside to MOSCA) Wilt thou betray me?
Cozen me?
THIRD AVOCATORE And taught to bear himself
Toward a person of his° rank. Mosca's
FOURTH AVOCATORE Away!
[Officers seize VOLPONE.]

---

[3] Volpone sees that Mosca's pious pretense of burying the "dead" Volpone will mean an end to all of Volpone's hopes; he'll be cheated out of everything.

MOSCA I humbly thank Your Fatherhoods.
VOLPONE Soft, soft. [Aside] Whipped?
And lose all that I have? If I confess,
It cannot be much more.
FOURTH AVOCATORE [to MOSCA] Sir, are you married?
VOLPONE [aside] They'll be allied° anon; I must be resolute. linked, by marriage
The fox shall here uncase.° He puts off his disguise. reveal himself
MOSCA (aside) Patron!
VOLPONE Nay, now
My ruins shall not come alone. Your match
I'll hinder sure; my substance shall not glue you
Nor screw you into a family.
MOSCA (aside) Why, patron!
VOLPONE I am Volpone, and [pointing to MOSCA] this is my knave;
[Pointing to VOLTORE] This his own knave; [pointing to CORBACCIO] this, avarice's fool;
[Pointing to CORVINO] This, a chimera° of wittol, fool, and knave; monstrous combination
And, reverend fathers, since we all can hope
Naught but a sentence, let's not now despair it.° be disappointed (ironic)
You hear me brief.° That's all I have to say
CORVINO May it please Your Fatherhoods—
COMMENDATORE[4] Silence!
FIRST AVOCATORE The knot is now undone by miracle!
SECOND AVOCATORE Nothing can be more clear.
THIRD AVOCATORE Or can more prove
These innocent.
FIRST AVOCATORE Give 'em their liberty.
[BONARIO and CELIA are released.]
BONARIO Heaven could not long let such gross crimes be hid.
SECOND AVOCATORE If this be held the highway to get riches,
May I be poor!
THIRD AVOCATORE This's not the gain, but torment.
FIRST AVOCATORE These possess wealth as sick men possess fevers,
Which trulier may be said to possess them.
SECOND AVOCATORE Disrobe that parasite.
[MOSCA is stripped of his clarissimo's robe.]
CORVINO [and] MOSCA Most honored fathers!
FIRST AVOCATORE Can you plead aught to stay the course of justice?
If you can, speak.
CORVINO [and] VOLTORE We beg favor—
CELIA And mercy.
FIRST AVOCATORE [to CELIA] YOU hurt your innocence, suing° for the guilty. pleading
[To the others] Stand forth; and, first, the parasite. You appear
T'have been the chiefest minister,° if not plotter, agent
In all these lewd° impostures, and now, lastly, vile, obscene
Have with your impudence abused the court

---

[4] Not Volpone, of course, but one of the genuine Commendatori. They are probably the officers who strip Mosca at line 103.

And habit° of a gentleman of Venice, garb
Being a fellow of no birth or blood;
For which our sentence is, first thou be whipped,
Then live perpetual prisoner in our galleys.
VOLPONE I thank you for him.
MOSCA Bane to° thy wolfish nature! curses on
FIRST AVOCATORE Deliver him to the saffi.° [MOSCA is placed bailiffs under guard.] Thou, Volpone,
By blood and rank a gentleman, canst not fall
Under like censure;° but our judgment on thee the same sentence
Is that thy substance° all be straight confiscate wealth
To the hospital of the Incurabili;[5]
And since the most was gotten by imposture,
By feigning lame, gout, palsy, and such diseases,
Thou art to lie in prison, cramped with irons,
Till thou be'st sick and lame indeed.—Remove him.
[VOLPONE is placed under guard.]
VOLPONE This is called mortifying[6] of a fox.
FIRST AVOCATORE Thou, Voltore, to take away the scandal
Thou hast giv'n all worthy men of thy profession,
Art banished from their fellowship and our state.° Venice
[VOLTORE is placed under guard.]
Corbaccio—bring him near.—We here possess
Thy son of all thy state,° and confine thee estate
To the monastery of San' Spirito,° the Holy Spirit
Where, since thou knew'st not how to live well here,
Thou shalt be learned° to die well. taught
CORBACCIO Ha! What said he?
COMMENDATORE You shall know anon,° sir. soon enough
[CORBACCIO is placed under guard.]
FIRST AVOCATORE Thou, Corvino, shalt
Be straight embarked from thine own house and rowed
Bound about Venice, through the Grand Canal,
Wearing a cap with fair° long ass's ears handsome; clearly visible
Instead of horns, and so to mount, a paper
Pinned on thy breast, to the berlino[7]—
CORVINO Yes,
And have mine eyes beat out with stinking fish,
Bruised fruit, and rotten eggs—Tis well. I'm glad
I shall not see my shame yet.
FIRST AVOCATORE And to expiate
Thy wrongs done to thy wife, thou art to send her
Home to her father with her dowry trebled.[8]
And these are all your judgments—

---

[5] The Hospital of the Incurables was founded in Venice in 1522 to care for people terminally ill with syphilis.

[6] (1) Hanging of meat to make it tender; (2) disciplining spiritually; (3) killing. (Volpone's sentence is almost certain to bring about his death.)

[7] Pillory. Versions of such shaming punishments were commonly imposed for sexual and marital infractions. The offender typically had to wear a placard specifying his crimes; hence the paper pinned on Corvino's breast.

[8] The judges grant Celia "separation from bed and board." Such legal separations could be permitted to the innocent party in a case of adultery or, as here, to a victim of gross spousal abuse. Because legal separation entailed the finding of serious fault, the guilty spouse could also, as here, be forced to pay financial damages. Legal separation did not bring with it, however, the right of remarriage for either party.

ALL Honored fathers!
FIRST AVOCATORE Which may not be revoked. Now you begin,
When crimes are done and past and to be punished,
To think what your crimes are.—Away with them!
[MOSCA, VOLPONE, VOLTORE, CORBACCIO, and CORVINO retire to the back of the stage, guarded.][9]
Let all that see these vices thus rewarded
Take heart,° and love to study 'em. Mischiefs feed take them to heart
Like beasts, till they be fat, and then they bleed.
[The AVOCATORI step back.]
[VOLPONE comes forward.]
VOLPONE The seasoning of a play is the applause
Now, though the fox be punished by the laws,
He yet doth hope there is no suff'ring due
Nor any fact° which he hath done 'gainst you. crime
If there be, censure him; here he, doubtful,° stands. apprehensive
If not, fare jovially, and clap your hands. [Exeunt.]

FROM EPIGRAMS[1]

To My Book

It will be looked for, book, when some but see
Thy title, Epigrams, and named of me,
Thou should'st be bold, licentious, full of gall,
Wormwood° and sulphur, sharp and toothed[2] withal, bitter-tasting plant
Become a petulant thing, hurl ink and wit
As madmen stones, not caring whom they hit.
Deceive their malice who could wish it so,
And by thy wiser temper let men know
Thou art not covetous of least self-fame
Made from the hazard of another's shame[3]—
Much less with lewd, profane, and beastly phrase
To catch the world's loose laughter or vain gaze.
He that departs° with his own honesty parts
For vulgar praise, doth it too dearly buy.

[9] Alternatively, the prisoners, and later the Avocatori and the others, could exit, and Volpone could return to speak the epilogue. The advantage of the staging preferred here is that almost all the players are onstage to receive the audience's applause.

[1] Epigrams are commonly thought of as brief, witty, incisive poems of personal invective, often with a surprise turn at the end. But Jonson uses the word in a more liberal sense. His "Epigrams," a separate section in his collected Works of 1616, include not only sharp, satiric poems but many complimentary ones to friends and patrons, as well as memorial epitaphs and a verse letter, "Inviting a Friend to Supper."

[2] The distinction between toothed (biting) and toothless (general) satires was a commonplace.

[3] Here, as often elsewhere, Jonson echoes the greatest Roman epigrammatist, Martial.

On Something, That Walks Somewhere

At court I met it, in clothes brave° enough fine
To be a courtier, and looks grave enough
To seem a statesman: as I near it came,
It made me a great face. I asked the name.
"A lord," it cried, "buried in flesh and blood,
And such from whom let no man hope least good,
For I will do none; and as little ill,
For I will dare none." Good lord, walk dead still.

To William Camden[1]

Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
All that I am in arts, all that I know
(How nothing's that!), to whom my country owes
The great renown and name wherewith she goes;[2]
Than thee the age sees not that thing more grave,
More high, more holy, that she more would crave.
What name, what skill, what faith hast thou in things!
What sight in searching the most antique springs!
What weight and what authority in thy speech!
Man scarce can make that doubt, but[3] thou canst teach.
Pardon free truth and let thy modesty,
Which conquers all, be once o'ercome by thee.
Many of thine° this better could than I; your pupils
But for° their powers, accept my piety. in place of

On My First Daughter[1]

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,° grief
Mary, the daughter of their youth;
Yet all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.° regret
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence;
Whose soul heaven's queen,° whose name she bears, Mary
In comfort of her mother's tears,
Hath placed amongst her virgin-train:

[1] Camden, a distinguished scholar and antiquary, had been Jonson's teacher at Westminster School.

[2] Camden's studies of his native land in Britannia (1586) and Remains of a Greater Work Concerning Britain (1605) ran to several editions and were translated abroad.

[3] One hardly needs wonder whether.

[1] Probably written in the late 1590s, in Jonson's Roman Catholic period (ca. 1598-1610).

Where, while that severed doth remain
This grave partakes the fleshly birth;[0] the body
Which cover lightly, gentle earth![2]

To John Donne

Donne, the delight of Phoebus[0] and each Muse, god of poetry
Who, to thy one, all other brains refuse;[1]
Whose every work, of thy most early wit,
Came forth example[2] and remains so yet;
Longer a-knowing than most wits do live,
And which no affection praise enough can give.
To it[3] thy language, letters, arts, best life,
Which might with half mankind maintain a strife.
All which I meant to praise, and yet I would,
But leave, because I cannot as I should.

On Giles and Joan

Who says that Giles and Joan at discord be?
Th' observing neighbors no such mood can see.
Indeed, poor Giles repents he married ever,
But that his Joan doth too. And Giles would never
By his free will be in Joan's company;
No more would Joan he should. Giles riseth early,
And having got him out of doors is glad;
The like is Joan. But turning home is sad,
And so is Joan. Ofttimes, when Giles doth find
Harsh sights at home, Giles wisheth he were blind:
All this doth Joan. Or that his long-yearned[1] life
Were quite outspun. The like wish hath his wife.
The children that he keeps Giles swears are none
Of his begetting; and so swears his Joan.
In all affections[0] she concurreth still. desires
If now, with man and wife, to will and nilP not will
The self-same things a note of concord be,
I know no couple better can agree.

[2] A common sentiment in Latin epitaphs.

[1] I.e., the muses shower their favors exclusively on you.

[2] A pattern for others to imitate.

[3] In addition to your wit.

[1] Spun from long skeins of yarn.

On My First Son

Farewell, thou child of my right hand,[1] and joy;
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy:
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.
O could I lose all father now! For why
Will man lament the state he should envy,
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?
Rest in soft peace, and asked, say, "Here doth lie
Ben Jonson his best piece of poetry."[2]
For whose sake henceforth all his vows be such
As what he loves may never like too much.[3]

On Lucy, Countess of Bedford[1]

This morning, timely rapt with holy fire,
I thought to form unto my zealous muse,
What kind of creature I could most desire,
To honor, serve, and love; as poets use.[2]
I meant to make her fair, and free, and wise,
Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great;
I meant the day-star° should not brighter rise, the sun
Nor lend like influence[3] from his lucent seat.
I meant she should be courteous, facile,° sweet, affable
Hating that solemn vice of greatness, pride;
I meant each softest virtue, there should meet,
Fit in that softer bosom to reside.
Only a learned, and a manly soul
I purposed her; that should, with even powers,
The rock, the spindle, and the shears[4] control
Of destiny, and spin her own free hours.
Such when I meant to feign, and wished to see,
My muse bad, Bedford write, and that was she.

[1] A literal translation of the Hebrew name "Benjamin," which implies the meaning "dexterous" or "fortunate." The boy was born in 1596 and died on his birthday in 1603.

[2] Poet and father, are both "makers," Jonson's favorite term for the poet.

[3] The obscure grammar of the last lines allows for various readings; "like" may carry the sense of "please."

[1] The Countess of Bedford was a famous patroness of the age, to whom Jonson, Donne, and many other poets addressed poems of compliment.

[2] This elegant epigram of praise plays off against the Pygmalion story, in which the sculptor molds a statue of his ideal woman and she then comes to life.

[3] Stars were supposed to emit an ethereal fluid, or "influence," that affected the affairs of mortals, for good or ill.

[4] Emblems of the three Fates: Clotho spun the thread of life, Lachesis decided its length, and Atropos cut the thread to end life.

To Lucy, Countess of Bedford, with Mr. Donne's Satires[1]

Lucy, you brightness[2] of our sphere, who are
Life of the Muses' day, their morning star!
If works, not th' authors, their own grace should look,[0] have regard to Whose poems would not wish to be your book?
But these, desired by you, the maker's ends
Crown with their own. Rare poems ask rare friends.
Yet satires, since the most of mankind be
Their unavoided[0] subject, fewest see: inevitable
For none e'er took that pleasure in sin's sense,[0] experience
But, when they heard it taxed, took more offense.
They then that, living where the matter is bred,[3]
Dare for these poems yet both ask and read
And like them too, must needfully, though few,
Be of the best: and 'mongst those, best are you;
Lucy, you brightness of our sphere, who are
The Muses' evening, as their morning star.[4]

To Sir Thomas Roe[1]

Thou hast begun well, Roe, which stand[0] well too, continue
And I know nothing more thou hast to do.
He that is round[0] within himself, and straight, honest
Need seek no other strength, no other height;
Fortune upon him breaks herself, if ill,
And what should hurt his virtue makes it still.[0] constant
That thou at once, then, nobly may'st defend
With thine own course the judgment of thy friend,
Be always to thy gathered self the same,
And study conscience, more than thou wouldst fame.
Though both be good, the latter yet is worst,
And ever is ill got without the first.

Inviting a Friend to Supper

Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I
Do equally desire your company:

---

[1] With this poem, Jonson offered a manuscript collection of Donne's satires (see p. 1284), such as commonly passed from hand to hand in court circles.

[2] Lucy's name derives from the Latin lux, meaning "light."

[3] I.e., at court.

[4] The planet Venus is called Lucifer ("light-bearing") when it appears before sunrise, Hesperus when it appears after sunset.

[1] Knighted in 1605, Roe was sent as ambassador to the Great Mogul in 1614. His collection of coins and of Greek and Oriental manuscripts is in the Bodleian Library.

Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But that your worth will dignify our feast
With those that come; whose grace may make that seem Something, which else could hope for no esteem.
It is the fair acceptance, sir, creates
The entertainment perfect: not the cates. food
Yet shall you have, to rectify your palate,
An olive, capers, or some better salad
Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
If we can get her, full of eggs, and then
Lemons and wine for sauce; to° these, a coney[0] besides / rabbit
Is not to be despaired of for our money;
And though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,[0] scholars
The sky not falling, think we may have larks.
I'll tell you of more, and lie, so you will come:
Of partridge, pheasant, woodcock, of which some
May yet be there; and godwit if we can,
Knot, rail, and ruff, too.[1] Howsoe'er, my man" servant
Shall read a piece of Virgil, Tacitus,
Livy, or of some better book to us,
Of which we'll speak our minds amidst our meat;[0] food (of any kind)
And I'll profess[0] no verses to repeat: promise
To this,[0] if aught appear which I not know of, on this point
That will the pastry, not my paper, show of.[2]
Digestive cheese and fruit there sure will be;
But that which most doth take my muse and me
Is a pure cup of rich canary wine,
Which is the Mermaid's now, but shall be mine;
Of which, had Horace or Anacreon[3] tasted,
Their lives, as do their lines, till now had lasted.
Tobacco, nectar, or the Thespian spring
Are all but Luther's beer to this I sing.[4]
Of this we will sup free but moderately,
And we will have no Pooly or Parrot[5] by;
Nor shall our cups make any guilty men,
But at our parting we will be as when
We innocently met. No simple word
That shall be uttered at our mirthful board
Shall make us sad next morning, or affright
The liberty that we'll enjoy tonight.

[1] All these are edible birds.

[2] Paper-lined pans were used to keep pies from sticking; the writing sometimes rubbed off on the piecrust.

[3] Horace and Anacreon (one in Latin, the other in Greek) wrote many poems in praise of wine. The Mermaid tavern was a favorite haunt of the poets; sweet wine from the Canary Islands was popular in England.

[4] Tobacco was an expensive New World novelty in Jonson's time. Nectar is the drink of the gods. The Thespian spring, on Mount Helicon, is a legendary source of poetic inspiration. Compared with canary, these intoxicants are no better than inferior German beer.

[5] Pooly and Parrot were government spies. As a Roman Catholic, Jonson had reason to be wary of undercover agents.

On Gut

Gut eats all day, and lechers all the night,
So all his meat he tasteth over twice;
And striving so to double his delight,
He makes himself a thoroughfare of vice.
Thus in his belly can he change a sin:
Lust it comes out, that gluttony went in.

Epitaph on S. P., a Child of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel[1]

Weep with me, all you that read
This little story;
And know for whom a tear you shed,
Death's self is sorry.
'Twas a child that so did thrive
In grace and feature,
As Heaven and Nature seemed to strive
Which owned the creature.
Years he numbered scarce thirteen
When Fates turned cruel,
Yet three filled zodiacs had he been
The stage's jewel;[2]
And did act (what now we moan)
Old men so duly,° aptly
As, sooth,° the Parcae° thought him one, in truth/Fates
He played so truly.
So, by error, to his fate
They all consented;
But, viewing him since (alas, too late),
They have repented,
And have sought (to give new birth)
In baths[3] to steep him;
But, being so much too good for earth,
Heaven vows to keep him.

[1] Salomon Pavy, a boy actor in the troupe known as the Children of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, who had appeared in several of Jonson's plays; he died in 1602.

[2] He had been on the stage for three seasons.

[3] Perhaps such magic baths as that of Medea, which restored Jason's father to his first youth (Ovid, Metamorphoses 7).

FROM THE FOREST[1]

To Penshurst[2]

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show,
  Of touch[3] or marble; nor canst boast a row
Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;
  Thou hast no lantern[0] whereof tales are told, cupola
Or stair, or courts; but stand'st an ancient pile,[0] edifice
  And, these grudged at,[4] art reverenced the while.
Thou joy'st in better marks, of soil, of air,
  Of wood, of water; therein thou art fair.
Thou hast thy walks for health, as well as sport;
  Thy mount, to which the dryads[0] do resort, wood nymphs
Where Pan and Bacchus their high feasts have made,
  Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade;
That taller tree, which of a nut was set
  At his great birth where all the Muses met.[5]
There in the writhed bark are cut the names
  Of many a sylvan,[0] taken with his flames; countryman
And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke
  The lighter fauns[6] to reach thy Lady's Oak.[7]
Thy copse[0] too, named of Gamage[8] thou hast there, little woods
  That never fails to serve thee seasoned deer
When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
  The lower land, that to the river bends,
Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine,[0] and calves do feed; cattle
  The middle grounds thy mares and horses breed.
Each bank doth yield thee conies;[0] and the tops,[0] rabbits / ground
  Fertile of wood, Ashore and Sidney's copse,
To crown thy open table, doth provide
  The purpled pheasant with the speckled side;
The painted partridge lies in every field,
  And for thy mess[0] is willing to be killed. table
And if the high-swollen Medway[9] fail thy dish,
  Thou hast thy ponds, that pay thee tribute fish:
Fat aged carps that run into thy net,
  And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,
As loath the second draft or cast to stay,
  Officiously[0] at first themselves betray; dutifully
Bright eels that emulate them, and leap on land
  Before the fisher, or into his hand.
Then hath thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,

[1] In the 1616 Works, Jonson grouped some of his nonepigrammatic poems under the heading "The Forest," a translation of the term Sylvae, meaning a poetic miscellany. "To Penshurst" and the two following poems are from that group.

[2] Penshurst, in Kent, was the estate of Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle (later, Earl of Leicester), a younger brother of the poet Sir Philip Sidney. Along with Lanyer's "Description of Cookham" (p. 1319), this poem inaugurated the small genre of English "country-house" poems, which includes Marvell's Upon Appleton House (p. 1716).

[3] Touchstone, an expensive black basalt.

[4] More pretentious houses attract envy.

[5] Sir Philip Sidney was born at Penshurst.

[6] Satyrs and fauns were woodland spirits. Satyrs had the bodies of men and the legs (and horns) of goats. "Provoke": challenge to a race.

[7] Named after a lady of the house who went into labor under its branches.

[8] Lady Barbara (Gamage) Sidney, wife of Sir Robert.

[9] The local river.

Fresh as the air, and new as are the hours.
The early cherry, with the later plum,
Fig, grape, and quince, each in his time doth come;
The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.
And though thy walls be of the country stone,
They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan;
There's none that dwell about them wish them down;
But all come in, the farmer and the clown,[0] peasant
And no one empty-handed, to salute
Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.[0] request to make
Some bring a capon, some a rural cake,
Some nuts, some apples; some that think they make
The better cheeses bring them, or else send
By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend
This way to husbands, and whose baskets bear
An emblem of themselves in plum or pear.
But what can this (more than express their love)
Add to thy free provisions, far above
The need of such? whose liberal board doth flow
With all that hospitality doth know;
Where comes no guest but is allowed to eat,
Without his fear, and of thy lord's own meat;[0] food
Where the same beer and bread, and selfsame wine,
That is his lordship's shall be also mine,[1]
And I not fain to sit (as some this day
At great men's tables), and yet dine away.
Here no man tells[0] my cups; nor, standing by, counts
A waiter doth my gluttony envy,[0] resent
But gives me what I call, and lets me eat;
He knows below[0] he shall find plenty of meat. in the servants' quarters
Thy tables hoard not up for the next day;
Nor, when I take my lodging, need I pray
For fire, or lights, or livery;[0] all is there, provisions
As if thou then wert mine, or I reigned here:
There's nothing I can wish, for which I stay.[0] wait
That found King James when, hunting late this way
With his brave son, the Prince,[2] they saw thy fires
Shine bright on every hearth, as the desires
Of thy Penates[0] had been set on flame Roman household gods
To entertain them; or the country came
With all their zeal to warm their welcome here.
What (great I will not say, but) sudden cheer
Didst thou then make 'em! And what praise was heaped
On thy good lady then, who therein reaped
The just reward of her high housewifery;
To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh,
When she was far; and not a room but dressed
As if it had expected such a guest!

---

[1] Different courses might be served to different guests, depending on their social status. The lord would have the best food.

[2] Prince Henry, the heir apparent, who died in November 1612.

These, Penshurst, are thy praise, and yet not all.
Thy lady's noble, fruitful, chaste withal.
His children thy great lord may call his own,
A fortune in this age but rarely known.
They are, and have been, taught religion; thence
Their gentler spirits have sucked innocence.
Each morn and even they are taught to pray,
With the whole household, and may, every day,
Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts° attributes
The mysteries of manners,° arms, and arts. moral behavior
Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion° thee compare
With other edifices, when they see
Those proud, ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
May say, their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.

Song: To Celia[1]

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
The thirst that from the soul doth rise
Doth ask a drink divine:
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.
I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
Not so much honoring thee,
As giving it a hope that there
It could not withered be.
But thou thereon didst only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me;
Since when it grows and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

To Heaven

Good and great God, can I not think of thee
But it must straight° my melancholy be? immediately
Is it interpreted in me disease
That, laden with my sins, I seek for ease?
Oh, be thou witness, that the reins[1] dost know
And hearts of all, if I be sad for show,

[1] These famous lines translate a patchwork of five separate prose passages by Philostratus, a Greek sophist (3rd century C.E.). The music that has made it a barroom favorite is by an anonymous 18th-century composer.

[1] Literally, kidneys, but also the seat of the affections, with a glance at Psalm 7.9: "the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins."

And judge me after, if I dare pretend
To aught but grace, or aim at other end.
As thou art all, so be thou all to me,
First, midst, and last, converted° one and three, interchanging
My faith, my hope, my love; and in this state,
My judge, my witness, and my advocate.
Where have I been this while exiled from thee,
And whither rapt,° now thou but stoop'st to me? carried off
Dwell, dwell here still:° Oh, being everywhere, always
How can I doubt to find thee ever here?
I know my state, both full of shame and scorn,
Conceived in sin and unto labor born,
Standing with fear, and must with horror fall,
And destined unto judgment after all.
I feel my griefs too, and there scarce is ground
Upon my flesh to inflict another wound.
Yet dare I not complain or wish for death
With holy Paul,[2] lest it be thought the breath
Of discontent; or that these prayers be
For weariness of life, not love of thee.

FROM UNDERWOOD[1]

From A Celebration of Charis in Ten Lyric Pieces[2]

4. Her Triumph[3]

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
Wherein my lady rideth!
Each that draws is a swan or a dove,[4]
And well the car Love guideth.
As she goes, all hearts do duty
Unto her beauty;
And enamored do wish, so they might
But enjoy such a sight,
That they still° were to run by her side, always
Through swords, through seas, whither she would ride.

Do but look on her eyes, they do light
All that Love's world compriseth!
Do but look on her hair, it is bright
As Love's star° when it riseth! Venus, the morning star
Do but mark,° her forehead's smoother observe

[2] "Who shall deliver me from the bodv of this death?" (Romans 7.24).

[1] Preparing a second edition of his Works (published posthumously in 1640—41), Jonson added a third section of poems, "Underwood," "out of the analogy they hold to The Forest in my former book."

[2] The Greek word charis, from which Jonson's lady takes her name, means "grace" or "loveliness."

[3] Following Petrarch, many Renaissance poets used the figure of the triumphal procession to celebrate a person or concept—time, chastity, fame, etc. Metrically, this poem is highly complex.

[4] Venus's birds.

Than words that soothe her!
And from her arched brows, such a grace
Sheds itself through the face,
As alone there triumphs to the life
All the gain, all the good, of the elements' strife.[5]

Have you seen but a bright lily grow,
Before rude hands have touched it?
Have you marked but the fall o' the snow,
Before the soil hath smutched it?
Have you felt the wool o' the beaver,
Or swan's down ever?
